HELM, C. J. Mays, the appellee, brought suit and recovered judgment against Miles, the appellant, for commission earned in procuring a purchaser for certain real estate in the city of Denver. The property in question belonged to Emma C. Whitsitt, for whom Miles acted as agent. The proof clearly establishes the fact that Mays furnished a purchaser for the premises in accordance with the terms of his contract with Miles. The affirmative testimony of Mays, supplemented by that of Dr. Elsner, the would-be purchaser, and the admissions of Miles, clearly show that Elsner stood ready to take the property at the price and upon the conditions stipulated for by Miles. There would be no justification for our interference with the judgment of the court below, in so far as this particular objection is concerned.

The only serious question to be considered is as to whether the action and recovery can be maintained against Miles alone, his principal, Mrs. Whitsitt, not being a party or bound by the judgment. The complaint states the cause of action in two separate counts. The second of these is substantially a count at common law for services rendered to defendant at defendant's instance and request, in connection with the sale of the property mentioned. The first count presents a simple and concise statement of facts in accordance with the provisions of the Code. Among the averments therein is the following: "That defendant, George T. Miles, was the duly-constituted agent of said Whitsitt by written power of attorney, and had full power to sell and convey said lots for the price of $16,500." This averment is not denied in the answer, and therefore must be accepted as true. Miles was the brother of Mrs. Whitsitt, and appeared to have entire control of the property. Mays was employed by Miles exclusively, having no negotiations whatever with Mrs. Whitsitt touching the transaction. It does not appear that she was at any time consulted, or that her advice or wishes were made known to Mays, or otherwise considered. According to the testimony, Miles proceeded in all respects precisely as he would had the property belonged to him. There is nothing in the evidence to show that Mrs. Whitsitt refused or objected to the sale as negotiated by Mays; the sole responsibility for such rejection appears to rest with Miles. It is true he disclosed his agency and the name of his principal; it is also true that he did not in words assume individual responsibility for the payment of Mays' commission. But, under all the circumstances, there was sufficient in the record to warrant a submission to the jury of the question as to whether or not Mays' employment was in the nature of a subagency, where reliance is placed upon the intermediate agent, the credit being given in whole or in large part to him, and not exclusively to his principal. In such cases, the rule is that suit may be brought against the immediate employer, even though his principal may sometimes also be liable. Story, Ag. §§ 386, 387. The charge upon this point was certainly as favorable to Miles as the law required. The jury were told, in substance, that if they found from the evidence that Miles on his own account employed plaintiff to procure a purchaser for the property, and if, before the property was withdrawn, the latter did secure such purchaser, in accordance with the terms agreed upon, Miles was liable for his commission as provided in the contract. The jury having weighed the testimony, under proper instructions, and having resolved in plaintiff's favor the question of fact thus submitted to them, their verdict will not be disturbed, and the judgment based thereon is affirmed.

STEVENSON v. LORD.

PLEADING—DEMURRER—REPLEVIN—DAMAGES.

1. The objection that a complaint fails to state a cause of action may be taken at any time, and is not waived by pleading over.

2. In replevin by a chattel mortgagee against an attaching creditor of the mortgagor, an allegation in the complaint of the non-payment of the mortgage is not necessary.

3. In such action the recovery is properly for the full value of the property, even though plaintiff's interest may be less.

4. The Colorado statute providing that, in an action for the recovery of personal property, judgment may be for the possession or the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had, is satisfied by a finding of the total aggregate value of all the chattels wrongfully withheld.

Appeal from superior court of Denver.

Reddin & Allphin, for appellant. Stuart B. Andrews, for appellee.

HELM, C. J. E. M. and L. R. Smith borrowed of Mrs. Lord a sum of money, giving their promissory note therefor, secured by a chattel mortgage upon certain personal property, which was duly filed for record. The mortgage contained a provision permitting the mortgagors to retain possession of the property until default in payment of the note, or until the happening of certain other contingencies therein specified. The property while thus situated was attached by a creditor of the mortgagors. By virtue of such attachment, Mrs. Lord became entitled to immediate possession of the mortgaged chattels. She brought suit in replevin therefor against appellant, Stevenson, who was the sheriff holding under the attachment. A demurrer to her complaint having been overruled, answer was filed, the cause was tried, and she recovered judgment for the possession of the chattels, or, in case possession were not obtained, for their value.

The objection, taken by demurrer, that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, was not waived, as counsel contend, by pleading over. Under the statute, this question may be raised at any time; but the demurrer was correctly overruled. The complaint, in our judgment, sufficiently pleaded a cause of action. Had the note matured, and suit been instituted to recover the principal and interest thereon, an express averment by plaintiff of non-payment would not have been necessary. In most of the states payment is regarded as a defense, and is usually pleaded as new matter in the answer. Pom. Rem. § 700; Watson v. Lemen, 9 Colo. 200, 11 Pac. Rep. 88. But if a complaint in assumpsit upon a promissory note need not affirmatively aver non-payment, much less need the complaint in the present action contain this allegation. The evidence sufficiently establishes the execution and delivery of both the note and mortgage, and the acknowledgment of the latter instrument is in substantial conformity to the requirements of the statute. While in some of the states the value of the different articles involved in this action must be separately found, such has not been the rule in Colorado. The statute provides that, "in an action for the recovery of personal property, judgment for the plaintiff may be for the possession or the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had." This provision has been regarded as satisfied by a finding of the total aggregate value of all the chattels wrongfully withheld.

It is further contended by counsel for appellant that plaintiff's interest in the property was less than its full value, and therefore that judgment, in case a return were not had, should have been only for the principal of the note, and interest. There would, in any event, be but little merit in this contention. The value of the property found by the jury differs so slightly from the amount of the note as to almost justify an application of the maxim, de minimis non curat lex. But in Machette v. Wanless, 1 Colo. 225, it is held that the mortgagee is entitled to maintain replevin for the property mortgaged, where it is seized under a prior invalid mortgage, provided any portion of the debt secured by plaintiff's incumbrance remains unpaid. If a mortgagee is, by virtue of his contract or otherwise, entitled to maintain replevin against an attaching creditor, in our opinion his recovery may include all the property covered by the mortgage, or by virtue of the statute, the full value thereof. Besides, many authorities declare that when, as in the present case, the plaintiff in replevin is a stranger to the process under which the officer holds possession, the judgment should be for the full value, though plaintiff's interest may be less. Other objections to the proceedings in the court below are presented, but they are not deemed important enough to warrant discussion. The judgment is affirmed.

BUTLER et al. v. HOWELL.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE—CHANGE OF POSSESSION.

1. In an action involving the validity of the sale of a stock of goods as to the seller's creditors, a piece of a promissory note signed by the seller is admissible in corroboration of the purchaser's testimony that the seller had been indebted to her for some time before the purchase of the goods, for which indebtedness he had executed his promissory notes; that these notes were surrendered to the seller at the time of the sale as a part of the purchase price, and by him torn up; and that the purchaser had picked up the piece offered in evidence.

2. One who has been engaged in the merchandising business for five or six years, and who has purchased the entire stock in question at a sheriff's sale, is a competent witness as to its value.

3. Evidence that after the sale the purchaser continually replenished the stock while continuing the business in her own name is admissible on the question of change of possession of the stock from the seller to the buyer.

4. There was evidence that at the time of the sale the purchaser took possession of the goods, locked up the store-room, and retained the key until the levy of an attachment by the seller's creditors 10 days thereafter; that, between the time of the purchase and the levy, the store remained closed the greater part of the time; that when customers came to the store the purchaser went from her place of business on the opposite side of the street, and waited on them; that she replenished the stock, as occasion required, with goods purchased by her; that the seller did not,

after the sale, exercise any control over the business, though at times, when requested, he came to the store to point out goods with which the purchaser was not familiar. Held sufficient to warrant a finding by the jury that there had been a change of possession, though other witnesses living in the neighborhood, but whose means of information were shown to be meager, testified that they had noticed no change of possession.

Appeal from district court, Summit county.

The facts of this case may be briefly stated as follows: For some time prior to August 8, 1887, the appellee, Mrs. Howell, then Mrs. Mary Weinart, was engaged in conducting a confectionery store in the town of Montezuma, Summit county, Colo. Almost or directly opposite to her place of business was a general merchandising store, belonging to one B. Marks, the stock in which consisted of boots and shoes, hats, caps, clothing, dry goods, groceries, etc. The appellee claims that prior to said date she advanced and loaned to the said Marks large sums of money, aggregating the sum of seventeen or eighteen hundred dollars; that upon that date, to-wit, August 8th, she, failing to receive payment of the money so advanced by her, bought out said store, and took possession thereof, giving to Marks credit for the sum of $1,200 on his indebtedness to her. The appellants Butler Bros. were a firm engaged in the business of merchandising in Denver, Colo., and at and prior to said time they were the creditors of said Marks; and appellant Daniel Hanley was the sheriff of said Summit county. About the 16th day of August, 1887, Butler Bros. commenced an action in attachment against the said Marks, in the district court of Arapahoe county, to recover from said Marks the sum of $638.71, and, a writ of attachment having been duly issued in said cause, the same was forwarded to Hanley, as sheriff of said county, for service, and was by him levied on said stock of goods as the property of Marks. Afterwards the complaint in this action was filed by the appellee, she claiming to have been the owner of said property. The suit was brought for the purpose of recovering from appellants the value of the stock of goods so seized by the sheriff, the same having been, in the mean time, sold to satisfy the judgment rendered in the attachment suit. To this complaint answers were filed by the appellants setting up the claim that the property, at the time the same was levied upon and taken, was in truth and in fact the property of Marks; and that the same was so seized and taken under and by virtue of the writ of attachment issued in the suit against him; that the pretended transfer of said goods by Marks to appellee was fraudulent, and was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of said Marks, particularly these appellants, to-wit, Butler Bros. The cause was tried to a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of appellee for $1,200. A motion for a new trial was overruled by the court; and appellee, having remitted the sum of $200 from the amount of the verdict rendered by the jury, judgment was entered in her favor for $1,000, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

J. H. Richards, B. F. Montgomery, and Patterson & Thomas, for appellants. Harvey Riddell and Sam W. Jones, for appellee.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first error assigned relates to the admission in evidence of a certain exhibit. This exhibit, which was admitted over the objection of appellant, appears to be a part of a promissory note signed by Marks. It was shown to be in Marks' handwriting, and was admitted, in connection with the testimony of appellee, solely for the purpose of showing that there had been a series of business dealings between Marks and herself. We think the testimony competent in view of the nature of the issues. Appellee's title was attacked on the ground of fraud, and for failure of consideration. It was proper, under the circumstances, for appellee to show that she had given a good consideration for the property, and the portion of the note introduced was competent in corroboration of the testimony upon this point. Appellee testified that Marks had been her debtor for some time prior to the purchase by her of the property in controversy; that to evidence said indebtedness he had executed to her several promissory notes, which were surrendered up to Marks at the time of the purchase of the stock of goods from him as a part of the purchase price, and by him torn up; that she had afterwards picked up one of the pieces containing a portion of one of said notes, and that this was the piece.

When the witness Porges was on the stand the appellee propounded to him this question: "What is the value of these goods?" The witness was allowed to answer the question against the appellants' objection, and the action of the court in permitting such answer is made the basis of the second assignment of error. It is contended here that this testimony was improperly admitted, for the reason that no sufficient foundation was laid to warrant the witness to give an opinion upon the question of value. It does not appear that this objection was made in the court below, at least not in its present form, and for this reason it must be denied. If the specific objection had been made at the trial, we doubt not the competency of the witness would have been more fully established. We think, however, sufficient appears to show that the witness was qualified to testify as to the value of the property in controversy. In answer to preliminary questions, the witness stated that he had been engaged in the merchandising business in the neighboring town of Dillon for six years; that he attended the sheriff's sale, and purchased the entire stock in controversy. He further said that he estimated the value upon the basis of first cost, freight, etc. We think the testimony was properly admitted.

The third assignment of error is the same as the second, and need not be separately considered.

The fourth relates to the introduction in evidence of the bill of sale for the goods in controversy given by Marks to the appellee, and is abandoned in this court.

The fifth relates to the introduction in evidence of a certain bill for merchandise purchased by appellee after she took charge of the Marks stock. The bill appears to be in form of a monthly statement, such as it is usual for wholesale merchants to send out to their customers at the end of each month. We think the testimony was properly admitted. The real controversy in the case is upon the sufficiency of the change of possession from Marks to appellee. The fact that appellee was continually replenishing the stock while conducting the business in her own name was a proper circumstance for the consideration of the jury. It, perhaps, should be given but slight weight, but the question here turns upon its admissibility, and not upon the weight to be accorded it.

The remaining assignment of error relates to the instructions given by the court to the jury. It is not necessary to consider these instructions in detail. It is sufficient to say that they fully and accurately state the law applicable to the facts as presented, as the same has been declared in repeated decisions of the court. Cook v. Mann, 6 Colo. 21; Wilcox v. Jackson, 7 Colo. 528, 4 Pac. Rep. 966; Bassinger v. Spangler, 9 Colo. 175, 10 Pac. Rep. 809.

The question upon the sufficiency of the change of possession was fairly submitted to the jury, and decided against appellants. It is in evidence that at the time of the sale she took possession of the property, locked up the store-room containing the goods, and retained the key until the levy of the attachment writ; that, between the time of the purchase by her and the levy, the store remained closed the greater part of the time; that when purchasers came for goods she went from her place of business opposite to the Marks store, and there waited upon them; that she replenished the stock as occasion required, with goods purchased by her; that Marks did not, after the sale, exercise any control or supervision over the business, although at times, when requested, he came to the store for the purpose of pointing out certain goods with which appellee was not familiar. To overthrow the testimony, a number of witnesses living in the neighborhood were called by appellant, and testified that they had not noticed any change in possession, but, upon further examination, the means of information of these witnesses was shown to be very meager, and the testimony correspondingly weakened. Under these circumstances, the finding of the jury in appellee's favor upon the question of change of possession cannot be disturbed.

Finally, the judgment is challenged as being excessive. The opinion of the witnesses varied materially as to the value of the goods. The jury, in the verdict, placed the value at $1,200, the price which, according to the testimony, appellee paid for the property. And it is in evidence that the goods were actually worth this amount, although some witnesses placed the value lower. Judgment was finally entered for $1,000 and costs. We cannot say, under the circumstances, that the same is excessive. The judgment will be affirmed.

KESTER et al. v. JEWELL.

APPEAL—REVIEW—MATTERS NOT APPARENT OF RECORD.

Upon appeal from a decree in an equity suit to quiet title, the material question was as to the validity of certain attachment proceedings under which the property in question was sold. Held, that in the absence of a transcript of the record in such proceedings, the appellate court would adopt as correct the conclusions of the trial judge as to their regularity.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Pitkin county.

D. C. McDevitt, for appellants. W. D. Cooley and Rucker & Scott, for appellee.

REED, C. This was a suit in the nature of a proceeding in equity, brought by appellee (plaintiff below) against appellants under section 255, c. 22, of the Civil Code, which is: "An action may be brought by any person in possession, by himself or his tenant, of real property against any person who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, estate, or interest." It appears from the record that prior to April 21, 1886, one Mattie B. Jansen was the owner of the undivided one-half of lot K., in block 81, in the city of Aspen; that appellant Kester was the owner of the other half; that Jansen was a resident of Topeka, in the state of Kansas; that on the 21st day of April, 1886, Jansen, by her deed, conveyed her interest to appellee; that, on the same date, the deed was deposited with the Wells-Fargo Express Company to be transmitted to the recorder of Pitkin county for record; that it was received by that officer and filed for record on the 11th day of May; that on May 1st, Kester, claiming an indebtedness from Jansen to himself, caused a summons to be issued, which was returned on May 3d, "Defendant not found." On the 3d of May he sued out an attachment, which was levied upon the half interest in the property as belonging to Jansen. On the 5th of May a complaint was filed. On June 30th a default was taken for want of an answer, and on July 12th a judgment was rendered against Jansen for $750.66, and costs. A special execution was issued, which was by the sheriff returned on the 16th day of August, with an indorsement of sale of the property to Webber, (appellant.) On the 30th day of August, Jansen filed a motion to vacate all proceedings on the ground that the summons was defective, and that there had been no proper service. What disposition was made of the motion, if any, does not appear, but it is said: "It appearing to the court that Jansen was a non-resident, affidavit was made, and an order for the publication of the summons was made, September 10th." On September 31st, plaintiff moved to set aside the judgment previously rendered for him, and for an alias summons to be issued, and that the attachment theretofore levied be allowed to stand. What disposition was made of this application does not appear. It is afterwards stated that an alias summons, an alias writ of attachment, and copy of the complaint, were served on Jansen in Shawnee county, in the state of Kansas, by a deputy-sheriff of that county, on September 20th. On November 22d, Jansen appeared specially and moved to dismiss the action and dissolve the attachment, for the reasons—First, that the suit had not been diligently prosecuted; second, that the writ of attachment was issued before the summons. What was done with this motion does not appear, but, from the proceeding that followed, we conclude that it must have been overruled. On the 24th of May, following, (1887,) Webber (appellant) moved the court to set aside the sale of the property previously made; that the satisfaction of judgment be canceled; and that he, as the purchaser of the property, be allowed to prosecute the suit in the name of the plaintiff for his own benefit. Afterwards, but of what date is not shown in the record, another special execution was issued to sell the same property by virtue of the levy of the attachment of May 3, 1886, which was returned, showing another sale of the same property to Webber. These proceedings upon the trial of the former case are so complicated, mixed, and multiform, that a recital of them in their order seems necessary, not to a proper understanding of the case, for that we do not pretend to have, but to show in what manner and through what proceedings the pretended title of Webber to the property was acquired, which appellee in this suit seeks to set aside as a cloud upon his title.

The plaintiff upon the trial of this cause introduced oral evidence of his possession as a tenant in common with Kester to show himself entitled to maintain the suit under the Code; also put in evidence the deed from Jansen. No question is made as to the bona fides of the transaction between Jansen and appellee, nor in regard to the validity of the deed. The only important question being whether there was a valid lien by the levy of the attachment before the filing of the deed for record. Appellants put in evidence, it is said, as exhibits, copies of the various papers and proceedings making the record in the former case against Jansen, under which the supposed title of Webber accrued. No copies are furnished us, but the clerk in making up the record states what, in his opinion, each one of the respective exhibits was supposed to be. The case was tried to the court, and the learned judge, after taking the case under advisement, found "that at the time of the issuance of said writ there was no valid summons issued in said cause, nor an action commenced, as required by law; that the said Mattie B. Jansen was, at the time of the attempted levy of said attachment, a non-resident of the state of Colorado, and that steps and proceedings required to be taken by statute to acquire jurisdiction over such non-resident were not taken; that the court never had jurisdiction of the said cause, or over the property or person of the said Mattie B. Jansen, and the said judgment in said cause, and the sale thereunder, appear to the court to be wholly void, and of no effect, and that all the material allegations of the complaint are sustained by evidence, competent and material, and that the equities are with the plaintiff;" and entered a decree in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. There being no transcript of the record and proceedings in the case of Kester against Jansen before us, and only the conclusions of the clerk in regard to it, we have no data by which we can intelligently pass upon the validity of those proceedings. They seem to have been so numerous and contradictory on the part of the plaintiff in that action as to have suggested doubts in regard to its regularity in the minds of his counsel. It appears that the case of Kester against Jansen, in the county court, was tried before the same judge as this case, he having been elected to the district bench after that trial. He, having a transcript of the record and proceedings, certainly had opportunities for determining whether the proceedings in the former case had been regular or otherwise, which, as shown, we have not; and, in the absence of sufficient data for a review, we must adopt his conclusions as correct. We advise that the judgment and decree be affirmed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS WAIVED.

2. Where, after a demurrer is overruled, defendant answers, and no exception is taken to the judgment on demurrer, any error therein is waived.

Appeal from district court, La Plata county.

James Hoffmire and H. Garbanati, for appellants. Russell & McCloskey, for appellees.

REED, C. Appellant Galloway brought a suit in replevin before a justice of the peace. Upon a hearing, the suit was dismissed. This suit was brought upon the bond in replevin filed in that suit, for alleged damages. A demurrer was filed to the complaint, containing several supposed special grounds. The demurrer was overruled, and appellants answered at great length. Exceptions were filed to the answer, which were sustained as to part, which was ordered stricken out. A trial was had to the court, without a jury, resulting in a finding for appellees in the sum of $100. Motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment for that amount entered. No exception was taken to the judgment. This appeal was taken under the act of 1885. There was no transcript of the evidence in the abstract, and it is presumed that the judgment was warranted by it. No exception having been taken to the judgment, we would not be required to review it, even if we had the evidence. The correctness of the judgment under the evidence and pleadings is not questioned in argument, nor does it seem to have been the intention to appeal from the final judgment, but from the interlocutory judgments upon the demurrer, and the striking out of a part of the answer. Counsel for appellants say: "For a reversal of the judgment, appellants rely on the first, second, third, fourth, and sixth grounds of their demurrer;" also upon the ruling of the court in striking out part of the answer. No exception appears of record to the judgment of the court upon the demurrer, and counsel answered over, and went to trial upon the issues made. The want of an exception is fatal as to the judgment upon the first, second, third, and sixth grounds of demurrer. The fourth ground was that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. On examination of the allegations of the complaint as contained in the abstract, we think them sufficient, and the judgment of the court in overruling the demurrer correct. No exception appears to have been taken to the judgment of the court in striking out part of the answer, but we have examined the answer, and think the judgment was warranted. The matter stricken out was irrelevant, and presented no defense. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

HUTCHINSON v. McLAUGHLIN.

APPEAL—Final Order—Eminent Domain—INTERVENTION—INFANCY.

1. In condemnation proceedings, one H. was allowed to file a petition alleging that before the proceedings she was owner of one of the lots in question, and conveyed the same to defendant's grantor; that at the time of the conveyance she was a minor; and that she had elected to disaffirm the conveyance; and praying that the damages assessed for such lot be paid to her, less the consideration received by her. The court adjudged that the entire compensation be paid to defendant. Held, that such judgment was, as to H., a final judgment from which a writ of error would lie.

2. Under the Colorado eminent domain act, (section 6,) providing that the commissioners shall fix the compensation to be paid to the owner and all persons interested in the land taken, and (section 5) admitting interpleaders, it was error on the part of the court to ignore her petition.

3. The filing of her petition was an election on the part of H. to avoid the deed.

Error to district court, Pueblo county.

The Denver & Santa Fe Railroad Company instituted, in the Pueblo county district court, condemnation proceedings for the purpose of acquiring title to certain real property situate in the city of Pueblo, desired by the company for depot purposes. Included in the property sought to be condemned were two lots, to-wit, lots 15 and 16, block 19, State addition to Pueblo, the title in fee to which was shown by the land records to be in C. M. McLaughlin, defendant in error. Pending such condemnation suit, and prior to the report of the commissioners ascertaining and assessing the damages for the lots in question, plaintiff in error, by Aaron Hutchinson, her next friend, sought and obtained leave to file her petition in intervention, and thereby became a party defendant to said condemnation suit, over the objection made thereto by defendant in error. In said petition, it is alleged, in substance, that intervenor, prior to the commencement of said condemnation suit, was the owner of one of said lots, to-wit, lot 15; and, in pursuance of a sale for $350, conveyed, by a general warranty deed, the said lot to one Leo Breen, who shortly thereafter conveyed the said premises by quitclaim deed to defendant in error; that intervenor was, at the time of said conveyance, and is now, a minor, having been born, as alleged in her petition, September 22, 1870. The petition also alleges other facts, which are not, however, material to the case at bar. The petition further recited that she had elected to disaffirm and avoid the conveyance made to said Breen, and prays that she be permitted to intervene in said condemnation suit, and that the damages assessed be paid to her, less the consideration money received upon the said sale to Breen. By the report of the commissioners, the value of said lot 15 was assessed at $1,975, which report was confirmed by the court, January 6, 1888. On the 7th day of January, 1888, defendant in error, by her attorney, appeared in court, and moved for an order directing the clerk to pay over the compensation assessed for both lots to defendant in error. The motion was resisted by intervenor, who, through her attorney, moved that the $1,975, less $350, consideration received upon sale of said lot 15, be paid over to her, or to her legally appointed guardian. The court ordered the entire compensation assessed for both lots to be paid to defendant in error. The only error assigned is as follows: "The court erred in not ordering compensation assessed on lot 15 to be paid to her, or her legally appointed guardian, or in not ordering the clerk to hold said compensation pending plaintiff in error's minority, or in not making some other similar appropriate order to protect intervenor's interest in said lot."

Fred Betts and A. W. Arrington, for plaintiff in error. John M. Waldron and John W. Sleeper, for defendant in error.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Two questions of practice have been raised by counsel which will be considered in limine. The first of such preliminary questions is predicated upon the claim that the judgment here sought to be reviewed was pronounced subsequent to the entry of final judgment in the case. In support of this claim, the case of Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 6 Colo. 340, is cited. In that case it was claimed by counsel that the petitioner must first pay or deposit the amount of the award before it could be allowed an appeal. The court, however, decided against such claim, and held that such a construction would practically deprive the petitioner of any benefit from his appeal, or writ of error, or prevent such relief altogether. The rights of third parties were not involved, and the court held that in such cases, when the commissioners had filed with the clerk their certificate of "ascertainment and assessment," and a motion to vacate the same had been overruled, this was such a final determination as would entitle the petitioner to his appeal, or writ of error. In the case at bar no fault was found with the award. All parties were willing to have the same confirmed. And plaintiff in error is not now complaining because of such confirmation. She accepted the amount as fixed by the commissioners as representing the true value of the property, claiming only the right to share in the distribution thereof. By the judgment of January 7th, this claim was determined against her. Then, for the first time, she had cause to complain. To say that she cannot prosecute a writ of error to such judgment would be to entirely deprive her of the benefit of the review provided by statute, a conclusion we cannot indorse. In our opinion, the judgment of January 7th, by which the entire fund was awarded to defendant in error, was, as to plaintiff in error, a final judgment, to which a writ of error will lie. The court below, against objection, and after argument, permitted the petition of intervention to be filed. No further order in terms applying to this petition appears to have been made. We infer, however, from the record that the court, upon reflection, concluded that the petition was insufficient, and consequently ignored the same. Plaintiff in error claims that it was incumbent upon defendant in error to support her plea by evidence, and, as no such evidence was offered, he says the petition was properly disregarded. The practice under the eminent domain statute is not well defined. Provision, however, is made therein for the filing of a cross-petition in the nature of an interplea. It is further provided that, when such interplea has been filed, the rights of the party interpleading should be fully considered and determined; and the court is empowered, by section 5 of the act, to make such rule or order in relation to the interplea as may be reasonable and proper. Under the latter provision, the court below, either at the time of or after allowing the petition to be filed, might have entered a rule requiring the original parties to the action to plead thereto. This, however, was not done. The court should have taken some action for her protection, if the petition shows that she was entitled to any relief whatever. It is the policy of the law to fully protect the rights of minors, and this may be done even if the guardian or prochein ami does not properly claim such rights, or has even failed to claim them at all. So it has been held that, when an infant plaintiff neglects to reply where a pleading in reply is necessary, this will not be taken as an admission of the facts alleged in the answer, as in the case of an adult, but all the facts must be established by competent evidence. Tyler, Inf. § 139; Legard v. Sheffield, 2 Atk. 377; Claxton v. Claxton, 56 Mich. 557, 23 N. W. Rep. 310; Gilmore v. Gilmore, 109 Ill. 277.

It is claimed, however, that a minor who has executed and delivered a deed to real estate owned by her cannot thereafter, and during the continuance of her minority, intervene in a condemnation suit brought to condemn the same tract, and to so far control such proceedings as either to compel the payment of the award to her, instead of her grantee, or to tie up the fund in the hands of the court until she attains her majority. Counsel says that, whatever doubts may have been at one time entertained in reference to the deed of a minor, it is now well settled that title may be conveyed by such deed. It is not absolutely void, but voidable only, and, until revoked in a manner and form prescribed by law, the title to the purchaser is as complete as though the grantor was an adult. It is further said that the conveyance cannot be avoided in any event until the infant arrives at full age; and therefore it is claimed that plaintiff in error cannot intervene during her minority. Should the correctness of the propositions of law announced be conceded, the deductions drawn by counsel do not, we think, necessarily follow. It is the policy of the law to settle once for all, so far as possible, in the condemnation proceedings the amount of damages resulting from the taking. The statute expressly provides that the commissioners shall fix the compensation to be paid, not only to the owners, but to all parties interested in the lands taken, as well as all damages accruing to such owners or parties interested in consequence of the condemnation of the same. See Eminent Domain Act, § 6. In Crane v. City of Elizabeth, 36 N. J. Eq. 339, the court had under consideration a statute, if anything, less comprehensive than the statute of this state, in that it required compensation to be made only to the "owner or owners of lands and real estate taken for the improvement;" and yet in that case it was decided "that the compensation is to include the value of all the interests burdened by the public easement, and is to be paid to the owner of the land if no other claimant intervenes, and, if in any such case such owner ought not, in equity, to receive the whole, timely resort must be had to the court of chancery, which will see to the equitable distribution of the fund." It was said, in the course of the opinion, that the proceedings were in the nature of a proceeding in rem,—a taking, not of the rights of designated persons, but of the thing itself; and, if in any case the designated owner of the land is not entitled to receive the fund, equity will, at the instance of any interested complainant, direct its proper distribution. Under our statute, we think the relief may be granted in the original action upon a proper showing. In no other way can the provision requiring the rights of the interpleader to be fully considered and determined be carried out. In the case at bar, petitioner did intervene in the court below, and in her petition shows that she has an interest which ought to be protected. The statute allows the interests of minors to be taken by virtue of the proceedings. The fact that the record title was in plaintiff in error may have relieved the railroad company from making plaintiff in error a party defendant in the first instance, but, she having voluntarily appeared, the action of the court below entirely ignoring her claim cannot be sustained. In the case of Chandler v. Aqueduct Corp., 125 Mass. 544, relied upon by defendant in error, one Ward granted the Aqueduct Corporation the privilege of laying logs and wooden pipes on his land, in consideration whereof, and for five dollars in money paid by Ward, the company, in turn, deeded to him certain other lands, "to have and to hold the same to the said Ward, his heirs and assigns, as long as said corporation shall keep pipes in his land as aforesaid, and no longer." Afterwards the title acquired by Ward passed to Chandler. Thereafter the corporation instituted proceedings for the purpose of having the same land condemned for its uses, and, upon the trial, claimed that by the Ward deed, which, as we have seen, was a part of Chandler's claim of title, only a base fee was conveyed, and that the company had a right to rely upon this fact in reduction of damages. The court, however, decided against such claim, upon the ground that the possibility of such interest was too remote and contingent to be the subject of an estimate of damages by a jury, and could not be allowed. It was further held that the owners of the fee had the right to recover the entire value of the land, even if a part of it was held by them under the Ward deed, and they had only a base or determinable fee in it. So in this case, as we understand counsel, the claim is that, notwithstanding the voidability of the deed made by intervenor, the grantee is entitled to full compensation for the land condemned. This would have the effect of entirely cutting off the right of plaintiff in error to revoke the deed made during her minority, a result we cannot entertain. Although it may be that a minor cannot avoid his deed during the continuance of his minority, he may, nevertheless, enter upon the deeded premises, and receive the rents and profits thereof until he arrives at an age when he has the capacity to affirm or disaffirm the deed at his election, or the infant may, by his guardian or next friend procure the appointment of a receiver for the purpose of collecting the rents and profits of the premises. Mathewson v. Johnson, Hoff. Ch. 560; Boyl v. Mix, 17 Wend. 132; 1 Washb. Real Prop. *306; Edgerton v. Wolf, 6 Gray, 453; Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508.

The right of entry was a present existing right in petitioner at the time the petition in intervention was filed. In this respect the case is dissimilar from the case of Chandler v. Aqueduct Corp., supra. The filing of the petition should have been taken as an election on the part of plaintiff in error to assert such right. And, under the statute, it should have been "fully considered and determined," and it was error to enter final judgment awarding the fund to the defendant, while the plea of intervenor was undisposed of. As we have seen, courts should be vigilant in protecting the rights of minors; and, if the court below had been of the opinion that it was necessary for plaintiff in error to resort to an equitable action to enforce her rights, it should have preserved the fund until her rights could have been adjudicated in such action. But we cannot think such an action necessary. Ample power seems to have been given the court in the condemnation proceedings, and the fact that she was still a minor at the time of the trial did not justify the court in passing over her petition in silence, and awarding the entire fund to defendant in error. The judgment directing the fund to be paid to defendant in error, is accordingly reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed in accordance with the views expressed in the opinion. Under our statute, plaintiff in error reached her majority a few months after the trial in the district court. Jackson v. Allen, 4 Colo. 263. The disabilities under which she was laboring at the time of the trial no longer existing, we apprehend the court below will find no difficulty in fully determining the rights of the parties. Reversed.

ROLLINS et al. v. BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS.

DECLARATIONS AND ADMISSIONS—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONSPIRACY—TRIAL BY COURT—ULTRA VIRES—APPEAL.

1. Where public officials are charged in a civil action with a fraudulent conspiracy against the rights and interests of the people, the court is justifiable in its discretion in allowing one of the defendants to be interrogated by leading questions, and even cross-examined by the party calling him; such witness being a party to the record, his previous declarations relating to matters in issue, if otherwise competent, may be proved against him independent of the question whether a party may impeach his own witness.

2. The rule that contemporaneous parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument is limited in its application to the language of the instrument, and does not exclude the light of extrinsic circumstances; and the instrument itself, being attacked on the ground of fraud, is not, while that issue is undetermined, the best evidence of the actual contract.

3. The declarations of a defendant are not admissible in evidence against his co-defendants under a charge of conspiracy until there be prima facie proof of the existence of the alleged conspiracy; but a concert of action between the defendants in the unlawful enterprise as charged being shown to the satisfaction of the trial court, the acts and declarations of each conspirator in furtherance of the unlawful object may be given in evidence against all the co-conspirators.

4. When the trial is to the court, it is presumed that the court is governed by proper rules of law in considering the testimony, unless by asking for a declaration of the law in the nature of an instruction the contrary is made to appear.

5. Parties having obtained money belonging to the county cannot justify their use of it by pleading that they acted by the authority of the county commissioners, and then refuse to account for it on the ground that the commissioners could not lawfully give them such authority. A contract entered into by the agents of a corporation, without authority, may not be enforced against the corporation so long as the contract remains executory; nevertheless, the other contracting party, being sui juris, and having reaped the benefit of the execution of such contract without interference, cannot plead the agents' want of authority to enter into the contract as a defense to relieve himself from accounting to the corporation ex aequo et bono.

6. Where cases have been decided upon oral testimony in the trial court, it is not the province of this court upon appeal to decide mere questions of fact, but only questions of law, nor to determine the result of the evidence, but only its legal tendency. Where there is conflicting evidence, this court will not undertake to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses, nor to consider and weigh the evidence. If, upon a review of the record, it appears that the case was fairly tried, that the rules of evidence were substantially observed, that the evidence tends to sustain the findings, and that the findings support the complaint, this court cannot properly disturb the judgment.

Teller & Orahood and G. Q. Richmond, for appellants. John M. Waldron and John W. Sleeper, for appellees.

ELLIOTT, J. This was an action by the board of commissioners of Pueblo county, plaintiffs, against Edward W. Rollins, Frank C. Young, Ludwig Kramer, and John S. Thompson, defendants. Kramer and Thompson were former commissioners of the county, and Rollins and Young were brokers, through whom certain United States government bonds belonging to the county were disposed of, and from whom certain railway aid bonds outstanding against the county were obtained by the county for cancellation. The complaint contains two causes of action: The first is an ordinary count for money had and received by defendants to the use of plaintiffs; the second charges that Kramer and Thompson entered into a conspiracy with Rollins and Young to defraud the county in the disposal of the government bonds and the purchase of the railway bonds. Upon issues joined, the cause was by consent of parties tried by the court without a jury. The finding of the court was in favor of all the defendants upon the first cause of action. Upon the second cause of action, the finding was also in favor of the defendants Kramer and Thompson, but was against the defendants Rollins and Young. Judgment was rendered according to the findings. The defendants Rollins and Young bring this appeal, assigning numerous errors. The plaintiffs also appeal and assign cross-errors, as provided by the act of 1885. Under plaintiffs' assignment the review by this court is limited to the inquiry whether or not the evidence tends to sustain the findings of the court. After careful consideration of the evidence, and making due allowance for the superior advantages enjoyed by the trial court in hearing the oral testimony, and observing the living witnesses, we cannot say there was any fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendants Kramer and Thompson, or that either of them appropriated any of the county funds to their own use, or that they intentionally permitted or suffered their co-defendants so to do. Therefore, the judgment, as to the defendants Kramer and Thompson, is affirmed.

Before considering the assignment of errors interposed by the defendants Rollins and Young, it will be convenient to notice further the nature and effect of the findings and judgment of the court: First. The findings practically eliminate from the case all charges of conspiracy against the several defendants, and exonerate Kramer and Thompson from the charge of having appropriated any of the county funds to their own use. Second. The findings, however, show that Rollins and Young were the agents for Pueblo county in the purchase of the railway bonds, and that, in their final accounting concerning the same, they overcharged the county; and, to the extent of such overcharge, judgment is rendered against them. It is manifest from the evidence that the court based its findings concerning the overcharge, not on any conspiracy or collusion between the several defendants in the accounting, but on the ground that the terms of the contract were not construed as favorably to the county as the law requires under the circumstances. On the part of Rollins and Young it is claimed that they were not agents of the county in the purchase of the railway bonds, but that they were acting under a contract with the county to furnish a certain amount of the bonds at a stipulated price, and that they were entitled to receive such stipulated price without regard to what they may have paid for the bonds. In support of this claim, they rely upon a certain letter received by them from Kramer and Thompson as follows: "Pueblo, Colorado, Nov. 30, 1881. Mess. Rollins & Young, Denver, Colorado: You are hereby authorized and directed to buy for the county commissioners of Pueblo county, one hundred thousand dollars Pueblo county railroad aid bonds, at ninety per cent. of face and accrued interest, and sixty thousand dollars at ninety-five per cent. of face and accrued interest, Denver delivery. If, by the purchase of these bonds, the dismissal of the Stebbins suit is accomplished, we will pay you two per cent. commission on the entire purchase, in addition to the above figures. J. S. THOMPSON, LUDWIG KRAMER, Commissioners of Pueblo County." The special assignments of error in behalf of defendants are to the effect that the court erred in admitting the testimony of certain witnesses as to what Kramer and Thompson, or one of them, had told said witnesses respectively in regard to their contract with Rollins and Young; and also in admitting statements of the co-defendants in the case when it was shown that there was no conspiracy between the said defendants. The reasons stated in support of the objections to such testimony on the trial were to the effect that the letter of November 30, 1881, as above set forth, was the best evidence of the terms of the contract, and that what the defendants had said about the terms of the contract was immaterial and hearsay; that there being no proof of the alleged conspiracy the admissions of one defendant could not be interposed against another. The defendant Thompson, being sworn and examined as a witness for plaintiff, was asked if he had not made certain statements, at certain times and places, in the presence of certain parties, as to the terms of the contract with the defendants Rollins and Young, different from what he had already testified and contrary to the terms as claimed by defendants. This question was objected to on the ground that the witness had already sworn that there was no such contract as the question implied, and that plaintiff should not be permitted to impeach his own witness; that whatever admission he might have made against his co-defendants Rollins and Young, there was no proof of a conspiracy, and that the admissions of parties in the situation of defendants are not competent as evidence one against the other, inasmuch as the actions of one are not binding upon the other. The objection was overruled, and exception taken. The answer of the witness not being satisfactory to plaintiffs, they were permitted, against the objections of defendants, to show his declarations by other witnesses in respect to the matters inquired about. Exceptions were duly reserved.

In determining whether or not the testimony objected to was admissible, the character and terms of the instrument relied on by defendants as evidence of their contract with the commissioners of the county must be considered; also the nature of the action, the relation of the parties thereto, and the status of the proof at the time of the objection, must be borne in mind. The instrument does not purport to be a complete contract. Upon its face it is a mere letter of authority containing promise of compensation in a certain contingency. It is unilateral in form and substance, binding only to the extent of its execution, and to some extent difficult of comprehension without the aid of external evidence. Hence, in order to arrive at a construction which will give effect to the intention of the parties in executing the same, not only its language, but all extrinsic circumstances relating to the subject-matter thereof, and to the situation and condition of the parties therein mentioned, as well as the conduct and dealings of the parties in reference thereto, were proper subjects of investigation. Thompson and Kramer were parties defendant. The complaint charged them with conspiring with their co-defendants Rollins and Young to defraud the county. They had occupied positions of trust and confidence as the official agents of the county. The plaintiffs were their successors in office, and were complaining that defendants had been guilty of a fraudulent conspiracy against the rights and interests of their constituents,—the people. Under these circumstances, the most thorough investigation, and the largest latitude of inquiry consistent with the rules of evidence, and the discretion of the court, was allowable. It was a ju-icious exercise of such discretion to permit the witness Thompson to be interrogated by leading questions, and even cross-examined by the party calling him; and, as the witness was a party to the record, his declarations relating to the matters in issue, if otherwise competent, might be proved by other witnesses, independent of the question whether plaintiffs might impeach their own witness.

The evidence had disclosed dealings between the defendants covering a period of more than six months, and involving the disposal of government bonds belonging to the county amounting to more than a quarter of a million dollars, and the investment of the proceeds thereof in the purchase for cancellation of nearly $200,000 of railway bonds against the county. These transactions between the defendants Kramer and Thompson, of the one part, and Rollins and Young, of the other, had been carried on with the utmost secrecy. The minutes of the proceedings by the commissioners in reference thereto had been privately kept in a separate book, other than the regular record, inaccessible to those not in the official confidence of the commissioners, with the view that nothing whatever of their bond transactions should be disclosed to the public. Correspondence between the defendants relating to these affairs was arranged to be carried on by means of cipher messages. It was also arranged that telegraphic dispatches should be sent by the commissioners to Rollins and Young in the name of a third party in Denver, so as not to attract attention at Pueblo; and secret meetings were arranged between the parties for a like purpose. It was at this stage of the trial, and after the admission of evidence showing the foregoing state of facts, that the court permitted the defendant Thompson and the other witnesses to be interrogated as above stated. We recognize the rule which excludes the admission of mere contemporaneous parol evidence to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument. But the rule is limited in its application to the language of the instrument, and does not exclude the light of extrinsic circumstances. Moreover, in a case of this kind the rule does not have its usual application; the instrument itself being attacked on the ground of fraud could not, while that issue was undetermined, be considered the best evidence of the actual contract.

We also recognize the rule that the declarations of a defendant are not admissible in evidence against his co-defendants under a charge of conspiracy until there be prima facie proof of the existence of the alleged conspiracy. But a concert of action between the defendants in the unlawful enterprise as charged being shown to the satisfaction of the trial court, the acts and declarations of each conspirator in furtherance of the unlawful object may be given in evidence against all the co-conspirators. The trial judge evidently had this rule in mind when he ruled upon defendants' objections to the testimony, as follows: "You may introduce it [the evidence] at this time as against these two defendants, and it may be considered, if necessary, as introduced against them all if it should become material." Under the circumstances the ruling was not erroneous. It is true, when the whole case had been heard, all the suspicious, and apparently damaging, circumstances against Kramer and Thompson were satisfactorily explained; and their manner of transacting the county business, as well as their mode of dealing with Rollins and Young, were shown not only not to have been fraudulent, but to have been dictated by business sagacity, and intended to subserve the financial interests of the county. It was developed by the trial that prior to 1881 the county was too poor to pay its railway bonds; payment of interest thereon had been refused, and the legality of the bonds had been denied by the county authorities. In consequence of this the bonds had become very much depreciated in the market. Some of the bondholders had brought suit against the county, and obtained judgment in their favor; and when the negotiations between the defendants commenced, that suit was pending on appeal in the United States supreme court, and an early decision was anticipated. With the year 1881, the finances of the county had materially improved; the assessed valuation of the property within its limits had more than doubled; and it had realized a large sum of money from the sale of its railway stock which was invested in the government securities heretofore mentioned. Under these circumstances, the defendants Thompson and Kramer, believing the county would ultimately be obliged to pay the railway bonds, resolved to secure as many of them as possible for cancellation while they were at a discount. To do this, they must act before the judgment against the county should be affirmed. To have met openly as a board of commissioners, and announced this policy by public resolution, or otherwise, would have been to defeat their object by causing the bonds to advance to par, and perhaps to a premium. Hence the special private record was kept, and great precautions were taken to keep secret their dealings with Rollins and Young in regard to the bond transactions. When at the close of the trial, the court by its findings exonerated the defendants Kramer and Thompson from the charge of conspiracy, and from all liability, we must presume that the court excluded from its consideration the testimony relating to their mere oral declarations about the terms of the contract with Rollins and Young, and that the finding as to the liability of the latter defendants was based upon other evidence. If defendants' counsel had desired, they might have submitted a request for a declaration of the law upon this point, in the nature of an instruction, notwithstanding the trial was to the court, and thus have preserved in the record the ruling of the court upon such legal question. Not having done this, the presumption is that the court was governed by proper rules of law in arriving at its findings of fact. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§, 110, 111, 275-286; 2 Whart. Ev. c. 12; Id. c. 13, § 1205; Mining Co. v. Tierney, 5 Colo. 82; Railway Co. v. Taylor, 6

Colo. 1; McPhee v. Young, 13 Colo. 80, 21 Pac. Rep. 1014; Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 515, 22 Pac. Rep. 817, and cases there cited; Wilson v. Marlow, 66 Ill. 385.

It is further contended by defendants that the court erred in rendering any judgment whatever upon the complaint, since the evidence failed to sustain the first cause of action, or to show any conspiracy between the parties, as charged in the second. The second cause of action as pleaded, though containing charges of fraud and conspiracy against all the defendants, nevertheless charges, in substance, that Rollins and Young, as agents of the county, agreed to purchase the railway bonds at the lowest price for which they could be obtained in the market, and deliver the same to the county for cancellation at the purchase price for the compensation or commission of 2 per cent. on the amount of the purchase; but that in their settlement with the county they made overcharges on the purchase price in a sum greatly exceeding the amount found by the court. Hence, excluding the first cause of action, and the charges of fraud and conspiracy in the second, which may be regarded as surplusage, and the complaint still contains sufficient averments in substance upon which to base the findings and judgment against the defendants Rollins and Young.

The remaining assignments of error interposed by defendants may be considered together. In substance, like the assignments in behalf of plaintiffs, they are general, merely calling in question the sufficiency of the evidence under the law to sustain the findings of the court. The general character of the letter of November 30, 1881, under which Rollins and Young claim to have acted in the purchase and delivery of the railway bonds, has already been noticed. It now becomes necessary to make a further and closer examination of the instrument, and first of its language. It will be observed that, at the commencement the letter, both in form and express terms, is an authority and direction to the defendants Rollins and Young to buy railway bonds "for the county commissioners of Pueblo county." This language certainly does not indicate a contract, nor an offer by the commissioners to buy bonds of or from said defendants; it denotes rather an employment of them to act for and in behalf of the county in the purchase of bonds. The next paragraph of the letter contemplates the dismissal of a certain lawsuit through the agency of Rollins and Young, and seems to make their "commission" as agents dependent upon securing such dismissal. The words at the close of the instrument, "in addition to the above figures," are the only ones which occasion serious trouble in the construction. These words unquestionably tend to show that, for certain bonds at least, Rollins and Young were to receive the price stated in the letter. Excluding mere parol statements and the testimony of parties as to their understanding of the agreement, which, for the purpose of construing the writing, are not regarded as competent, and looking to its subject-matter in the light of the extrinsic circumstances and the actual dealings of the parties in carrying on the business mentioned, as disclosed by their correspondence, and other competent evidence, and what do we find? The subject-matter has been already pretty fully explained. The Stebbins suit was one brought against the county on account of non-payment of some of the railway bonds. This suit was controlled by Rollins, one of the defendants. In order to carry out the policy of securing the railway bonds at a discount, it was necessary that an appearance of resistance to this suit should be kept up as a means of preventing a rise in the market price of the railway bonds while they were being purchased, and so, though apparently a hostile suit, it was really held by Rollins for the benefit of the county. The whole claim in suit was ultimately discharged by payment at par, though, by request of the commissioners, it was not paid till after the bond transactions were closed. That it was the commissioners, and not Rollins and Young, who were mainly interested in having the suit remain pending during this period, is apparent from the fact that they voluntarily paid interest on the claim for a long period of time, while the money for its payment was in the hands of those who were to procure its dismissal. If Rollins and Young were mainly interested in keeping the suit pending as a means of preventing a rise in the railway bond market, it is improbable that the commissioners would have consented that the interest should thus accumulate against the county. The evidence shows that Rollins and Young owned or controlled about $60,000 of the railway bonds outstanding against the county at the time of entering into the contract with Kramer and Thompson. These were to be transferred to the county as a part of the transaction. Evidently they were not employed to purchase for the county the bonds which they already owned; for they could not be agents to purchase the very bonds which they had to sell. Therefore, as to their own bonds, their contention is correct, that it was immaterial what they had paid for them, and what profit they made by disposing of them to the commissioners; and so the trial court held. Thus we have an explanation of so much of the language of the letter of November 30, which seems to indicate that the relation between the parties was that of vendor and vendee, instead of principal and agent. It is a reasonable inference that "ninety-five per cent. of face and accrued interest" was the amount exacted by Rollins and Young for their own bonds; also, that they were to have 2 per cent. commission on the entire purchase, thus securing 97 per cent. for their own bonds, provided they should control the dismissal of the Stebbins suit as the commissioners desired. But as the county finally paid the whole claim in controversy in that suit, principal, interest, and costs, it is quite plain that the commission of $3,200 must rest upon some more substantial consideration than the mere services of defendants in accomplishing the dismissal of the suit. As before stated, the letter of November 30th is incomplete in itself. It may, therefore, be supplemented by other contemporaneous writings passing between the parties in the transaction of business under its provisions. The following letters and receipts by Rollins and Young were introduced in evidence. They tend strongly to confirm the theory of plaintiffs that, as to the railway bonds purchased by Rollins and Young from third parties in pursuance of their agreement, they were acting as the agents of the county; that they relied upon the county to provide the funds with which to make the purchases; and also that the county was interested in the prices which they should pay. Letter of December 14, 1881, as follows: "Hon. J. S. Thompson, Chairman Board Co. Commissioners, Pueblo, Colorado.—Dear Sir: We inclose statement of sale of $60,000 U. S. 4 per cent. reg. bonds made to Fisk & Hatch by A. Wilkins, No. 46 Exchange Place, New York, for William J. Quinlan, Junr., cashier Chemical Nat. Bank. The bonds being sold for account, Rollins and Young, Denver, Colorado, as per order of county of Pueblo, Colo. Net proceeds of same $76,256.25, which amount we place to your credit on our books. Yours, truly, ROLLINS & YOUNG." Letter of April 1, 1882, reads as follows: "J. S. Thompson, Esq., Chairman C. C. Com.—Dear Sir: Since you were here we have taken in some $4,000 coupons, $4,000 bonds at $1.07 to $1.10 flat, $20,000 suit bonds at 88 to 90, though the latter are not all delivered, but will be on Tuesday. This will clean us out of funds, and we shall have nothing to tackle Barth with. We think you had better send us by express, at once, about $40,000 U. S. fours, or else have some one come up, and we can deliver everything we have in shape. We have not received copy of Poppleton assignment. Yours, truly, ROLLINS & YOUNG." Receipt offered and received, as follows: "Received, Pueblo, Colorado, April 5th, 1882, of the board of county commissioners of Pueblo county, Colorado, one United States registered four-per-cent bond of 1907, numbered 1,692, of the face value of fifty thousand ($50,000) dollars, assigned for sale to the Chemical National Bank of the city of New York, by resolution of the said board of county commissioners, the proceeds of which said bond, when sold, are to be placed to our credit with the said Chemical National Bank, and also to be credited on our books to the county of Pueblo, we agreeing to furnish to the said county of Pueblo the original statement of sale of the aforesaid registered bond, as handed us by the said Chemical National Bank; the proceeds of said bond to be used by us in the purchase of certain bonds of Pueblo county as authorized and instructed by said board of county commissioners under date of November 30, A. D. 1881. ROLLINS & YOUNG, Z." Also paper not signed, but in handwriting of defendant Young, which reads as follows, dated May 27, 1882: "For and in consideration of the assignment to E. W. Rollins, as trustee of the county of Pueblo, and a certain judgment in favor of William R. Stebbins, and against the county of Pueblo, obtained from U. S. court, December term, 1879, for principal, $7,282.33, we hereby authorize and instruct said Rollins to apply so much of the funds now standing in the bank to the credit of Pueblo county as may be necessary to pay said judgment in full and costs, and said amt of judgment, $7,282.33, interest, $2,124, costs, $36.15, and to charge the said amount to the account of Pueblo county, on their books; and we further authorize said Rollins and Young to charge to the account of Pueblo county $3,812.50, as a payment in full of commissions due them for purchase of bonds, coupons, and judgment for account of Pueblo county, as per contract with them in November, 1879, [1881,] and also to reimburse them for moneys refunded to various persons for legal services and expenses incurred in connection with judgments of the said Stebbins and other parties against Pueblo county on unpaid coupons." It is unnecessary to comment further upon these letters and receipts. Their significance is unmistakable; and there are still others of similar tenor. We turn now to such further oral evidence as we deem admissible and competent in connection with the writings for the purpose of construing the terms of the contract. A distinction is to be observed between mere naked declarations of the parties as to what the terms of the contract were and evidence of what they did in conducting the business in pursuance thereof. The former, when mere hearsay, or matter of opinion, are not admissible. The latter may always be resorted to in connection with other competent evidence, when the meaning of the written instrument is doubtful.

There was evidence tending to show that, in the transfer of the railway bonds by Rollins and Young to the commissioners, the prices of 90 and 95 per cent. of face and accrued interest were not uniformly observed. The defendant Thompson testified that the prices varied; that some of the bonds were charged to the county at prices other than those stated in the letter,—some more, some less, some as low as 88 per cent., and some in excess of 95; that "the bulk of the bonds that were turned in were delivered at prices which were neither ninety nor ninety-five cents," but he thought the average was about the same as specified in the letter, though, "in excess of the true average, * * * an infinitesimal fraction." It is difficult to comprehend why in the accounting there should have been any departure from the prices stated in the letter, if the statement in the letter indicated absolute and unconditional contract prices to be paid by the commissioners to the defendants for the bonds, instead of maximum limits to be paid by defendants, as agents "authorized and directed to buy for the county commissioners." To charge less than the contract price was a course of dealing entirely inconsistent with the interest of defendants, if in fact they were acting under a contract to furnish bonds to the county at stipulated prices; but was perfectly consistent with their duty and obligation as agents furnished with money to buy bonds for the county at as low a price as possible. It was also inconsistent with the contract theory for the commissioners to consent to any charge in excess of 95 per cent. Rollins and Young both testified that, in addition to what they may have made upon the bonds which they themselves previously owned or controlled, they made a profit of about $4,000 on the further amount procured by them and transferred to the county. It was upon this sum that the court based its finding. Kramer and Thompson testified that they did not know of this profit being made; hence the claim that the present plaintiffs cannot recover because their predecessors before the commencement of this action made a voluntary settlement in good faith upon the terms of the contract, as construed by defendants, is not well taken. The allowance to defendants of several hundred dollars on account of their extra trouble, and fees paid to attorneys, in addition to their full commission of 2 per cent. on the $160,000 purchase, whether warranted or not, having been knowingly and voluntarily allowed by the commissioners in the final settlement, was not included in the findings of the court against defendants; but such extra allowance strongly confirms the theory that defendants were regarded and treated as agents, and not as contractors, throughout the transaction, except as to the bonds they originally owned.

It is urged in argument that while the board of commissioners could and did employ defendants as brokers or bankers to convert the government bonds into cash, and while defendants could and did use that money to purchase outstanding railway bonds, yet the board could not employ agents to purchase the railway bonds, because they themselves being the agents of the county must exercise their own discretion and judgment in such matters, and could not delegate the same to others. Delegata potestas non potest delegari. Without questioning the proposition thus advanced as a general rule, it is clearly inapplicable to the circumstances of this case. In the first place, Rollins and Young could not lawfully use the money of the county in the purchase of railway bonds without authority from the county so to do. In the next place, their discretion and judgment were substantially controlled by the terms of their agreement as we have indicated; and in any event, whether as agents or contractors, they were bound to pursue the terms of their agreement such as they were, and to account concerning their actings and doings in the premises in accordance with such terms. Hence, in determining this litigation, the real terms of such agreement must be ascertained from the evidence as questions of fact. That the foregoing argument has some weight in the determination of such questions of fact may be admitted; but we cannot concede that it has a controlling effect as a matter of law. It would be a strange doctrine if the defendants, having obtained the money of the county, could justify their use of it by pleading that they acted by the authority of the commissioners, and then refuse to account for it on the ground that the commissioners could not lawfully give them such authority. The doctrine of ultra vires cannot be made to subserve such purposes. While a contract, entered into by the agents of a corporation without authority, may not be enforced against the corporation so long as the contract remains executory, nevertheless, the other contracting party, being sui juris, and having reaped the benefit of the execution of such contract without interference, certainly cannot plead the agents' want of authority to enter into the contract as a defense to relieve himself from accounting to the corporation ex æquo et bono. Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, p. 42; also Id. (2d Amer. Ed.) p. 729, note a; Ang. & A. Corp. § 256; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) § 96; Insurance Co. v. McClelland, 9 Colo. 11, 9 Pac. Rep. 771; Scollay v. County of Butte, 67 Cal. 249, 7 Pac. Rep. 661; Gold Mining Co. v. Bank, 96 U. S. 640.

No principle of law or justice has been advanced why defendants should not be bound by the terms of their employment. The difficult question in the controversy has been to determine from competent evidence what were the real terms of their undertaking. But it is unnecessary in this opinion to further consider the bearing of the evidence. It is not the province of this court upon appeal in cases of this kind to decide mere questions of fact, but only questions of law, so far as they are raised by appropriate assignments of error. To do this we need not determine the result of the evidence, but only its legal tendency. That there was much conflict in the evidence must be admitted; but it is not for this court to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses, nor to consider and weigh the evidence with the view to substitute its own judgment for that of the trial court. It would not be sufficient ground for reversal that the findings of fact by the court below do not correspond with the views of this tribunal. If, upon a review of the record, it is found that the case was fairly tried, that the rules of evidence were substantially observed when challenged by the respective parties, that the evidence tends to sustain the findings, and that the findings support the complaint, this court cannot properly disturb the judgment. Finding no substantial error of law in the record, the judgment of the district court must be affirmed.

COLORADO IRON-WORKS v. SIERRA GRANDE MIN. CO.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—DOING BUSINESS WITHIN STATE—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

1. A single purchase of machinery within the state by a foreign mining corporation, to be transported to and set up in the state of its domicile, is not within the inhibition of Gen. St. Colo. § 260, which prohibits foreign corporations from doing business within the state until they have filed with the secretary of state a certificate designating their principal place of business within the state, and appointing an agent upon whom process may be served.

2. But the purchase of the machinery by the foreign corporation is a sufficient doing of business in the state to render it amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts of the state, so far as the enforcement of the purchase price is concerned, if jurisdiction can be obtained as provided by the laws of the state.

3. One who gratuitously transfers his stock in a foreign corporation to trustees, whose names he does not know, for some unknown and undefined purpose, and at the same time contributes $50 to cover the expense of the transfer, is still a stockholder in such foreign corporation, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Colo. § 40, which authorizes the service of process on a foreign corporation by a delivery of the writ to a stockholder, when it has no agent or officer within the state.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Arapahoe county.

The appellant, plaintiff below, is a domestic corporation doing business in the city of Denver; the appellee is a foreign corporation organized under the laws of, and engaged in mining in, the territory of New Mexico. In August, 1885, the two corporations entered into a written contract by which appellant was to manufacture, furnish, and erect at the mines of appellee in New Mexico, certain machinery and appliances for the reduction of ores, for $39,260. The contract was made by the general manager or agent of appellee in its behalf, and was to become operative upon its receiving the signature of the president. Payments were to be made,—$10,000 upon the signing of the contract by the president; $15,000 upon the shipment by appellant of the heavy machinery; $5,000 when the work was completed, and the balance when the work was accepted by a committee, within 30 days after its completion. As far as is shown by the record, the contract was fully performed by appellant and the work accepted by appellee. It is alleged in the complaint that appellant furnished extra supplies and labor, to the amount of $3,340. It is admitted that certain payments were made, and alleges the balance remaining unpaid to have been $11,987.97. It is also alleged that a settlement was had at the city of Denver on the 25th of February, 1886; that the balance found due and agreed upon was as above stated, viz., $11,987.97. On the 13th of November, 1886, this suit was brought to recover such balance, with interest from the alleged date of settlement. Summons was issued, which was returned with the following indorsement: "State of Colorado, Arapahoe county—ss.: I do hereby certify that I have duly executed the within summons on this 13th day of November, A. D. 1886, by delivering a true copy of the same to Samuel Alsop, a stockholder of the within-named defendant, the Sierra Grande Mining Company, personally, at the city of Denver, in the county of Arapahoe, and state of Colorado. I further certify that said corporation keeps no principal office in any county in the state of Colorado, and there is no county in which the principal business of said corporation is carried on, and that no president, or other head of said corporation, or vice-president, secretary, treasurer, cashier, general agent, general superintendent, or agent thereof, could then be found, or was then or can now be found, or is now in the county of Arapahoe, state of Colorado, but each and every officer was then, and is now, absent from said county; and I further certify that, at the same time and place, I delivered to said Alsop a copy of the complaint herein. FREDERICK CRAMER, Sheriff. By J. M. CHIVINGTON, Under Sheriff." On the 22d of November, the following motion was filed by counsel of appellee: "Now comes the defendant, the Sierra Grande Mining Company, by its attorney, R. H. Gilmore, and appears specially for this purpose, and no other, and moves the court that the summons herein be quashed, on the ground that it appears upon the return thereon, and on the face of the complaint served therewith, that defendant is a foreign corporation, not doing business within the state of Colorado, and that the said summons was not served upon the proper person, as prescribed by law." On the 9th of December, appellee, by its counsel, presented the following paper: "Making special appearance, and moves the court that the summons and the return thereon be quashed, and that defendant be not compelled to answer the complaint, on the ground that this court has no jurisdiction of person of defendant; states that defendant is a foreign corporation, organized and incorporated under the laws of New Mexico, and not elsewhere; that no summons has been served on it in this state, or elsewhere; that, at the time of pretended commencement of this action, or at any time previous thereto, or since, it was not and is not doing business in this state, and that it has no principal or other office in any county in this state, nor had it at the time of commencement of this action, nor at such times had it any principal or other place of business or of doing business in this state; nor had it at the time of pretended commencement of this action, or before or since, residing in this state, or having any office or place of business in this state, any president, secretary, treasurer, cashier, general agent, general superintendent, or agent, or any other representative, stockholder, or other person, who in any manner represented it, or who was by it authorized to receive service of summons or other processes in this state; and further that said Samuel Alsop, Jr., did not at the time of the service of the summons in this action, nor did he at any time before or since, represent the defendant in any capacity whatever, official or otherwise, in the state of Colorado, or elsewhere; nor was he at such time or times in this state in any official character or capacity as an agent, officer, or representative of defendant; nor was he doing at such time or times any business for said company in this state, or elsewhere; nor was he authorized to do any business for the defendant, or to represent it as an officer or agent, or to receive service of summons or other process. And further, said Alsop was not at the time of said service, a stockholder, officer, agent, or representative of defendant. THE SIERRA GRANDE MINING COMPANY OF NEW MEXICO. By R. H. GILMORE, Its Attorney. Verified by R. H. Gilmore, as attorney." On January 4, 1887, a hearing was had upon the motion of appellee of November 22d, when the following proceedings were had, and order entered: "The defendant, by its attorney, R. H. Gilmore, Esq., who appears specially only in this action, asks leave to have its motion to quash the summons and return in this case, which was filed on December 9, 1886, to stand in lieu of its former motion for a similar purpose, served upon the plaintiff on the twenty-second day of November, 1886, and which is now, by direction of the court, upon plaintiff's request filed herein as of said twenty-second day of November, 1886, and it is accordingly so ordered without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to object to such substitution, or to any advantage which plaintiff may have been given by the service of said former motion." On the 7th of January, counsel of appellant filed a motion to strike from the files appellee's motion of December 9th, for the following reasons: "That the defendant had already, before that date, served on plaintiff herein a motion to quash the summons, which was by the court ordered filed as of November 22, 1886, and that defendant had already appeared in said action and waives all the matters set forth in said motion, and said motion was not filed in apt time, and moving for judgment as for want of an answer." On January 27th, counsel of appellee moved the court for leave to withdraw its motion ordered to be filed as of November 22d. On January 31st, an affidavit of Alsop that he was not a stockholder of appellee at the time of the service of the summons, also affidavits of Mellor, president, and Brosius, secretary, of appellee, made in Philadelphia, that Alsop was not a stockholder, were filed. A hearing was had upon the motion of appellant to strike appellee's motion of December 9th from the files, and appellee's motion for leave to withdraw the motion of November 22d. Both motions were denied, and the court ordered "that both the former and the latter motions, attacking the service of the summons herein, and the jurisdiction of the court over the person of the defendant, be allowed to stand as an answer or a motion in plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court over the person of the defendant, and that the plaintiff have leave to reply to said motions of the defendant as it shall be advised in twenty days from this date." Appellant excepted to the judgment of the court in denying the motion to strike the motion from the files. On February 18, 1887, appellant replied as follows to appellee's answers or motions for pleas in abatement: "Now comes the plaintiff in the above-entitled action, and makes this, its replication, to the motions of the defendants, heretofore ordered by the court to be taken as a plea in abatement or answer herein, and alleges the issuance of summons and service and returns thereof setting out the returns in full; denies that defendant was not at any time previous to the commencement of this action doing business in this state, but, on the contrary, alleges that said defendant did, prior to the commencement of this action, enter this state and do business therein, and submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, and on the 31st day of August, 1885, in the city of Denver, in the county of Arapahoe, and state of Colorado, enter into the written contract set out in the complaint herein and upon which this action is brought; alleges that nearly all the machinery called for by said contract was to be manufactured by said plaintiff at said city of Denver, as was well known to said defendant when said contract was entered into, and was so manufactured; that all the moneys that were to become due and payable under said contract were to become due and payable at said city of Denver, and the cause of action in said contract arose within the state of Colorado, and that the goods, wares, and merchandise, alleged in the second cause of action to have been sold and delivered, were sold by plaintiff to defendant at the city of Denver, state of Colorado, and were to be paid for at said city; and that the second cause of action arose in the city of Denver, and that the accounting alleged in the third cause of action was had and said cause of action arose in said city; that as to whether or not, at the time of the commencement of this action, or since, the defendant was not or is not now doing business in said state, this defendant has not and cannot obtain sufficient knowledge or information on which to base a belief, except as hereinbefore stated, and alleges that, by reason of the matters and things done and performed in this state, in respect to which this suit is brought, the defendant is estopped from and will not be heard to say that it was not at the time of the commencement of this action doing business in the state of Colorado, and alleges that by reason of said matters and things in respect to which this suit is brought, defendant has submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state; and, without in any way or manner waiving any of the rights it has acquired by reason of the sheriff's return aforesaid, but insisting upon the conclusiveness of said return, alleges, on information and belief, that said Alsop was at the time of the service of summons and the complaint herein upon him a stockholder of the defendant company, and that November 13, 1886, a writ of summons was served on defendant, and this court has jurisdiction of the person of defendant; prays for judgment in accordance with prayer of complaint. Signed by Teller & Orahood, attorneys for plaintiff, and duly verified by H. M. Orahood as attorney." On July 5, 1887, the cause was heard on appellee's motion to quash the summons or return of service, and the motion sustained, and an appeal taken to this court.

REED, C., (after stating the facts as above.) The first and most important question to be determined is whether appellee could be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts of this state. It is contended that being a foreign corporation, it had not by its acts and dealings in this state submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the state courts, and that this cause could not be here tried and determined. There are two or three axiomatic principles applicable to corporations, so well understood, and generally recognized and conceded, that no authorities are necessary in their support. They are: First, that a corporation is in law for civil purposes deemed a person, may sue and be sued, contract and be contracted with, and do all other acts which a natural person could do, not ultra vires. Second, being an artificial person created by and deriving all its powers from its charter, it is local in its character, cannot migrate, can only, in a state or country foreign to that of its creation, make such contracts and do such business as is permitted by the laws of the state, and under such restrictions as may be imposed by its laws. We do not think section 260 of the General Statutes<sup>1</sup> of this state applicable to the case under discussion, nor that such a construction was intended or contemplated by the legislature. Corporations being, as above stated, confined in their business operations to the state from which they derive their existence, and being only allowed to exercise their functions in a foreign jurisdiction by the comity, and under the laws of that state, the intention of the section above referred to was to enable such corporations as moneyed institutions, insurance companies, and that class of corporations, perhaps not to migrate, but by means of agents to extend their business and allow such agencies to become domiciled and transact the business of the corporations under the parent office and original charter. True, in a limited and technical sense, almost any business transaction, no matter how trivial, made by a corporation, whether in its own or an adjacent state,—the buying of goods by a domestic mercantile corporation in New York for the purpose of sale and business here, or any transaction of that kind,—may be deemed the doing of business in New York. A sale and delivery of goods in Wyoming or Nebraska by a domestic corporation of this state might technically be termed doing business in those states; but such accidental or incidental transactions were not, in our view, contemplated by nor within the intention of the legislature in the section under consideration. Nor in this case can the purchase of machinery to be manufactured here, transported to, set up and operated in, New Mexico, nor the selling of ores mined and produced in New Mexico, and shipped here to a market, be regarded as doing business in this state, as contemplated in such section.

Nor do we deem it necessary that the acts of appellee should be construed to be doing business in this state, outside of the transaction in question, to render it in this case amenable to its courts, and subject to its laws. The rule is well settled that a corporation of one state may exercise its functions in another to any extent permitted by the other. No legislative permission is necessary to allow a foreign corporation to contract for and buy machinery or supplies necessary to the transaction of its business, nor is it necessary in order to allow a foreign corporation to sell its wares or manufactures to a citizen of this state. Any corporation may sell its products to a party doing business, and if in the purchase a debt be contracted, it can proceed to collect it in our courts. A foreign corporation can, as in this instance, buy of a domestic manufacturing corporation the same as a natural person, and contract a debt for the articles so bought. In order to invoke the aid of our own courts in the collection of such debt, it is not necessary for a citizen of this state to show that the debtor was doing business generally in this state, but that he is a debtor, that the debt is due and payable here; and the debtor, whether a natural or an artificial person, if brought by process within the jurisdiction, is amenable to our courts. Persons, including corporations, by contracting debts in a foreign jurisdiction, will be presumed to have assented to the laws in regard to the collection of debt. It is not, as is supposed in argument, of controlling importance where or when the original contract, out of which the indebtedness grew, was perfected and became operative, whether at Denver, New Mexico, or Philadelphia, where it was executed by the president of the appellee. The contract appears to have been fully executed by appellant, the work accepted, large partial payments made; all that remained was for appellee to pay the balance due,—an uncontradicted debt,—which by the proofs, and former course of dealing, was due and payable in Denver, and if not made specifically so became so by operation of law, no other place having been designated. The appellant, a citizen of this state, had a right to invoke the aid of its courts to collect his debt. A proper regard to the administration of justice, the interests of trade and commerce, and to the rights of citizens requires that the jurisdiction of courts be sustained, and not circumscribed, except by the necessity of law. In cases of this kind for collection of debts, as was well said in Railroad Co. v. Gallahue, 12 Grat. 655, which was cited with approval in Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. 65: "It would be a startling proposition if in all such cases citizens of Virginia, and others, should be denied all remedy in her courts for causes of action arising under contracts and acts entered into and done within her territory; and should be turned over to the courts and laws of a sister state to seek for redress." If such construction would prevail, it would in many instances work a denial of justice, and give the foreign corporation complete immunity from its contracts. That a corporation may be sued in a foreign jurisdiction is a well-settled, general principle, without regard to the manner in which jurisdiction may be obtained; which is a different question, and dependent upon statutes in most states.

In Bennington Iron Co. v. Rutherford, 18 N. J. Law, 158, it is said: "The existence of a foreign corporation is recognized in other states, and they have the capacity to sue and be sued out of their own states."

In Moulin v. Insurance Co., 24 N. J. Law, 244: "If they authorize their officers to transact business for them in another state, they thereby subject themselves to the jurisdiction, and become answerable to the laws of that state." In the same case, at page 233: "By the comity universally acknowledged in the states of this Union, * * * corporations may send their officers and agents into other states, transact their business, and make contracts there; and, in some instances, the laws of the states prescribe the mode and the terms upon which they may do so. I am not prepared to say that, if they choose to avail themselves of this privilege, natural justice will be violated by subjecting their officers and agents to the service of process on behalf of the corporation they represent; on the contrary, I think natural justice requires that they shall be subject to the action of the courts of the state whose comity they thus invoke. For the purposes of being sued, they ought in such cases to be regarded as voluntarily placing themselves in the situation of citizens of that state. Any natural person who goes into another state carries along with him all his personal liabilities; and there is quite as much reason that a corporation which chooses to open an office and transact its business, or to authorize contracts to be made, in another state, should be regarded as thereby voluntarily submitting itself to the action of the laws of that state, as well in reference to the mode of commencing suits against it as to the interpretation of the contracts so made."

And in Milk Co. v. Brandenburgh, 40 N. J. Law, 112: "Since the case of Moulin v. Insurance Co., 24 N. J. Law, 222, and 25 N. J. Law, 57, it must be regarded as the settled law of this court that, if a corporation makes a contract in a state other than that in which it was chartered, it thereby submits itself to the jurisdiction of such foreign sovereignty so far as to be liable to suit therein in regard to that contract, when summoned according to the laws of the state." See, also, Bank v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, and Day v. Bank, 13 Vt. 97, where the same general principles are recognized and asserted; and the same may be said of the courts of most of the states, and that in England the same jurisdiction is asserted over foreign corporations. See Newby v. Manufacturing Co., L. R. 7 Q. B. 293.

The question whether Alsop, upon whom service was had, was or was not, at the time of such service, a stockholder of appellee, is not one easy of solution. It is apparent from the record that his relations with the company were such that he very shortly after the service communicated the fact to the counsel of the company; and, on the 22d of November, when the first pleading was filed, it is claimed by appellee, and admitted of record, that counsel did not know he was not a stockholder. If he had at the time of service of process parted with his stock, and severed his connection with the company, it is not easy to understand why the fact was not stated. The first intimation of the fact appears in the pleading of December 9th. The affidavits introduced to establish the premises were unsatisfactory and evasive. They show that there had been a transfer on the books, and that no stock stood in his name. But the attempt to show why, and for what purpose, it was transferred to trustees, and for what purpose the trust was created, signally failed, and casts great suspicion on the transaction. The case as made is one where a stockholder holding stock that cost over $500 gratuitously transfers it to trustees, whose names even he does not know, for some unknown and undefined purpose, and at the same time contributes $50 in money. There is a marked discrepancy in one respect between the affidavit of Mellor, president of appellee, and the testimony of Alsop. Mellor states the stock "was transferred for value." Alsop testified that there was no consideration, and says: "There was a request in this circular that those who should transfer their stock to the trustees should make a payment of 10 cents a share for expenses, and I inclosed my check for 10 cents on five hundred shares,—$50." In order to establish the fact pleaded, the testimony should have fairly and unequivocally shown that he had, in good faith, divested himself entirely of all ownership and interest, and severed all connection with the company. A transfer in name upon the books might be no evidence of a change of ownership. It might be collusive, or made for convenience to allow another as agent to represent it. The burden of showing that he was not a stockholder was upon appellee, and he should have established the fact affirmatively, by clear and conclusive testimony, of a change of ownership. The testimony failed to establish it. Counsel for appellant regard the question as settled by the trial court that Alsop was a stockholder; counsel for appellee regard it as having been left undetermined. We are, after reading the opinion of the trial court, in doubt as to how the question was determined in that court, but are clearly of the opinion that appellee failed in proof to establish the allegation in his plea or motion, and that Alsop must be regarded as having been a stockholder at the time of the service of process. Section 40 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "If the suit be against a foreign corporation, or a non-resident joint-stock company or association doing business within this state, service shall be made by delivering a copy of the writ to an agent, cashier, or secretary thereof; in the absence of such agent, cashier, treasurer, or secretary, to any stockholder." We conclude, therefore, that the contracting of the debt in question was a sufficient doing business within this state to render the corporation amenable to the courts of this state, if jurisdiction could be obtained by service of process as provided in section 40 of the Code. We cannot agree with counsel of appellee that the district courts of this state are courts of limited jurisdiction, and that their jurisdiction over foreign corporations is dependent upon the voluntary acts of such corporations in placing themselves under such jurisdiction by complying with the requirements of section 260, Gen. St. They are courts of general jurisdiction, but depending, in obtaining such jurisdiction over corporations, upon the statute in so far as the statute departs from the common law in providing in what manner service can be had. We also conclude that Alsop, at the time of service, was a stockholder, and that the service upon him brought the appellee within the jurisdiction of that court, and that the court erred in sustaining the motions or pleas in abatement of the action. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

BISSELL and RICHMOND, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment below is reversed.

APPOINTMENT OF ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATOR.

Under Code Wash. T. 1881, § 1444, providing that the administrator shall be entitled to the immediate possession of all real estate, and may receive the rents and profits thereof, until the estate shall be settled, or delivered over by order of the probate court to the heirs or devisees, administration of the real estate of one deceased in another state is necessary, and the appointment of an administrator by the probate court of the county where the land lies, upon a petition setting out the death of decedent in another state, the probate of his will there, that there was no personal property in Washington belonging to the estate, and that there were no debts to the knowledge of the petitioner, is valid. Distilling Territory v. Klee, 28 Pac. Rep. 417.

Appeal from superior court, King county; I. J. LICHENBERG, Judge.

Howe & Corson, for appellants. Thomas Burke and Junius Rochester, (Andrew Woods, of counsel,) for appellee.

HOYT, J. Plaintiff, for his cause of action, alleged, among other things, that he was the owner, and in possession, of a certain described piece of real estate; that defendants had caused to be recorded certain deeds purporting to cover the same, and were asserting rights thereunder, and thereby injuring plaintiff's title. In the progress of the trial, plaintiff put in evidence a record of certain proceedings had in the probate court of King county, culminating in a sale of the land in question to the plaintiff. These proceedings were attacked by the defendants, and the rulings of the court, in regard thereto, are relied upon by the appellants as cause for reversal. The proceedings objected to were commenced in the probate court, by the filing of a petition therein by one Finley Holl. The facts set up in said petition, so far as it is necessary for our purpose, may be stated as follows: That one Lumley Franklin was dead; that he died seised of the land in question; that he left a will which had been duly admitted to probate in the county of San Francisco, Cal., and that Phillip Roach, public administrator, was then administering the estate of said decedent, under the provisions of said will, and the orders of said probate court; that, to the knowledge of the petitioner, there was no personal property in this territory belonging to said estate; and that, to his knowledge, there were no creditors. Under this state of facts appellants contend that there was no authority in the probate court of King county to administer said estate, and that all of its proceedings therein were void for want of jurisdiction. There has been some discussion as to the nature of our courts of probate. It being contended on the one hand that, in matters relating to the sale of lands of deceased persons, it has only a special and limited jurisdiction; while, on the other, it is claimed that in these matters, as in all others relating to the estates of deceased persons, its jurisdiction is general, if not exclusive. However this may be is not important in this case, as it affirmatively appears just what facts were shown to the probate court, upon which it assumed jurisdiction, and, if they were sufficient, for that purpose, that would end the inquiry, even in a court of special jurisdiction, and, if they were insufficient, the presumption in favor of a court of general jurisdiction would be negatived. The material question here then, in either case, is as to the sufficiency of the facts alleged in said petition. This must depend upon the relation which the personal representatives of a deceased person hold to the real estate of which he died seised. Have such representatives, during administration, any duty to perform, as to such real estate, irrespective of the question as to whether or not it is needed to pay debts. This question must be determined largely by the statutes of the state in which the land is situated. In this state, the administrator has a right to the immediate possession of all real estate, and may receive the rents and profits of the same, until the estate shall be settled, or delivered over, by order of the probate court, to the heirs or devisees, and shall keep in repair all houses, etc. Code 1881, § 1444. From this provision, it seems clear that whenever an administrator is appointed in this state it is his duty to take possession, not only of the personal property, but also of the real estate. It would seem to follow that, though the heirs may at once take title to the real estate, yet that title is not perfect, as it is subject to the right of the administrator to take possession thereof, and retain the same until the probate court shall have judicially determined who the heirs or devisees are, and made its order thereon. How, then, can the heirs' title be made perfect, and his right to the title and possession of the real estate be assured? We know of no other way than by administration, and the judgment of the probate court of the jurisdiction in which the real estate is situated. And, as it is the policy of the law that titles to real estate should be certain and assured, every jurisdiction in which the deceased left real estate must have the right to have administration thereof, that it may be judicially determined who the heirs or devisees are, and that there are no debts which can affect the title or possession which shall be awarded them. It follows that administration is proper outside of the domicile of the deceased, even although the application therefor shows that there are no debts to the knowledge of the applicant, as his want of knowledge cannot take the place of a judicial determination; and, further, that the facts set forth in the petition were sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, irrespective of administration elsewhere, and, a fortiori, would they be sufficient to authorize administration, auxiliary to that conceded to be regular, then in progress, and unsettled in another state. If the administration was proper, there must be some way to pay the expenses thereof, and, where there is no personal property, the real estate must be sold, even although no debts are proven. In this case, the petition for the order of sale shows that certain taxes assessed against the real estate in question were due and unpaid, and, although it may have appeared that these taxes accrued after the death of the testator, yet, under our statute, they were charges against the estate, and among the claims which the administrator must provide for. He is entitled to the possession of the real estate, and to the rents and profits derived therefrom, and it would not do to say that he has nothing to do with the taxes accruing during administration. The proceedings in other regards are conceded to be regular, and the record was properly admitted in evidence. This disposes of the case, and makes it unnecessary for us to determine the other question involved therein. The case of Territory v. Klée, 23 Pac. Rep. 417, (decided by this court at its last session,) has been cited by appellants, and it is urged that the language used by the chief justice, in that case, is applicable to this. We cannot agree with this contention. In that case, administration of the estate was in progress in King county, and that which was sought to be sustained had been commenced in Pierce county, pending such administration. Under these circumstances, and under the provisions of chapter 98 of the Code, the court might well say that the administration in Pierce county was "unnecessary, if not illegal." The judgment and decree must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CASCADÉ FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. v. JOURNAL PUB. CO.

FIRE INSURANCE—PREMATURE ACTION—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—WAIVER.

1. Where an insurance policy stipulates that the loss shall not be payable till 60 days after proof of loss, an action commenced 58 days after proof of loss is premature, unless the company has absolutely refused to pay the loss.

2. The proof of loss made to the company after the fire is not evidence of the value of the property; and, where such proof is the only evidence of the value of the property, there is nothing for the jury to decide.

3. A firm, agents of an insurance company, procured a policy on the property of their debtor, payable to themselves in case of loss. Afterwards, the debtor sold the property, and assigned the policy to the purchaser, with the consent and at the solicitation of the agents. The policy was conditioned to be void, if assigned in case of sale, unless the assignment was approved by the president or secretary of the company. This consent was never asked for, nor obtained. Held, that the policy was forfeited, as there was no waiver of the condition as to assignment, since the agents were in the first place the beneficiaries, and could not therefore bind the company by their acts.

Appeal from superior court, King county.
Preston, Albertson & Donworth, for appellant. Lewis & Gilman, for appellee.

STILES, J. 1. In this case it clearly appears that proof of the loss was made, July 10, 1889, and the terms of the policy were that the loss should not be payable until 60 days thereafter. The action was commenced September 6, 1889, on the fifty-eighth day after proof of loss was made. Under the letter of the policy, therefore, the suit was premature. But it was agreed by both sides, and we believe correctly, as matter of law, that under such contracts as this, as the limitation is solely for the benefit of the insurer, for the purpose of enabling him to examine into the circumstances of the loss, and satisfy himself of the justness of the claim, and prepare himself for payment, so, if, at any time before the expiration of the time limited, the insurer has so satisfied himself, and thereupon communicates to the insured his unqualified refusal to pay the loss, all further claim to indulgence under the stipulation is waived, and suit may be forthwith commenced. Accordingly, in this case, the complaint alleged a demand and a positive refusal to pay, which laid upon the plaintiff the burden of proving such a refusal as the law requires, and, upon the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, made it incumbent upon the court to say whether or not any evidence had been produced tending to show a refusal. The court found against the defendant on this proposition, and its exception to this ruling requires that we examine the testimony on that point. The substance of the evidence in the record is that one of the officers of the plaintiff corporation, after making the proof of loss, called several times upon the secretary of the insurance company, and inquired as to the intentions of the latter company with regard to the policy in question. The secretary suggested, as a possible objection, that the transfer of the policy from the original insured had not been approved, and mentioned the probability that the matter would be referred to a committee of trustees to report. Several other visits of the appellee's agent resulted in nothing more definite except that a committee had been constituted to consider the policy, which committee, it was rumored to the appellee, had reported favorably to the payment of the loss. No attempt was made to establish the truth of this rumor, however, and it is material only as it shows the information chargeable to the plaintiff, and under which the suit was brought. Thus far the testimony was nothing more than what might have been expected as introductory to some positive declaration, and, being unsupported, was of no force whatever. Finally, however, the same agent of the plaintiff met one of the insurance company's trustees upon the street, and got into conversation with him upon the subject of the company's probable action; whereupon the trustee, who was apparently in some passion over certain remarks made by the president of the Journal Company derogatory to home insurance companies, remarked that "he guessed he would see what they would do about this matter," and there the subject was dropped. The introduction of this remark of the trustee was allowed by the court over objection, and is assigned as error. Regarding the trustee of the corporation as in some sense its agent, as he undoubtedly was, he would not, unless specially charged by the board, of which he was a member, with the duty of communicating its decision to the policy-holder, be authorized to bind it by his declaration, and still less could his mere street talk be taken as the expression of his principal. An agent's declaration binds his principal only when he is intrusted with the conduct of the particular matter in hand, and while he is engaged about the performance of the duty assigned to him. In this instance, the witness was asked what reason the trustee gave for not paying the demand, from which the court probably gathered that some formal declaration would be shown, as really coming from the company. But the witness' answer was not responsive, and did not touch the point of inquiry. This left the case with no showing of a refusal to pay, and therefore no warrant for the commencement of the action on the 6th day of September.

2. The proof of loss made by the claimant under the policy was no evidence, at the trial, of the property lost in the fire, or of its value. It was admitted, if at all, upon the cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, and at the request of the defendant, to show by the jurat attached to it the precise date on which it was made, — July 10th. The insurance was on "office furniture and library, $200; stones, press, and tables, $300; type, $500." By the proof of loss it is alleged that the furniture and library had a sound value of $500, and the loss was $264.60. The sound value of the stones, press, and tables was $256, and the loss was the same; while the types were worth $2,000, and the loss was $846.55. The total sound value was $2,856, the loss $1,467.15, and the policy was $1,000. The seventh paragraph of the complaint alleged the loss to have exceeded $1,000, and it was for the plaintiff to sustain that allegation with competent proof. We doubt whether the proof of loss was intended to be proof of value, when it was introduced, and even if it had been it could have served no such purpose. The proof of value having been omitted, there was no case for the jury.

8. The points discussed previously affect merely the plaintiff's recovery in this action. The remaining point goes to the right of the plaintiff to maintain any action at all. The policy in question was in the usual form of insurance contracts against loss by fire, being a printed blank, one of many like it, with the signatures of the president and secretary already affixed, and only requiring the signature of the local agent and its delivery to make it a contract in full force as the obligation of the company. As originally issued, December 31, 1888, it insured the firm of Begg & Meany, who were then the owners of the property; "loss, if any, payable to G. E. Miller & Co., as their interest may appear." This firm of G. E. Miller & Co. were the local agents for the issuance of policies of the Cascade Company, and they had some kind of a lien upon the goods of Begg & Meany for money advanced. Thus, in the beginning, this policy was issued by Miller & Co. to themselves, to secure their claim for advances, and it remained in their possession for several months, during which the property was sold and transferred—First, to one Kittenger; and, secondly, to the Journal Publishing Company. The premium was paid to the insurance company at once by Miller & Co., and charged up on their books as an additional claim against Begg & Meany. Miller & Co. notified the insurance company of the issuance of the policy, thereby, of course, conveying to it information of their relation to the policy and to the property insured, and the company made no objection that its agents had thus insured themselves. The policy was voidable at the option of the company within a reasonable time, upon return of the premium; but the company did not elect to cancel it, and we hold the policy good under the circumstances. But, on the other hand, agents of an insurance company, who place themselves in such a relation to a policy, certainly very greatly endanger the insured in case of loss, since all the rulings of the courts as to waiver of the terms of a policy, through knowledge of the insurer's agents, of subsequent facts warranting a cancellation, are rendered of no avail, when the agent is himself one of the parties to the contract. In such a case, knowledge of the agent is not knowledge of the principal; but to withhold knowledge of any material fact becomes a fraud on the principal, sufficient to avoid the policy. In such cases the general rules of agency, and those particular rules which pertain to matters of insurance, forbid that the agent should occupy any place other than that of an interested third party, neither whose acts nor whose knowledge are imputed to the principal. Begg & Meany were chargeable with notice of this state of things, so was Kittenger, and so was the Journal Publishing Company; and each of them was bound to know that, so long as Miller & Co. remained the beneficiaries of the policy, no subsequent knowledge of theirs concerning the property covered by this policy, or concerning the policy itself, would be of any force whatever against the insurance company, unless actually communicated to its officers. Miller & Co. retained the policy in their possession until after the property had passed into the possession of the publishing company. Then they sought out Begg & Meany, and got their signature to an assignment printed in blank form on the back of their policy, as follows: "For value received we hereby transfer to the Journal Publishing Co. all our title and interest in this policy of insurance;" and again the policy was returned to Miller & Co.'s safe, for Begg & Meany had not paid the premium, and Miller & Co. still had their lien. But an arrangement was made by which the publishing company agreed to pay the amount advanced by Miller & Co. for the premium, and upon that the policy was delivered to the publishing company. Now, in the body of this policy, there is a clause as follows: "Whenever this policy may have become void from any cause, it shall not be revived or reinstated in any way, except by a special contract for such reinstating in writing thereon, or by the issue of a new policy;" and on the back of the contract, as a part of the blank assignment, there was printed as a heading to it, "Assignment of policy in case of sale. Not good except approved by the president or secretary of this company." This is the blank to which Begg & Meany's signature was affixed, but which was never approved by the president or secretary of the Cascade Company, or presented for their approval. The sale of the insured property, and its transfer to third persons, rendered the policy void, and the purpose of the blank assignment was to provide an acceptable form of reinstatement under the clause of the policy first quoted. Perhaps the approval of the assignment in this manner was not the only way in which a reinstatement could be accomplished. The plaintiff endeavored to show a course of dealing which might, in case of another policy, tend to support a revival of the policy upon the approval of the agents who issued it, under some of the decisions of courts on the subject of waivers. But, in this case, aside from the fact that the agent did not sign the approval, we have held above that, as to this policy, Miller & Co. were not agents, but principals. Possibly under some of the decisions, if Miller & Co. or the publishing company had communicated the fact of the transfer to the latter with a request for reinstatement, mere failure to announce its unwillingness would be held sufficient to charge the insurer, if the insured were prevented from getting other insurance, by its delay in acting. But such is not this case. Miller & Co. kept a policy book, and made a daily report of business to the company. But very curiously the policy book showed no entry whatever of the assignment of Begg & Meany, and it did not appear that the insurance company ever knew of the assignment or of the transfer of the property, until after the fire. This neglect was not the neglect of the company, but of the insured and their assignee, who knew Miller & Co.'s position with regard to the policy, and had under their very eyes the notice that an express approval was required. The head office of the company was in the city of Seattle, only a short distance from the publishing company's office, where the matter could have been settled in a few minutes. It was the right of the insurer to know the individual holding its policy, which was not a floating promise to pay into the hands of any holder with no other condition than loss of the property. Moreover, although this policy was issued in December, 1888, and the assignment of Begg & Meany was dated April 13, 1889, not even then nor until after the fire, June 6, 1889, was there any offer to pay the premium. Miller & Co., as was mentioned, had advanced the premium to the company, and charged Begg & Meany. Later they charged the publishing company, and after the fire the latter paid the debt. This we regard as making no change in the status of affairs. It was not in any sense an acceptance of the premium by the insurance company, which had been fully paid months before. Miller & Co. at that time had actually ceased to be the agents of the Cascade Company for any purpose. But they were not at any time agents to bind the company by any act or statement of theirs in connection with this policy. This aspect of the case makes it unnecessary for us to refer to many other features of it, involving numerous rulings of the court, and the charge to the jury. The testimony of plaintiff was uncontradicted, so that defendant's motion for a nonsuit raised a question for the court as to whether any material allegation was unsupported, the answer to which must have been that no renewal, revival, or reinstatement of the policy had been shown after the sale of the insured property by Begg & Meany, based on the admission that Miller & Co. were the real insured to an indefinite extent, as expressed in the policy. This would have sustained the motion, and the nonsuit should have been allowed.

In considering this case, although the industry of counsel presented an immense array of cases, we have not seen it to be necessary to found our decision, so far as the last point is concerned, upon any of the so-called principles of insurance law waivers. Cases, we find, can be cited for the waiving of nearly or quite every possible clause of a policy; but, upon examination, it will be discovered that almost every case of this kind rests upon some peculiar state of facts of its own. The enforcement or non-enforcement of a policy of insurance, although a purely legal matter in form, is rarely without its equitable features; and so, in spite of the strongest prohibitions contained in the express language of policies against many things on the part of the insured, if the agent of the insurer gets knowledge of them, there must be a prompt cancellation, or the policy will be held to stand, on account of the waiver. But here is rather a case of agency than of insurance. The policy, by reason of the knowledge of the secretary of the company that it had been issued, and to whom, and for whose benefit, was good for want of objection; but, by the assignment and transfer of the property, it became suspended and of no effect, until application was made to revive in the hands of the assignee and purchaser, not an application to the co-party insured, (Miller & Co.,) but to the company's proper officer. For want of any such application the policy never revived, and there was no right of action upon it. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to sustain the motion for nonsuit. Costs to the appellant.

MORGAN V. MORLEY.

DEFECTIVE STREET—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES.

A city granted to a private person the privilege of constructing, in one of its streets, a wharf 30 feet wide. The grantee constructed the wharf 32 feet in width, and erected guard-rails on the outer edges. Subsequently the abutting owners on the street planked out the intervening space between their property and the wharf, and removed the guard-rails, making a road-way the entire width of the street. Held, that a subsequent assignment by the grantee of all his rights in the wharf gave the assignee only the 30 feet originally granted by the city, and that such assignee was not liable to a person injured by a defect in the planking outside of the 30 feet, but within the limits of the wharf as originally constructed.

Appeal from superior court, Jefferson county.

Action by Frank Morley against H. E. Morgan for personal injuries occasioned by the defective condition of a wharf. The second and third paragraphs of the complaint are as follows: "(2) That the right and privilege to construct and maintain said wharf in and upon said Tyler street had originally been given by the city of Port Townsend, with certain conditions, to one Charles Elsenbels; that said defendant became the owner of said wharf by purchase, and on said date was operating the same for pecuniary profits. (3) That said wharf was negligently and carelessly built, and negligently and carelessly maintained by said defendant, inasmuch as there was an open and unguarded hole about 12 inches long by 4 inches wide at a point about one hundred feet from the land on Water street, and being sufficiently large to admit a man's foot and leg into and through said hole or crack, while in the ordinary course of walking over said wharf; said hole being about ten feet above the land beneath said wharf, and about twenty feet from the north-east corner of a certain store or brick building on the south-east corner of Water and Tyler streets." The case was tried by the court without a jury. The court found substantially the following facts: Tyler street, in the center of which said wharf is located, is seventy-three (73) feet wide, and the ordinance of the city of Port Townsend granting to defendant's grantor the right to erect and maintain said wharf limited said right or franchise to a distance of fifteen feet on each side of the center of said street. The hole or crack where plaintiff was injured is sixteen and three-tenths (16 3-10) feet from the center of said Tyler street. The road-way of said wharf, at the point where plaintiff was injured, was closely and substantially planked more than thirty (30) feet wide. The court also found that defendant's grantor, when he built the road-way, extended the planking out more than fifteen (15) feet on each side of the center of the street, viz., 16 3-10 feet; that one of the planks in said road-way was about 4 inches shorter than the others; that subsequently the persons who were in the possession of the land on each side of said street planked the intervening space on each side of said road-way, joining onto the planking on said road-way, except at the point where the plank was short, and where this injury occurred. The court gave judgment in plaintiff's favor for $1,000, and defendant appeals.

Calhoun & Coleman, for appellant.
Hays & Plumley, for appellee.

STILES, J. Appellant's objection to the sufficiency of the complaint is not well taken. It is true that the second paragraph of the complaint alleges that the "right and privilege to construct and maintain said wharf in and upon said Tyler street" had been given by ordinance, etc., but the allegations which show where the wharf was actually built, and where the accident happened, make it clear, so far as the complaint is concerned, that that part of the wharf where the plaintiff was injured was not "in and upon Tyler street," but about 100 feet from land of Tyler street, and out over the water. If the facts exactly correspond to the complaint, therefore, perhaps this judgment might stand; but it seems, from the testimony and the findings, that, in fact, the wharf was "in and upon" Tyler street, at the point where the hole which caused the injury was, and this cast upon the city of Port Townsend the duty of seeing that it was maintained in proper condition for travel. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1012; Fowler v. Town of Strawberry Hill, 74 Iowa, 644, 38 N.W. Rep. 521; Hutchinson v. City of Olympia, 2 Wash. T. 314, 5 Pac. Rep. 606; Charter Port Townsend, (Laws 1881, p. 134, § 93.) Perhaps if this structure had been maintained merely as an approach to the wharf, in the condition in which it was originally built, 32 feet wide, the defendant might have been liable for the injury. But he did not construct the wharf;

Eisenbels constructed it; and at the time of its construction, even though it were 2 feet and over wider than the ordinance permitted, it had a sufficient guard-rail, which would have prevented this accident. But Tyler street was 73 feet wide, and, soon after the wharf was built, people began to build upon and occupy the property along the street and wharf. The front of the buildings so erected was over 20 feet from the outer edge of the wharf, and the owners planked out over the intervening space on the wharf level, and removed the guard-rail, so that a solid road-way was made from side to side of the 73-foot street, and the whole came thus to be used as a public street. It was as "a public street that the plaintiff was passing over it; otherwise, he would have had no right there unless business connected with the wharf gave him a license to walk upon it, which was not alleged or proven. Morgan acquired the wharf from Eisenbels, presumably after the planking by abutting owners, the removal of the guard-rail, and the use of that part of the wharf as a public street. Taking it at that time and under those circumstances, he acquired nothing but the 30 feet granted by the ordinance, which did not include the hole at all, and he was under no duty to look after it at all. The city, either by positive requirement or permissive license, had caused the abutting property owners to plank out to the wharf, and the negligence, if any, in leaving the hole was thus not the negligence of either Eisenbels or Morgan. Sundry items of damage seem to have been allowed by the court which were unsupported by evidence, but it is not necessary to pass upon them. The judgment must be reversed, with instructions to the court below to dismiss the action, and it is so ordered, costs to the appellant.

REED V. MILLER.

MORTGAGE—PRESENTATION OF CLAIM AGAINST MORTGAGOR'S ESTATE—INTEREST.

1. Failure to present against a decedent's estate a claim secured by a mortgage on his land, within a year after notice to present their claims is given to creditors of the estate, under Code Wash. § 1467, which provides that claims shall be barred unless so presented, does not prevent the foreclosure of the mortgage, where no recovery is sought beyond the proceeds of the mortgaged lands. Following Scammon v. Ward, 23 Pac. Rep. 439.

2. A mortgage bearing interest at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month, payable semi-annually, is valid, under Code Wash. § 2389, providing that any rate of interest may be agreed on by the parties to a written contract; and, on the non-payment of the interest due on the mortgage, the same may be compounded semi-annually.

Appeal from superior court, Thurston county; MASON IRWIN, Judge.

SCOTT, J. The record in this case shows that on August 14, 1884, the defendant, Julia S. Israel, with her husband, George C. Israel, executed a note to the plaintiff, the principal sum being \$1,000, due one year from its date, and bearing interest from date at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per month until paid, the interest payable semi-annually, and if not so paid to be added to the principal, and draw like interest, and, at the same time, secured the payment thereof by a mortgage upon certain lands in said county. On the 28th day of October, 1885, the note being unpaid, plaintiff instituted a suit in the territorial district court for said county to foreclose the mortgage; and on October 21, 1886, during its pendency, said Julia S. Israel died intestate. It is conceded that on December 6, 1886, T. M. Reed, Jr., was appointed administrator of her estate, and duly qualified as such, and on the same day caused the usual notice to be published requiring all creditors of said deceased to present their claims to him within one year thereafter, and that the claim in question was not so presented. June 11, 1888, the administration being still pending, said administrator was substituted as defendant in the action in place of deceased. At the trial the court found \$2,449 to be due the plaintiff upon the note; and, in arriving thereat, computed interest upon the principal sum, less a small payment which had been made, at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per month, and compounded the same semi-annually. The court also found the additional sum of \$244.90 to be due as attorney's fees in said action, and on April 29, 1890, decreed a sale of the mortgaged lands, and directed the proceeds to be applied in payment of the amounts so found to be due the plaintiff, together with the other costs and expenses. No judgment for any deficiency over was rendered. The mortgage provided, in case of a foreclosure, that the plaintiff might have her counsel fees, to the amount of 10 per cent. upon the principal and interest found to be due, paid out of the money arising from a sale of the lands. The defendant appealed the cause to this court. He alleges that the plaintiff's claim was barred by reason of a failure to present the same to the administrator in the probate proceedings; that it was error to compound the interest; and that the plaintiff could not recover her costs and attorney's fees without having presented such a claim to the administrator.

The first point is disposed of in the case of Scammon v. Ward, not yet reported in our own state, but to be found in 23 Pac. Rep. 439, wherein this court decided that a failure to present such a claim would not prevent a foreclosure of the mortgage where no recovery is sought beyond the proceeds of the mortgaged lands.

The findings of the court as to interest and attorney's fees is in entire accord with the terms of the note and mortgage. Neither of these instruments is attacked upon the ground of being unconscionable, nor is the amount of the attorney's fee claimed to have been unreasonable. There is no law in this state prescribing a different rate of interest in case of the death of a party from that provided by the contract, and there was none at the time the same was entered into. The objections urged in this case cannot be allowed to prevail, whatever opinion the court might entertain as to the advisability of a different rule. The Code provides (section 2369) that "any rate of interest agreed upon by the parties to a contract, specifying the same in writing, shall be valid and legal;" and this is the law until changed by legislative enactment, excepting cases where contracts should be set aside upon some of the recognized grounds, for which the same may be annulled. The judgment is affirmed.

NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES—TURN-TABLES—INJURIES TO CHILD.

1. In an action for the wrongful death of a child between five and six years old, it is not admissible for the attending physician, who has already stated that the child was frail and weak, to further testify whether in his opinion the child would have survived the injury had it been a healthy one.

2. In an action for the death of a child caught in defendant's turn-table, left unfastened, it is inadmissible to show that it is the custom of all railway companies to keep their turn-tables unfastened, whether in use or not, and whether in an inclosed or public place, as such a custom is unreasonable, and manifestly negligent.

3. Where it is shown that the managing agent of the company had his office near the turn-table, and had seen the children playing on it several times before the accident, the fact that he tied the table with a rope so that it could not be revolved unless the rope were cut or untied, does not relieve the company of liability for its negligence in not adopting securer means to prevent so dangerous a machine from being revolved by children likely to be attracted by it.

Appeal from superior court, Pacific county.

Fulton Bros., for appellant Watson, Hume & Watson, for respondent.

ANDERS, C. J. This was an action by appellee, as administrator, to recover damages for the death of his son, a child between five and six years of age, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellant in not properly securing a turn-table situated upon its own premises, in an open area, near one of the principal streets, and close to the business portion, of the town of Ilwaco, in this state. It appears that the turn-table had been constructed but a short time previous to the accident to the child, and that, up to that time, it had not been used by appellant for the purpose for which it was designed. A considerable number of the children of the town had been in the habit of playing upon and revolving it previous to the accident to deceased. It was tied to a stake the day before, with a piece of rope, by one Hoffman, not in the employ of the railroad company, but was soon after untied by one of the children, and play resumed upon it. The managing agent of appellant, whose office and place of business was in close proximity to the turn-table, testified, in substance, that he also tied it, or caused it to be tied, with a rope two days before the boy was injured; that the next day he noticed it was unfastened, and tied it with the same rope and in the same place; that it remained tied all that day; that he saw the children again on the table the evening before the accident; that they had untied it, and were revolving it and riding on it; that he drove them away, and told the men working on the track to keep them away from the turn-table, and that he tied it four times in all, with the same piece of rope. But that the table was ever tied or fastened at all, except by Hoffman, is disputed by other testimony in the case. The deceased child had never been to this turn-table before the time he was injured, but on that day he was sent by his mother on an errand to the store, about 300 yards distant from his home, and close to the turn-table. Returning from the store, he was attracted by the children at play upon the turn-table, and stopped and sat down to watch them on the abutment on or near the rails of the track connecting with the turn-table, in such a manner that his feet hung down on the side next to the turn-table. While in that position, the children turned the table so that his legs were caught between it and the abutment, and so injured that the flesh of both legs, from his knees down, was mangled and torn from the bones, from the effects of which he died three days afterwards. Upon the trial in the court below, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,000. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, from which defendant appeals, and assigns the rulings of the court below in excluding certain testimony offered by defendant, and the refusal of the court to charge the jury as requested by it, as error.

To prove the character of the injury, and that the death of deceased was caused thereby, the plaintiff called as a witness a physician and surgeon, who, having stated, among other things, that he attended the child from the time of the accident until his death, and that he died from the injuries received at the turn-table, further testified—but whether on direct or cross-examination is not clear—that the child was a frail, weak child. On cross-examination, counsel for defendant asked the witness this question: "State whether or not, in your judgment, if the child had been a healthy child, it would have survived the injury?" This question was objected to by counsel for plaintiff, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial, and the objection was sustained by the court; and this ruling, appellant contends, was erroneous and prejudicial. It is claimed that the evidence sought to be elicited by the question was material in aiding the jury in arriving at plaintiff's damage. And in support of the proposition it is argued that a child so weak or feeble that he could not survive an injury that a healthy child would have survived, has a less expectancy of life than the ordinary child, and could not be expected to accumulate so much for his estate; and that an estate would be less damaged by the death of a weak child than by that of a healthy one. It is true that the measure of plaintiff's damage is the loss occasioned by the death of deceased, and that his health, mental and physical condition, and his expectancy of life, were proper subjects to be submitted to the jury for their consideration in estimating the amount of the damage sustained by the estate. But it does not follow that defendant should have been permitted to show that, in the opinion of the witness, deceased would not have died from the effects of the frightful injury he received if he had been as strong and healthy as some other boy, or even if he, himself, had been more vigorous. There was no controversy as to the cause of the child's death, and the question, then, before the jury was not what amount of injury of the character suffered by him he could or would have survived under other circumstances, but what was, in fact, his health and physical condition at the time of the injury; and that the witness had already stated. We see no error of the court in excluding the question.

It is next contended that the court erred in excluding the testimony offered by appellant to show that it is not the custom of railroad companies, or those operating such turn-tables, to have or keep the same locked or fastened at any time, but, on the contrary, that the custom and practice of all such companies is, and always has been, to have and keep them unfastened and unlocked at all times, whether in actual use or not, and whether inclosed, or in an open public place. We think this evidence was clearly immaterial, and was rightly excluded by the court. The question at issue was whether the defendant secured the turn-table as careful and prudent men would ordinarily do under like circumstances. What would be clearly negligent in one case and under some circumstances might be ordinary care under other and different circumstances; and whether there is negligence in any particular case must generally be determined by the facts and circumstances of that case, and not by any general custom or practice. Koester v. Ottumwa, 34 Iowa, 41; Koons v. Railway Co., 65 Mo. 592. See, also, Deer. Neg. § 9, and cases cited. Besides, the custom proposed to be shown is manifestly unreasonable and negligent, and was not relied on by appellant as a defense in the cause, for it claimed, and still claims, immunity from liability, on the ground that it secured its turn-table properly.

The next assignment of error is the refusal of the court to give, without modification, the following instruction asked by defendant: "(1) If you shall find that the turn-table was tied on the day of the accident and injury complained of in such manner as to prevent its being revolved without untying or cutting the rope by which it was tied, and that on that day, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the rope was cut or untied by a person or persons not in the defendant's employ, and that the accident producing the death of the child Franklin G. Hedrick, occurred before the fact that the rope had been cut or unfastened became known to the defendant or its officers, then I charge you that the defendant is not liable in this action. (2) If the defendant so fastened the turn-table that it could not be revolved so as to injure a person or a child, and, in the absence of the officers of defendant, some person wrongfully cut or untied the fastenings, so that the turn-table could be revolved, and thereby the deceased received the injury that caused his death, I charge you that the defendant is not liable, and your verdict should be in favor of defendant." The court modified the first of these instructions by adding thereto: "Unless there was want of ordinary care in the method or manner in which the company undertook to secure the turn-table, and you believe that this method was the proximate and controlling cause of the injury,"—and the second by adding the words: "If you do not further find that the accident or injury was the result of want of ordinary care in the manner in which the company undertook to secure the turn-table, and that such want of ordinary care was the proximate and controlling cause of the injury." As so modified, the court gave both instructions. Whether this action of the court was erroneous or not must depend upon the measure of duty which appellant owed to the deceased, under the circumstances. It had erected this alluring and dangerous machine in an open, public place, and its agent and manager not only knew that young children were instinctively attracted by it, and were in the habit of playing upon and around it, but that the method adopted, if any, to prevent them from so doing was wholly insufficient. It certainly would not have been a matter of very great inconvenience to have securely fastened or locked this unused turn-table before the deceased was injured, as was done immediately afterwards. And we think it was the duty of appellant to so secure it as to prevent injury to those who, by reason of their tender years, were incapable of comprehending its dangerous character, either by locking it or in some other way preventing access to it; and a failure to take such precaution was negligence on the part of appellant. Railroad Co. v. Styron, 66 Tex. 421, 1 S. W. Rep. 161; Railroad Co. v. Caldwell, 74 Pa. St. 421; Nagel v. Railroad Co., 75 Mo. 653; Railroad Co. v. Bohn, 27 Mich. 503; Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. St. 332; 2 Ror. R. pp. 1121, 1122. The instruction asked by appellant, in effect, requested the court to charge the jury, as matter of law, that, if they found that appellant took the precautions and used the means claimed by it to secure the turn-table, it would not be liable in this action; and we are of the opinion that the court committed no error in refusing to give the instructions as requested. The question whether or not appellant, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, was guilty of negligence, was for the jury, and was fairly submitted by the instructions given by the court. Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657; Hoye v. Railway Co., 62 Wis. 666, 23 N. W. Rep.

CITY OF OLYMPIA v. MANN.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—FIRE LIMITS—WOODEN BUILDINGS.

1. The charter of Olympia provides that the city "shall have power to make regulations for the prevention of accidents by fire, to establish a fire department * * * to prevent by all possible and proper means danger or risk of injury or damages by fire arising from carelessness, negligence, or otherwise, * * * and such other powers and privileges not herein specially enumerated, as are incident to municipal corporations of like character and degree." Held, that the city has implied power to pass an ordinance creating fire limits, and prohibiting the erection of any wooden buildings therein.

2. An ordinance forbidding the erection of any wooden building within the fire limits as therein set out, except by special permission of the council, is valid. STILES, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Thurston county.

C. H. Ayer and B. F. Dennison, for appellant. J. W. Robinson and Cavanaugh & Fitch, for appellee.

ANDERS, C. J. Appellee, being the owner of a vacant lot on Fourth street, in Olympia, described as lot 1 in block 24 of the town (now city) of Olympia, and being desirous of erecting thereon a two-story frame building to be used as store-rooms and offices, applied to the city council of said city, in accordance with section 8 of ordinance No. 304 of said city, entitled "An ordinance defining the fire limits, and to protect property from fire," approved April 24, 1889, for a permit to erect said building. The said lot being within the fire limits, as established by said ordinance, the city council refused permission to erect the proposed building, and notified appellee not to undertake the erection of the same. Appellee thereupon brought this action to perpetually enjoin and restrain the city and its officers from, in any manner, enforcing, or attempting to enforce, said ordinance against him or his employees laboring upon said building. In his complaint he alleges, substantially, in addition to the facts above mentioned, that the boundaries of said fire limits, as fixed by said ordinance, are unreasonable, injurious, and inequitable, and the same was passed with a desire to force brick and stone buildings on Fourth and Main streets, and increase the value of neighboring property at the expense of those intending to improve; and that since the passage of said ordinance, and the rejection of plaintiff's application for a permit, the said city has granted permits for the erection of wooden buildings within said fire limits, but not on Main or Fourth streets, whereby the danger of conflagration has been much more increased than it would be by the erection of plaintiff's desired building; that said ordinance is null and void; that the said city had and has no authority to create or maintain fire limits; that the ordinance is void also for want of conformity to the city charter, and federal laws, even if the city had such power that a court of equity should prohibit its enforcement; that the city has no authority to declare anything a nuisance, and only has authority to abate such nuisances as are known and defined by statute. The complaint further sets forth the penalty prescribed by said ordinance for its violation, and avers that the defendant, the city of Olympia, through its marshal, threatens to arrest plaintiff, and all those who may be found at work on said building; that he has a large number of men employed and ready to commence work on said building, and that unless the city and its officers are restrained and prohibited from enforcing said ordinance plaintiff will suffer great and irreparable damage, for which there is no speedy or adequate remedy at law, and that the threatened arrests will create great and vexatious litigation. To this complaint the defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled by the court, and, defendant electing to stand upon the demurrer, judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals to this court.

We are therefore called upon to decide the question whether the city ordinance complained of is or is not valid, or, in other words, whether the city council were legally empowered to pass it. This ordinance, after setting out the boundaries of the fire limits within the city, among other things, provides as follows: "Sec. 7. No wooden building shall be constructed within the fire limits, provided that the city council may grant permits to construct wooden buildings within the fire limits as hereinafter provided. * * * Sec. 10. Any person who shall erect, or cause to be erected, or assist in the erection of, any building contrary to the provisions of this ordinance, or shall maintain and refuse to remove any building erected contrary to the provisions of this ordinance for ten days after receiving notice to remove the same from the fire-wardens, shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined in any sum not greater than one hundred dollars, or be imprisoned in the city jail not more than thirty days, or be both fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court." This ordinance is assailed by counsel for appellee upon the ground that the city charter did not authorize its passage, and upon the further ground that it is unreasonable, or rather that the boundaries of the fire limits are "unreasonable, injurious, and inequitable." Among the powers granted to the city of Olympia by its charter, and which are relied on by appellant to sustain the ordinance in question, are these: "The city of Olympia shall have power to make regulations for the prevention of accidents by fire, to organize and establish a fire department, and make and ordain rules for the government of the same; to provide fire-engines, and other apparatus, and to levy and collect special taxes for that purpose; * * * to prevent, by all possible and proper means, danger or risk of injury or damages by fire arising from carelessness, negligence, or otherwise; * * * to adopt proper ordinances for the government of the city, and to carry into effect the powers given by this act; * * * and the city of Olympia shall have such other powers and privileges, not herein specially enumerated, as are incident to municipal corporations of like character and degree." The learned counsel for appellee contends with much earnestness that, notwithstanding these legislative grants, the city had no power to enact the ordinance, for the reason that the powers, if any, conferred by the charter are general in their nature, and that a special grant of power is necessary to authorize the establishment of fire limits, or the prevention of the erection of wooden buildings within the city. To sustain this position counsel cites, among others, the following, as especially in point: City of Keokuk v. Scroggs, 39 Iowa, 447; Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 312; Kneedler v. Borough of Norristown, 100 Pa. St. 368; City of Champaign v. Harmon, 98 Ill. 491; and Mayor, etc., v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261.

In the case of City of Keokuk v. Scroggs, it appears that the original charter conferred a general power upon the city to make such ordinances as should be necessary to secure the city and its inhabitants from injury by fire. This charter was amended, and the amendment contained a full and specific enumeration of the acts which the city might do for the purposes of guarding against calamities by fire. In the enumeration of powers in the amended charter nothing was said about the control of wood or lumber yards. The defendant was prosecuted for the violation of that portion of the city ordinance relating to the location of lumber yards within the fire limits. And the court said: "The power to pass an ordinance requiring the removal of a lumber yard from a specified portion of the city is not expressly conferred in the charter, nor can it be claimed that it is necessary to make the power conferred available." And further that the general provision contained in the original charter has become absorbed in the particular enumeration in the amendment. "Therefore whatever power is conferred upon the city respecting fires must be found in the amendment to the charter." There being neither a general nor special power in the charter authorizing the city to enact the ordinance as to lumber yards, the court held no such power existed.

The case of Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 312, was a case involving the validity of a fire ordinance. The charter provided generally that the city might have power to "ordain and establish such acts, laws, regulations, and ordinances not inconsistent with the constitution or laws of this state as shall be needful for the government, interests, welfare, and good order of said body politic," also "to abate and remove nuisances and to punish the authors thereof by penalties, fine, and imprisonment, and to define and declare what shall be nuisances." And the court said that "without an express grant a city cannot establish fire limits, declare wooden buildings erected therein to be nuisances, and to provide for the removal of such buildings and the punishment of those erecting them." And in this case the court also said: "The form of the ordinance indicates that it was framed under the latter clause." And the point really decided was that the council had no power to declare wooden buildings to be nuisances.

In the case of Kneedler v. Borough of Norristown, 100 Pa. St. 368, the court says: "The charter of the borough of Norristown contains no authority to the council to enact ordinances prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings. Nor is there anything in the grant of general powers conferred upon the borough from which such an authority can be necessarily inferred or to which it is indispensable." But the court was apparently influenced in its decision by the fact that the legislature had previously assumed jurisdiction of the subject, and had expressly enacted that wooden buildings should not be erected on certain streets of the town, which fact was a very strong reason for the conclusion that it had not delegated the power claimed to the borough itself. And further, the court seems to concede that if the power to enact the ordinance had been conferred by the charter of the borough, or could necessarily be implied from any of the provisions thereof, it would have been valid.

The controversy in the case of City of Champaign v. Harmon, 98 Ill. 491, arose out of a claim made by the city to certain real estate purchased by it at a tax-sale. And the court very properly held that, while the city had the power to purchase and hold real estate necessary for corporate purposes, it could not do so for the purposes of speculation without special power granted to that end.

The case of Mayor, etc., v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, seems strongly to support the position of appellee. Other cases are also cited by counsel bearing more or less directly upon the point; but, in view of the provisions of the charter under consideration, and of the decisions of other courts of high standing and ability to the contrary, we do not feel bound by these decisions. In fact we do not think they are sustained by the better reason, or by the weight of authority.

Judge Dillon defines the powers possessed by municipal corporations to be (1) those granted in express terms; (2) those necessarily or fairly implied in or incidental to the power given; and (3) those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 89.

And taking this to be a correct statement of the law, it follows that if the charter of Olympia, either expressly or by necessary or fair implication, gave the city council authority to enact the fire ordinance, or if such power is essential to the declared objects and purposes of the municipality, then the ordinance ought to be sustained.

The power to do a particular thing may be, and often is, delegated to a municipal corporation in general terms, and these general terms may be quite as broad and comprehensive as if expressed in specific language. In the case before us, the city charter confers upon the city power to make regulations for the prevention of accidents by fire, and to prevent, by all possible and proper means, danger or risk of injury or damages by fire arising from carelessness, negligence, or otherwise. And if these expressions of the legislature did not expressly authorize the council to establish fire limits within the city, and to prevent the erection of wooden buildings therein, such power is certainly fairly implied in what is expressed, provided the means employed are proper or necessary to prevent accidents or danger or risk of injury or damage by fire. The propriety or necessity of the methods to be pursued to accomplish the object sought was left to the discretion of the council, who are the representatives of the people themselves, and who are the sole legislative body of the corporation. The council having by its acts declared the ordinance to be a proper one, we are of the opinion that this court is not warranted in setting it aside as invalid. In fact, it is held by learned courts and text-writers that municipalities have inherent power to pass ordinances for the protection of its citizens from fire, without express legislative authority. In a recent work upon the subject of municipal police ordinances we find this language: "The power to take all measures necessary to prevent fires and their spread is of prime importance to the citizens of every community. It belongs to that class of powers exercised for self-preservation, which are inherent in every municipality, and which do not need the authorization of an express grant. Every precaution possible should be taken to prevent the destruction to property and the danger to life incident to conflagration; and for this purpose as great a degree of interference with personal rights is permitted as under any other power. Private interests are entirely subservient to the public safety." "The first preventive step taken is usually to prescribe fire limits; that is, territorial limits within which it shall be unlawful to erect certain classes of buildings. This is always permissible." "Owing to the extreme importance of such regulations, and their vital interest to the community, one would hardly think that the power of erecting fire limits in a thickly built up district would ever be denied; still it is surprising to note that two courts have insisted that express authority must exist for such regulations. It seems that their regard for personal rights had been carried to an unwarranted extent, in view of the importance of preventing the destruction of property by fire, and, great as our regard must be for their reasoning and conclusions, the rule above enunciated seems to be the true one, and the great majority of the well-advised decisions tends to its support." Horr. & B. Mun. Ord. §§ 221, 222.

In the case of Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, the court held that an ordinance of the city government of Bangor prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings in the city within certain limits was within the authority conferred, under authority in the charter "to ordain and establish such acts, laws, and regulations, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the state as shall be needful to the good order of said body politic."

In Alexander v. Town of Greenville, 54 Miss. 659, the court held that a power "to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires" implies a right to establish fire limits.

In Mayor, etc., v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, it was decided that a municipal corporation has inherent power, independent of legislative grant, to forbid the erection and compel the removal of buildings formed of combustible materials, within the densely built up parts of a town. And in Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, after citing authorities sustaining the proposition that municipal corporations possess inherent power to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within prescribed limits, and to cause their removal, at page 580, the court says: "These cases rest on solid principle; for the rule has always been that a municipal corporation has inherent power to enact ordinances for the protection of the property of its citizens against fire." And the court says further: "A legislative act granting authority to take precautions against fire, and ordinances passed under such an act authorizing the removal of wooden structures erected within forbidden limits, are little more than express declarations of the existence of powers which existed at common law, and are necessarily implied in the grant of a charter to a city." Page 581. See, also, 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §405. We will not now stop to notice other cases cited by counsel to the same effect, as many of them are commented on and approved in the cases already mentioned by us.

It is further contended by counsel for appellee that the ordinance is unreasonable, and therefore void for that reason if for no other. This is a proper question for the court to determine. The city council, as the legislative body of the municipality, must of necessity be vested with more or less discretion as to the reasonableness of the means necessary to effectuate lawful objects. They are in a better position than the court to judge of the best course to pursue, as well as the methods best calculated to effect desired results, and the courts should not set aside or review their acts, unless, upon their face, they are manifestly unreasonable, or based upon fraud, or passed in wanton disregard of private rights, or are in excess of the power of the council. The motives of the council cannot be inquired into, but must be presumed to have been to accomplish the natural and reasonable result of their act. We see nothing unreasonable in the ordinance, viewed in the light of all the facts before us. Its burdens, if any, are cast alike upon all persons within the limits of the district prescribed by it, and the city council had lawful authority to pass it. We cannot see that it is unduly oppressive, or that it discriminates against any particular individual, or that it was passed in a spirit of wanton disregard of proprietary rights. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. So ordered.

HOYT, J., concurs.

SCOTT, J. I concur in all that is said in regard to the power of the city of Olympia to establish fire limits, and concur in the result reached, because it appears to me the question as to the invalidity of the ordinance upon the ground of its unreasonableness is not properly before us in this case. I do not think, however, the city has the power, or can have it even by express legislative enactment, to grant or refuse permission at its pleasure to erect wooden buildings within a fire-limit district where the same are prohibited by the ordinance, although an attempt is made therein to except cases where the city council should see fit to grant a special permit, unless certain rules, regulations, or conditions are laid down by ordinance which apply to all persons alike, and are conclusive in themselves; that it cannot exercise the arbitrary power to grant such a permission to one person and refuse it to another under like conditions and circumstances. As to whether any of the provisions of this ordinance have this effect, or might be so applied, and if so whether the entire ordinance is thereby invalidated, or rendered void only in so far as it relates to the granting of such special permits, and be otherwise valid, which would prohibit the erection of all wooden buildings within the prescribed district without exception, I desire not to express an opinion in the absence of an argument of the particular questions. Powers granted to a municipality must be reasonably and fairly exercised, and its laws made applicable to all alike. The attempted enforcement of power and the unreasonableness and injustice of ordinances whereby a different result could be brought about, or this principle violated, can be inquired into to this extent at least. There was no attempt to attack the ordinance upon this ground in the complaint, but it is alleged to be void because the boundaries of the fire-limit district as fixed therein are unreasonable, without stating the facts wherein such unreasonableness consists.

STILES, J. I dissent. No objection was made upon the argument here to the discussion of the question as to the equality and fairness of sections 7-9 of the ordinance which it was assumed was raised by paragraph 7 of the complaint, and to my mind those sections set up such a system of arbitrary control of buildings in the city of Olympia by the council as is not entitled to be termed reasonable. The establishment of fire limits means the designation of a territory within which wooden buildings must not be erected. But this ordinance, while it designates limits, and says that no wooden buildings shall be constructed therein, clearly shows by its context that that was not its real purpose. The true purpose of it was to compel every person desiring to erect a wooden building to go before the council, which retained within itself the power to say whether he should erect it or not, not according to any fixed rules of determination, under which all applicants would be treated alike, but without rules or regulations, whereby favoritism, or influence, or other motives not proper to the determination of such a question, might enter into and actually determine it. If there were to be exceptions to the ordinance, the exceptions should have been declared, and regulations made under which they could have been availed of. If there was territory embraced in the ordinance within which it was not expected to enforce the ordinance, by reason of its unsettled condition, it was unreasonable to so embrace it, and the limits should not have been extended over it until such time as the conditions were proper for such extension. I concur in holding that the city of Olympia has the power to ordain fire limits implied in its charter; but I cannot agree that such an ordinance was ever contemplated by the legislature, and therefore hold the court's action in overruling the demurrer to have been eminently right.

RITCHIE v. GRIFFITHS et al.

VENDOR AND VENDEE — BONA FIDE PURCHASER — RECORDING DEED.

1. The mere delivery of a deed to a county auditor for record is not constructive notice to a bona fide purchaser, where the auditor neglects to record the same, in accordance with the registry law. Distinguishing Lytle v. State, 9 How. 315.

2. Sess. Laws Wash. T. 1890, pp. 313, 314, §§ 13, 19, 24, provide that, when deeds are given to a county auditor for record, he shall note the time of filing in an index book, with a reference to the book where recorded, and with names of parties, description of property, etc. Held that, without a compliance with these provisions, the record affects no party with notice.

Appeal from superior court, Clallam county; MORRIS B. SACHS, Judge.

Bush & Noyes, for appellant. Johnson & Moody, for appellees.

DUNBAR, J. The first question to be decided in the consideration of this case is, does a grantee, who deposits his deed for record in the auditor's office, where it is received by that officer, discharge his duty of notice to the public, so that his title cannot be prejudiced through the fault or negligence of the auditor in not recording said deed, in accordance with the requirements of the registry laws? If it is concluded that he does so discharge his duty, and that constructive notice is thus given, it will be conclusive of this case; and it will not be necessary to enter into the question of whether or not the index is an essential part of the record. It will be seen that important questions arise here, affecting valuable rights, and that, whichever way they are decided, a hardship will be imposed upon an innocent party. In one instance, the first grantee relies on the officer, who is a creature of the law, to do his duty; and in the other, the purchaser, reposing faith and confidence in the correctness of the record, acts upon it. Shall the deed prevail, or the record of it? On the first question there is a somewhat perplexing conflict of authority; some courts holding that a deed is recorded, in contemplation of law, when it is entitled to registration, and is deposited with the recorder in his office for that purpose, and if, through any fraud or neglect or mistake of the recording officer, the proper notice is not conveyed to a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer, that the misfortune will fall upon the subsequent purchaser; while other courts hold the opposite doctrine, that the onus is on the grantee, who deposits his deed with the recorder, to see that every step is taken, and every act done, that is prescribed by the registry laws. For collated authorities on this question, see Mangold v. Barlow, 61 Miss. 597; and Wade, Notice, pp. 70-73. In many of the cases, however, that are cited as holding the doctrine claimed by plaintiff, the courts, on a careful investigation, are found to have based their opinions on statutes materially different from ours; and others, on the peculiar circumstances of the case. The enunciation by the supreme court of the United States, in Lytle v. State, 9 How. 315, that "it is a well-established fact that where an individual in the prosecution of a right does everything which the law requires him to do, and he fails to obtain his right, by the misconduct or neglect of a public officer, the law will protect him," has been largely relied upon by the plaintiff, and has been quoted by a majority of the cases reported, which hold to plaintiff's view, but in none of these cases, that we have seen, have the circumstances of that case, which called forth the opinion, been reported. To get the full scope and meaning of this expression, we must not regard it as a segregated proposition, independent of the case under consideration, and applicable to all cases; for judges, in rendering opinions, use expressions with reference to the application of principles involved in the case under consideration, and the language employed must be construed, and its meaning gathered, from an examination of the questions involved, the circumstances surrounding, and the argument that leads up to the utterance, or, in homely phrase, it is necessary to know what the court was talking about. Of course, there are certain underlying or basic principles of law, from the true deductions of which are constructed legal maxims, which may be stated as independent propositions, and which will admit of no modification; but the examination of the case cited shows that the quoted utterance of the eminent judge has no application to the principles involved in, and the circumstances surrounding, this case. That was a case where a preemption claimant tried, through a succession of years, to obtain title to some fractional subdivisions of land, and was prevented, not by any negligence of the register and receiver in the land-office, but on account of their construction of the law, and circular instructions from the general land-office. Afterwards, by act of congress granting a thousand acres of land to the state of Arkansas, for the purpose of building a court-house, the governor selected and sold the land in controversy to one Russell, under whom the defendants held. Of course, many interesting questions were raised during the trial of this case; but the particular circumstances of the case, which called out the quoted utterance, and the intended applications of the principles therein enunciated, can probably be gathered from the balance of the paragraph following the quotation, which is as follows: "In this case the pre-emption right of Cloyes having been proved, and an offer to pay the money for the land claimed by him, under the act of 1830, nothing more could be done by him, and nothing more could be required of him under that act; and, subsequently, when he paid the money to the receiver, under subsequent acts, the surveys being returned, he could do nothing more than to offer to enter the fractions, which the register would not permit him to do." Thus it will be seen that none of the principles involved in the case at bar were involved in that case, and it shows the misleading tendency of quoting detached sentences from the opinions of courts. In that case, the action of Cloyes was at every step a matter of public record, and of official report, and the whole circumstances of the case show that the defendants had actual notice of his claim, though some of them denied such a notice in the answer, while others admitted that they had heard of his claim, but believed it to be fraudulent; but the court spoke with reference to the acts of an officer acting in a judicial capacity, and deciding questions of law,—decisions and acts over which the plaintiff could not possibly exercise any supervision or control. It will certainly not be hard to see that a very different rule might obtain, when the act required by the applicant was purely ministerial, and which he had a right to see was done in the manner prescribed by law. It is doubtful if the judge who rendered that opinion would have concluded that the grantee "had done everything which the law required him to do," when he contented himself with simply handing his deed to the auditor, without exhibiting any further concern about it. In our judgment, the scope and meaning of this opinion has been entirely misconstrued, when applied to this character of cases.

In Mangold v. Barlow, 61 Miss. 593, and one of the best argued cases sustaining the doctrine that the onus is on the purchaser, and a case which is also largely quoted, the court bases its opinion on the peculiar language of the Mississippi statute, which declares that certain instruments "shall be void, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, unless they shall be acknowledged or proved, and lodged with the clerk of the chancery court of the proper county, to be recorded." Here the statute seems, by express terms, to make the lodging of the properly proved instrument with the clerk the proof of constructive notice. And thus it is with a great majority of cases cited in favor of plaintiff's theory. A close examination of them will show that the opinion is based upon some express language of the statute, which would justify the conclusion reached; but, on the general proposition, however, the decided weight of authority seems to be in favor of the view that the record can be relied upon by subsequent purchasers, without actual notice, and that constructive notice cannot be given by an attempt to comply with the registry laws. And this view we think is supported by right reasoning, and founded on principles of equity and justice.

As is most admirably stated by Mr. Jones, in his work on Mortgages: "Registry laws are intended to furnish the best and most easily accessible evidence of the title to real estate, to the end that those designing to purchase may be fully informed of instruments of prior date, affecting the subject of their contemplated purchase; and also that, having availed themselves of this means of knowledge, they may rest there, and purchase in absolute security, provided that they do so without knowledge, information, or such suggestion from other facts as would be gross negligence to ignore of some antecedent conveyance or equitable claim." The recorder cannot be considered the agent of the purchaser, as is asserted by some of the authorities. It is a much fairer construction of the law, and more in harmony with the law of agency generally, to consider him the agent of the party who has the business transaction with him, who gets him to do the work. And to him he should be responsible for any damage flowing from his refusal or neglect to do the work according to the contract between them; and that contract is, either express or implied, that the instrument shall be recorded according to law. That is what the grantee pays him to do, and he must see to it that his work is done right, or accept the consequences as between himself and third parties, who are misled. It cannot be said that the purchaser is alone subject to damages from the non-recording of the instrument. The very object in having it recorded is to give constructive notice to innocent purchasers, and to protect the grantee's title against said purchasers. The law imposes upon him the duty of having his deed recorded. It is not the attempt to record a deed that the law requires; but it is the recording of the deed. It would be an empty benefit, indeed, that would accrue to the buying public if the attempt to record were held to take the place of the record. The obligation rests upon the grantee to give the notice required by the law. He controls the deed. He can put it on record or not, as he pleases. He has the right and the opportunity to see that the work is done as he directs it to be done, in legal manner. No one else has this opportunity, and if, from any cause, he fails to give the notice required by law, the consequences must fall on him. It may be a hardship; but, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the rule is that the misfortune must rest on the person in whose business, and under whose control, it happened, and who had it in his power to avert it. Any other rule would be abhorrent to our natural ideas of right, and would render perilous every business enterprise. The fact that the recorder gives to the grantee a certificate that the deed is properly recorded does not relieve him of the responsibility of seeing that it is actually so recorded. The certificate binds no one but the recorder, and cannot possibly, under any known rule of law or ethics, affect the rights of an innocent purchaser, who cannot be bound by a transaction to which he is in no sense a party, of which he has no knowledge, and for which he is in no way responsible. As we before intimated, it might aid the grantee in recovering damages from the auditor, but could do no more than that. The record is the essence of the law. The recorder is only a convenient instrument for the use of those whose duty it is to make the record. If, under the law, a public record were kept, where every grantee was required to come and record his deed, he could certainly not plead his own mistakes or negligence; and the only reason why every man is not allowed to record his own instruments is simply that the record can be kept in a legible, orderly, and presentable manner; and the law provides one man to do the work for the many; or, in other words, makes the one man the agent for the many, and who does the work at their instance, and under their pay and control. It is true that, in another department of his work, he may be said to be the agent of the purchaser, or searcher of the records; for the law also makes him the custodian of the record books. Every man has a right to see the records, and the law, for the purpose of preserving the records, and assisting the searcher of the records, constitutes the recorder their keeper, who, at certain hours, found by the law to be reasonable, must exhibit them to all who wish to see them, and must also certify to what the record shows, when requested so to do, and paid for said services; and if, in the exercise of either of these duties, he either misrepresents the books, by exhibiting false or blind records, or makes a false certificate, whether through fraud or negligence, the person for whom the service is rendered must suffer the damage, if any flow from the negligent or fraudulent act, and his only remedy is against the recorder for damages. A. employed the recorder to search the records, and the recorder certified to A. that the record title to a certain tract of land stopped with, and rested in, B., upon the strength of which A. purchased of B., for a valuable consideration, said land, and it afterwards eventuated that C. had a good deed on record for the same land, which the recorder overlooked. No well-regulated court would, we think hold that the title of C. would be jeopardized by the mistaken certificate of the recorder. We cannot conceive how the inconsistency or injustice would be diminished by holding that the innocent purchaser did not have a right to rely on the true record, or that the grantee would be protected by the false or mistaken certificate of the recorder.

With this view of the case, it becomes necessary to investigate the next question involved, viz.: Is the index an essential part of the record, under the registration laws of this state? On this proposition, also, there is conflict of authority, though the conflict in many cases is more seeming than real; for, as with the first question discussed, a great many of the decisions, which are cited as in point on the abstract principle, prove, upon close investigation, to have been decided upon statutory provisions differing materially from ours. And as constructive notice, by means of recorded instruments, depends wholly upon statutory provisions, we will first examine the statute in force at that time. The statutes in force at the time of the alleged constructive notice will be found in the Session Laws of 1869, on pages 313, 314, and 315, and the sections to be construed in this case are as follows: "Sec. 18. The auditor of each county in this territory shall record, in a fair and legible handwriting, in books to be provided by him for that purpose, at the expense of the county, all deeds, mortgages, and other instruments of writing required by law to be recorded, and which shall be presented to him for that purpose, and the same shall be recorded in regular succession, according to the priority of their presentation, and, if a mortgage, the precise time of the day in which the same was presented shall also be recorded. Sec. 19. Upon the presentation of any deed, or other instrument of writing, for record, the auditor shall indorse thereon the date of its presentation, * * * and, when such deed, or other instrument of writing, shall be recorded, the recorder shall indorse thereon the time when recorded, and the number or letter and page of the book in which the same is recorded." Section 20 prescribes the penalty for failing to record when fees are tendered. Section 21 provides for keeping a seal, and making copies of records. Section 22 directs the turning over the records to successor in office. "Sec. 23. Each auditor shall, upon the written demand of any person, make out a statement in writing, certified under his hand and the seal of his office, of all mortgages, liens, and incumbrances of any kind of record in his office, in relation to any real or personal property, in relation to which the demand shall be made; and, if said statement shall be incorrect, he, and the sureties upon his official bond, shall be liable to the person aggrieved for all damages sustained by him in consequence of such incorrect statement, to be recovered in a civil action. Sec. 24. Each county auditor shall keep a general index, direct and inverted. The index direct shall be divided into seven columns, with heads to the respective columns, as follows:

He shall correctly enter into such index every instrument concerning or affecting real estate, the names of the grantors being in alphabetical order. The inverted index shall be divided into seven columns precisely similar, only that the names of the grantees shall be alphabetically arranged, and occupy the second column. Sec. 25. Whenever any mortgage, bond, lien, or instrument incumbering real estate has been satisfied, released, or discharged from record, whether by written release across the record, or upon the margin thereof, or by the recording of an instrument of release, or acknowledgment of satisfaction, the auditor shall immediately note in both the indices, in the column headed 'Remarks,' opposite to the appropriate entry, that such instrument, lien, or incumbrance has been satisfied." These different sections were not only all passed at the same session of the legislature, but are all incorporated in one act, and must, therefore, be construed together; and, construing them as a whole, we conclude that sections 18, 19, and 24 intended to provide a system for the registration of deeds and other instruments affecting real estate, the compliance with which would be constructive notice to strangers. The act points out several successive steps to be taken by the auditor, when the instrument comes into his possession, before his duty with reference to it is accomplished: (1) He must file it for record, noting the time when it was presented for record; (2) record it in a fair, legible hand, in a book provided by the county for that purpose; (3) correctly enter it into an index book provided for that purpose, showing the time of reception, names of the grantor and grantee, nature of the instrument, volume and page where recorded, and description of the property; and all three of these successive steps must be taken before the record is complete. The other sections, which we have quoted, are simply directory to the auditor, or affect, simply, the auditor, and the person with whom he is dealing; but the three requirements, specified above, are for the direct and only purpose of giving notice to the public. They are vital provisions, essential to constitute constructive notice. The appellee's counsel cites section 4 of the act of November 9, 1877, which is as follows: "All deeds and mortgages shall be recorded in the office of the county auditor of the county where the land is situated, and shall be valid, as against bona fide purchasers, from the date of their filing or recording in said office, and when so filed or recorded shall be notice to all the world;" and argues, from that, that legal notice is given simply by filing the deed with the county auditor, and that no other notice is necessary. If that view could be entertained, it would practically render the provision, in regard to recording, a nullity; for the notice would be complete when the instrument was filed, and no man would go to the unnecessary expense of recording, and the record would soon become a voluminous and unapproachable mass of loose papers. There was evidently no such contemplation by the statutes. The auditor has 20 days within which to record the deed after it is filed, and it is the evident meaning of the law that it would be notice by virtue of the filing only during the interim of 20 days, at the expiration of which time it is presumed to be recorded, and the deed can be withdrawn, when the record becomes the notice. Or, as is more elegantly stated by Judge DILLON, in Barney v. McCarty, 15 Iowa, 519, in construing a similar statute: "As the filing is but one step in a series of steps, this language presupposes, and is in fact based upon the assumption, that the other, and, in the order of time, the subsequent, requirements of the law will be observed." The Iowa statute was substantially as ours, except that the recorder was required to keep a "fair book," in which he entered every deed, giving date, parties, and description of land, in addition to an index with about the same requirements as ours. So that there was really more chance for an innocent purchaser to be put on his guard, under their registration laws, in the absence of the index, than under ours; and yet the supreme court of that state has uniformly held that the index was necessary to give constructive notice. We are strengthened in our opinion that the index is an essential part of the record, necessary to give notice, by the provisions of section 25, which require that the satisfaction of instruments affecting real estate shall be noted in the index. The legislature, recognizing the importance of the index, and the universal custom of depending upon the index, in searching the record, required that every step taken, both as to conveying, incumbering, and releasing real estate, should be made to appear briefly on the index. It is asserted by plaintiffs "that the general construction placed upon statutes similar to ours is that the index constitutes no part of the record, and that a grantee cannot suffer from any error or omission in it;" and, in defense of this proposition, cites: Musgrove v. Bonser, 5 Or. 313; Bishop v. Schneider, 46 Mo. 472; Chatham v. Bradford, 50 Ga. 327; Curtis v. Lyman, 24 Vt. 338; and Devl. Deeds, §§ 695-697.

In the first case cited (Musgrove v. Bonser) the court decided—First, that a deed, which had been acknowledged in Washington Territory by an officer, other than a commissioner of deeds for Oregon, where the deed did not have the certificate of a certifying officer of a court of record under seal that the acknowledging officer was such officer as he represented himself to be at the time of said acknowledgment, was not entitled to record under the statute, and therefore did not give notice; second, that the recording acts of Oregon only protect persons who act in good faith; and, third, cited a case of Hastings v. Cutler, 4 Fost. (N. H.) 481, holding that, where a defective deed has been recorded, while it did not operate as constructive notice of the conveyance it might operate as actual notice, and the court, in the case above cited, said: "But if, by means of that registration of the defective deed, the defendants had actual notice of the plaintiff's title, they are charged with the notice. When the defendants found the copy of the plaintiff's deed on record they must have understood that the intended record was to give information that such a deed had been made, and that plaintiff claimed the land under it. This must be regarded as actual notice, such as every reasonable and honest man would feel bound to act on." There is no suggestion of an index in the case; but it is plain that on the other proposition, which we have already considered, the plaintiff's case does not fall within the reason upon which this conclusion is based. In that case, it might be urged, with some degree of justice, that there was enough revealed by the record to put the purchaser on his guard, and, once being notified of the conveyance, it would be his duty to investigate; and if, from such investigation, the will of the grantor could be gathered, he would not be an innocent purchaser if he purchased contrary to such revealed will. But, in the case at bar, the very instrument by which this notice is given is wanting, and the avenues of knowledge are closed up.

In Bishop v. Schneider, the court holds that the index is no part of the record, asserting that the proper office of the index is what its name imports, to point out the record; "that the grantee has no control over the official acts of the recorder, and, when he delivers his deed to the officer, he has performed all the duty within his power." But the court states that this decision is based alone on the construction of the statutes of that state, and they are materially different from ours, both with regard to the definiteness of the index concerning deeds, and the absence of the requirements to note the satisfaction of mortgages, and other instruments affecting real estate, in the index. Altogether their statute does not make the index so important a part of the system of registration as ours does. Their statute also provides that, when an instrument is filed with the recorder, it shall be considered as recorded from the time it is delivered. The opinion in this case quotes approvingly the case of Sawyer v. Adams, 8 Vt. 172. There, the town-clerk copied a deed, delivered to him for record, on a book which had ceased to be a book for recording for a number of years, and, for the purpose of concealment and fraud, did not insert the names in the index or alphabet. It was held that the deed was not recorded, and was not notice to after-purchasers. This is indorsed by the Missouri case, on account of the fraud that was perpetrated. But it seems to us that it makes little difference, so far as the equities of the innocent purchaser are concerned, whether the obscurity of the record was the result of fraud or negligence on the part of the recorder. Certainly there is no logical basis for such a discrimination. The rights of the purchaser must depend upon something more tangible, and more easily ascertained, than the motive of the officer. Evidently, the idea upon which the decision in this case was based was that the searcher of title had been misled by the state of the record. But, as a practical fact, he would have been no more liable to have been misled by reason of the deed being recorded in an unused book than if it had been recorded in the proper book, and not indexed. The recording in the unused book was an unnecessary act of caution on the part of the recorder in his attempt to deceive.

In Chatham v. Bradford, 50 Ga. 327, while the court, to a certain extent, argues the general proposition, insisting that an index is only a means of access to the record, and that ease of access is wholly a question of degree, it says "that many of the records of that state have no index; that their acts for the recording of deeds do not any of them require the clerk to keep an index;" and states, in conclusion, that they put their decision mainly on their own statutes, and on the condition of the records, and the uniform practice of that state. They also approvingly cite Sawyer v. Adams.

Curtis v. Lyman, 24 Vt. 388, cited by plaintiff on this point, we have been unable to obtain; but, from reference to it in other cases, we conclude that their statute is different from ours in reference to indexing. Considering the difference in the statutes, we think that none of the cases cited are directly in point. While it is true that Devlin, in his work on Deeds, (section 696,) seems to imply that an index is not necessary to give constructive notice, yet he evidently bases the idea not so much on the theory that the index is not a part of the record, as from his general conclusion that the obligation of the grantee, as to notice, ceases when he has filed his deed for record. And he qualifies this general statement by saying, "Unless the language of the statute necessarily leads to a different conclusion," a qualification, it seems to us, which renders meaningless the general statement; for, as constructive notice is purely statutory, it must necessarily follow that it is the "language of the statute" that leads to one or the other of the conclusions. He cites Barney v. Little, 15 Iowa, 527, but says that "the decision in that case was founded upon the express language of the statute of that state," intimating that, in consideration of the statute, the conclusion of the court was correct; and, inasmuch as our statutes make the index a more important factor in the system of registration than does the Iowa statute, we may fairly conclude that, under a statute like ours, this learned author would consider the index an essential part of the record. Indeed, upon a painstaking investigation, not only of all the cases cited by plaintiff, (except the Vermont case, above referred to,) but of many others, we have been unable to find a case reported, which decides that an index is not an essential part of the record, upon a statute substantially like the registry laws of 1869. It is true that in numerous cases it has been decided that, where an instrument affecting realty was not indexed, as required by law, the title of the grantee should not be disturbed. The greater part of such decisions, however, will be found, on examination, not to be based on the theory that the index is not a part of the record, but upon the broad principle that the recording officer is the agent of the subsequent purchaser, and that the grantee is acquitted, when he places his deed for record in the hands of the proper officer,—a position which, we think, is untenable for the reasons above given. It is urged by the court, in Schell v. Stein, 76 Pa. St. 398, in deciding the case adversely to the interest of the purchaser, that the provision for indexing the records is of comparatively modern origin, and that such provisions did not exist in the early registry laws. This, we think, is a good argument; but the application by the learned judge was in our judgment bad. The law was, no doubt, suggested by the necessity of some such provisions as the records accumulated, and, at the present day, considering the accumulations of deeds, mortgages, and liens of all kinds, affecting real estate, and the rapidity with which titles are changing every day, if we give the effect of constructive notice to the record at all, the only practical way by which the public can obtain the benefit of that notice is through the medium of the index. Laws are enacted for the benefit of the citizen; not only in theory, but in practice. They are not intended as pitfalls for the feet of the unwary. The state provides in express terms for the keeping of this index; and its mandate to the auditor is to enter in said index, in alphabetical order, the names of the grantors and grantees. This law the citizen is aware of. He has a right to presume that the law has been obeyed. If there was no such law, and he had abundance of time, and untold patience, he might devote himself to the task of examining the vast accumulations of records, page by page; but with the law in effect, and the universal custom recognized, of examining the record through the index, if the instrument is not indexed, the law, instead of aiding and protecting the citizen, becomes a delusion and a snare, and a ready vehicle for collusion and fraud. It would be a policy worthy of the consideration of the ancient tyrant, who wrote his laws in small characters, and posted them so high that his subjects could not read them, while, at the same time, he held them accountable for their strict observance. In this connection, we cannot refrain from quoting the language of the court, in Barney v. McCarty, that "a deed might as well be buried in the earth as in a mass of records, without a clue to its whereabouts." In Speer v. Evans, 47 Pa. St. 141, the court says: "As a guide to inquirers, the index is an indispensable part of the record, and, without it, the record affects no party without notice." This, we think, is the better view of the law. In this case, there is no question of actual notice, and applying the law, as we have found it to be, to the case at bar, it follows that the judgment of the lower court must be reversed. The case is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to reverse the judgment.

STAPLES V. MAY. (No. 12,167.)

MORTGAGES—DESCRIPTION—RECEIVERS—TRESPASS.

1. A mortgage of a specifically described tract of land in which is a vein or lode of metal on which some mining has been done, with all the mines, minerals, mining rights, privileges, and appurtenances belonging or appertaining to the same, does not cover an undeveloped portion of the lode contained in land adjoining the tract described, and in which also is the situs of the lode.

2. On the same day that the mortgage was given on the specifically described tract, the owner, a mining company, executed a deed of trust thereon to secure other indebtedness. The trust-deed also covered all lands, mines, etc., owned by the company. It appeared that the title to said adjoining tract was in the United States, except that the mining company claimed it, and its claim to title was recognized by its immediate neighbors, though it had not extended its mining operations into said tract, or inclosed it. Held, that the trust-deed did not cover said tract.

3. At the time of commencing suit to foreclose the mortgage and trust-deed, an ex parte order was made on application of complainants, appointing a receiver of the company's property, to take charge of and preserve it, and he was authorized to borrow money to work the mine and do things necessary for the preservation of the property. At this time the company owned the adjoining tract of land, and had a station thereon connected with the mines in the mortgaged tract, and worked as a part of the same general system, under a single management. The minerals extracted from the whole system by the receiver did not pay the expenses, but in the mining done on said adjacent tract there was a profit. Held, that the receiver had no right to take ores from such tract, and that for such profit he was liable to a general creditor of the company on supplementary proceedings against the company.

Reversing 23 Pac. Rep. 710.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 23 Pac. Rep. 710.

T. I. Bergin, for appellant. S. F. Leib (L. D. McKisick, of counsel,) for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an appeal from an order overruling defendant's motion for a new trial. The cause was originally submitted in department 1, where the order appealed from was reversed upon grounds stated in an opinion by Commissioner FOOTE, opinion filed March 31, 1890, 23 Pac. Rep. 710. After a rehearing, and a more careful consideration of the record, we find it necessary to modify in some particulars the statement of the case as then made. The facts are as follows: On the 1st day of August, 1881, in the superior court of Santa Clara county, the plaintiff and respondent herein recovered a judgment against the Santa Clara Mining Association of Baltimore, a foreign corporation, for $5,000, upon which execution was issued and returned unsatisfied. She then, proceeding under sections 717-720, of the Code of Civil Procedure, cited this defendant to answer as to his indebtedness to the corporation, and in due course obtained an order from the superior court, authorizing her to institute and prosecute an action to recover any indebtedness owing by said defendant to said corporation. In pursuance of that order she commenced this action in October, 1881. In her complaint she sets out the proceedings above mentioned, and alleges that, between July 19, 1880, and May 31, 1881, said corporation was the owner of a tract of land containing 161 acres in Santa Clara county, together with the minerals and ores therein contained. This allegation is not only not denied by the answer, but is expressly found by the court to be true, and is in no wise assailed by the appellant, so that this fact, at least, may be set down as unquestionable: that between the dates mentioned the Santa Clara Mining Association of Baltimore was the owner of the tract of land specifically described in the complaint, together with the ores and minerals therein contained. Whether the corporation was so the owner of said tract at a prior date—that is, at the date of the mortgage and trust-deed hereinafter mentioned—is, as will be seen, one of the principal questions in the case, and will call for some discussion in its proper connection. Returning to the plaintiff's complaint, her only other allegations, which it is necessary to note here, are that between said dates (July 19, 1880, and May 31, 1881,) the defendant entered into and upon said tract of land, mined and extracted therefrom ore of the value of $100,000 and upwards, reduced the same to quicksilver, sold it, and received therefor over $100,000, no part of which had been paid to said corporation. These allegations are denied in the answer, and, in addition to such denials, the defendant sets out, with great fullness, the proceedings in a foreclosure suit against said corporation, in which he was appointed receiver of the property mortgaged, which included, as he alleges, the land and mine specifically described in the complaint in this action.

The facts with respect to the mortgage, action to foreclose, appointment of defendant as receiver, and his proceedings under such appointment, are as follows: In the year 1873 said Santa Clara Mining Association was the owner of a tract of land in Santa Clara county, containing about 1,100 acres, and adjoining the tract described in the complaint herein. In this 1,100-acre tract there existed a vein or lode of cinnabar, upon which some mining had been done, but at that time the lode had not been worked or explored outside of the limits of that particular tract. Such being the case on the 14th of June, 1873, said corporation, to secure its bond for $100,000, executed a mortgage to McCalmont, and on the same day, to secure its bonds to the amount of $400,000, executed a deed of trust to a loan and trust company. In the year 1880 an action was commenced by the assignee of the McCalmont mortgage against the mortgagor and numerous other parties, including the trustees under said trust-deed, to foreclose the mortgage. The complaint in this action alleged the insolvency of the corporation, the existence of mines and mining works upon the mortgaged premises, the danger of loss and destruction to the property, the mine especially, if the pumps were stopped, and mining operations suspended during the litigation, and prayed the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property, and to protect and preserve it. Accordingly an order was made ex parte at the time of the commencement of the suit appointing this defendant such receiver, and from time to time thereafter other orders were made by the superior court, authorizing him to borrow large sums of money to enable him to work the mine, pay taxes, and do other things deemed necessary for the preservation of the property which was the subject of the litigation. In pursuance of these orders, the defendant entered into possession of the mine and other property, borrowed money, extracted ore, reduced it to quicksilver, which he sold, and applied the proceeds, with the general result of leaving himself, at the end of the litigation, indebted to the extent of about $60,000 for borrowed money. But, although his entire operations resulted in the loss of this large sum, there was one part of the lode, known as "Station 8," from which he took about $138,000, at a cost of about $100,000, leaving a net profit of $38,200, all of which was prior to May 1, 1881, and two years before entry of the decree in the foreclosure suit. It is to this $38,200, or a share of it, that the plaintiff herein makes claim, upon the ground that station 8, the part of the lode from which the ore producing it was taken, is entirely outside of the mortgaged premises, and, consequently, that the appellant, as receiver in the foreclosure suit, had no right to enter there; that he was in fact a trespasser, and became liable to the corporation for at least the net value of the ore. Such was the view of the superior court, and such the theory upon which the judgment in favor of the respondent was based.

First. It is claimed that the McCalmont mortgage embraced station 8. But this position we do not think can be sustained. Station 8 is a part of the lode, the situs of which is within the 160-acre tract specifically described in the complaint herein, and wholly without the 1,100-acre tract to which said mining corporation had title at the date of the McCalmont mortgage, and at that time the lode had not been followed beyond the limits of said tract. The following is the description contained in the mortgage: "All that certain parcel or tract of land being and lying in the county of Santa Clara, state of California, designated as lot number thirty-nine, (39,) in township eight (8) south, of range one (1) east, and lot number forty, (40,) in township eight (8) south, of range (1) west, of the Mount Diablo meridian, containing eleven hundred and nine acres and sixty-seven hundredths of an acre, being the same parcel or tract of land more particularly described and delineated by 'plat,' and to which title was confirmed in and by that certain patent issued by the United States of America on the twentieth day of September, A. D. eighteen hundred and seventy-one, recorded in Liber B patents, page 31, on the twelfth day of October, 1871, and being the same premises described in the above recited mortgage to R. D. Cullen, together with all and singular the buildings and improvements thereupon erected, made, or being, and the rights, roads, ways, waters, mines, minerals, mining rights, machinery, privileges, appurtenances, and advantages to the same belonging, or in anywise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and all the estate and interest, right, title, use, trust, claim, and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity, of the said Santa Clara Mining Association of Baltimore, in, unto, and out of the said described property and premises, or any part thereof." It is evident that this description cannot be stretched to cover an undeveloped portion of the lode contained in land adjoining the tract described. It is neither parcel of nor appurtenant to such tract, nor does it become so by being subsequently connected by workings on the lode with that portion of the mine included in the description.

Second. It is contended that the description in the trust-deed to the loan and trust company is sufficiently comprehensive to include station 8, and that, since the parties secured by the trust-deed were parties to the foreclosure suit, claiming affirmative relief, and concurring in the application for the appointment of May as receiver, he was thereby authorized to enter and mine at station 8. It is one objection to this proposition that it appears that the defendant extracted all the ore and made all the profit from station 8, with which he is charged in this action, before the loan and trust company sought the foreclosure of their deed, or asked for his appointment. But, without regard to this objection, the force of which we do not care to consider, we think it must be held that the description in the trust-deed embraces no more than that of the McCalmont mortgage, for it contains nothing material in addition to the description above quoted, except these words: "And all the lands, tenements, mines, minerals, real and personal property, rights, privileges, and appurtenances, of every kind whatsoever, of or belonging to said party hereto of the first part, in Santa Clara county, aforesaid." This part of the description would no doubt have embraced station 8, if the land in which it is found had belonged to the corporation at the date of the trust-deed. But it did not belong to the corporation at that time. The court so finds, by finding as it does that no part of the tract described in the complaint herein was included in said trust-deed, and there is nothing in the bill of exceptions to show that this finding was contrary to the evidence. The statement in respect to this matter is as follows: "That it was the owner of the lands, premises, and property specifically described in the McCalmont mortgage in the answer of the defendant herein mentioned, and of the lands, premises, and property specifically described in the deed of trust to the 'Farmers' Loan and Trust Company' of New York, in the answer of the defendant herein mentioned, at the time of the execution of both of said instruments; that the particular piece of land in the complaint in this action described is not included in the specific metes and bounds of the lands described in the said McCalmont mortgage, or in the lands specifically described in the said deed of trust of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, mentioned therein; that at the time of the execution of the said McCalmont mortgage and said deed of trust the legal title thereto was in the United States, and has thence hitherto been, and still is, in the United States, otherwise than as such title may be affected or modified by the facts following,—that is to say: At the time of the execution of the said McCalmont mortgage and said deed of trust, and prior thereto, said Santa Clara Mining Association made claim of title thereto; that said particularly described parcel of land immediately joins upon the lands described in said McCalmont mortgage and in said deed of trust, and there was no fence, inclosure, or line separating said particularly described parcel of land from the lands included in the said McCalmont mortgage and in said deed of trust; that at that time said Santa Clara Mining Association had not extended its mining operations into or upon any part of said parcel of land in said complaint particularly described; that at that time the claim of title of said Santa Clara Mining Association to said parcel of land in said complaint particularly described was in fact recognized by the immediate neighbors in that vicinity, but the same was not then inclosed by any fence or inclosure separating the same from the lands surrounding it; that subsequently to the execution of said instruments the same was inclosed by inclosures, which, with the inclosures inclosing the land specifically described in the said McCalmont mortgage and in said deed of trust, would make a complete inclosure, save and except that on the southerly part of said parcel of land in said complaint particularly described there was no fence; on the side of said land not so fenced the same consisted of a cañon, which cañon of itself constituted a natural barrier, preventing cattle from getting into or going out of said parcel of land in said complaint particularly described, and which cañon constituted the only inclosure upon that side of said parcel of land in said complaint particularly described." This statement fully sustains the finding that at the date of the trust-deed the smaller tract, containing station 8, did not belong to the corporation, and also supports the finding, if it needed support, that during the time defendant was mining at said station said smaller tract did belong to the corporation, at least as against all persons not connecting themselves with the source of title by compliance with the mining laws of the United States.

Third. The third point of the appellant is disposed of in saying, as we have already said, that neither the mortgage nor the trust-deed embraces station 8.

Fourth. It is contended that, even if station 8 was not covered by the mortgage or trust-deed, it was comprehended in the terms of the order appointing the receiver, and, being at that time connected with the mines in the larger tract, and worked as a part of the same general system, under a single management, and as the proceeds of that, as well as of other parts of the lode, were devoted to the care and preservation of the whole, it necessarily participated in the advantages derived from the appointment of the receiver; an advantage which inured to the mortgagor in enhancing the value of the security and diminishing its personal liability. Wherefore it is contended May could not have become liable to the corporation as a trespasser, and, if not, that he was never liable to the plaintiff.

This position also appears to be untenable. As to the terms of the order, if they embraced property not included in either of the securities, the order was to that extent in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and void. But, construed with reference to the pleadings upon which they were based, the several orders appointing the receiver and defining his powers and duties did not apply to any property except that against which the foreclosure was sought. We do not think the receiver had even color of authority to extract ores within the tract described in the complaint herein, and thus destroy the very substance of an estate in which the mortgagees and beneficiaries of the trust had no direct interest, but which was, on the contrary, subject to the claims of the general creditors of the corporation. Nor do we think that the circumstance that station 8 was connected with other portions of the mine, with which it was worked as part of the same system, and under a single management, makes any difference. It was none the less a distinct piece of property, to which the mortgagees and the receiver, as their agent, had no right. While they remained in the hands of the mortgagor it was perfectly natural that both properties should be worked together, if that was the more economical plan; just as a farmer might work a mortgaged and an unmortgaged tract together, or, to give a more forcible illustration, just as owners of separate locations on the same vein often use the same shaft and hoisting apparatus for raising ores, or as many locators sometimes combine for the purpose of pumping water from the lower levels. In all such cases there is a common system of working, but the properties are distinct. A receiver of a mortgaged field would have no right to cut timber from other land of the mortgagor to build fences or houses on the tract covered by the mortgage, although it might be for the benefit of the mortgagor, by preserving or enhancing the value of the security and lessening his personal liability. And, moreover, there is nothing to show in this case that the value of the security was in any degree enhanced by the extraction and reduction of the ores. No doubt it was necessary to pump the water out of the mine, and very probably it appeared at the time to be a wise measure to carry on mining at the same time with the pumping; but if this was so, we know of no principle upon which station 8 could be charged with the expense of keeping other parts of the mine free of water. And if it be said that the works at station 8 were also preserved by and participated in the benefits of the pumping, it may be replied that there is nothing to show that its equitable share of the expense of pumping was not included in the $100,000 deducted from the gross value of the ores extracted from station 8.

As to the claim that the corporation stood by and saw what May was doing, and, by not objecting, tacitly approved his proceedings, it does not appear to be borne out by the record. The orders appointing the receiver were made ex parte. It is not shown that their terms, or the proceedings of the receiver under them, ever came to the knowledge of the corporation. It does appear that the corporation was insolvent, and it seems to have left its creditors to get what they could out of its property, without making any sign of approval or objection to their proceedings. The only presumption we are entitled to indulge under such circumstances is that it desired its property to go to its creditors according to their respective legal rights, viz., the mortgaged property to its mortgagees, and the rest to its creditors at large. No advantage could possibly accrue to it from any other disposition, for just so far as its ultimate personal liability to its mortgagees might be diminished by taking from its unpledged assets to enhance the security of the mortgagees, just so far was its ultimate liability to the general creditors increased. Assuming, therefore, as we ought to assume, that the actual desire of the corporation was that its unpledged assets should be devoted to the payment of its general creditors, and that it never either expressly or tacitly approved the proceedings of the receiver in removing the ores from station 8, we must hold that he became liable to the corporation for the net proceeds of such ores.

It is strenuously contended that this conclusion does a great injustice to the receiver, and that an opposite conclusion would do no injustice to the general creditors, because it is said the ores in place were not liable to attachment, and were only made available by means of a fund raised upon the credit of the secured creditors. We cannot, however, see the injustice of requiring the receiver to put back into the fund, where it belongs, a sum of money to which he never had a right; and as to the other proposition, we do not know why the 160 acres of land with all its ores in place was not liable to attachment, nor is there anything to show that the ores in place at station 8 were worth less than their net proceeds.

Fifth. It is contended that the liability of May, which sounded wholly in tort, was not the subject of garnishment or attachment. The question here, however, is not what classes of debts are the subject of garnishment or attachment, but what liabilities of third parties to an execution debtor can be reached by proceedings supplemental to the execution. We know of no reason to hold to any narrower construction of our statutory provisions on this subject than obtains in New York, where it is said that these proceedings can reach everything which could formerly have been made to contribute to the payment of judgments by the aid of creditors' bills, and where it was held that creditors' bills would reach choses in action arising from torts committed on the property of the judgment debtor to which his creditor would have a right to resort. Freem. Ex'ns, § 420; Hudson v. Plets, 11 Paige, 180.

The sixth objection of the appellant has been sufficiently stated and considered in connection with the fourth. We find no error in the order of the superior court, and it is therefore affirmed.

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—LACHES.

1. A motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file the transcript in time, made pursuant to a notice given before the settlement of the bill of exceptions, will be denied, where the bill of exceptions was settled and allowed only two days before the return-day of the notice.

2. Laches in having a bill of exceptions settled or allowed is a question which addresses itself to the lower court in allowing the bill, but is not a ground for dismissing the appeal in the supreme court.

3. Failure to file the undertaking on appeal within five days after the service of the notice of appeal, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 940, renders the appeal ineffectual for any purpose.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Fisher Ames and W. C. Burnett, for appellants. Flournoy & Mhoon, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order refusing to strike out a cost-bill. The motion is made on several grounds:

1. That the transcript is not filed in time. The papers filed here show that at the time the notice of motion was given, the bill of exceptions to be used on the appeal had not been settled and allowed. It was so settled and allowed only two days before the return-day of the notice. The appeal cannot therefore be dismissed on that ground.

2. On the ground of laches, and that appellant is not acting in good faith. This is based upon laches in having the bill of exceptions settled and allowed. Laches in that particular might in certain cases be good ground for refusing to settle and allow the bill, but it is a question which addresses itself to the court below, and this court cannot review its action in that regard except upon appeal.

3. That the appeal was not taken or perfected within the time allowed by law. The notice of appeal was served and filed March 24, 1887. The undertaking on appeal was not filed until April 30, 1887. Under section 940, Code Civil Proc., the appeal was "ineffectual for any purpose." It must, therefore, be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

MARTIN V. MORGAN. (No. 13,783.)
SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DILIGENCE BY COM-PLAINANT.

A contract to convey land which provides for the payment of the purchase price within 60 days from its date, "otherwise this agreement to be null and void," clearly shows the intention of the parties to make time the essence of the contract; and the failure of the vendee or their assignee to make or tender payment within the specified time precludes them for maintaining an action for the specific performance of the contract.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Church & Cory, for appellant. R. H. Ward and Sayle & Coldwell, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an action to compel specific performance of a unilateral contract by which the respondent agreed to convey to appellant's assignors a certain tract of land at any time within 60 days from the date of said contract, upon the following express conditions: The said assignors to pay to respondent $150 of the purchase money down on the delivery of said contract, and the balance within 60 days from the date thereof, otherwise said agreement to be null and void. One hundred and fifty dollars was paid on the delivery of the contract, but the balance of the purchase price, to-wit, $4,350, was not paid or tendered within 60 days from the date of said contract. As an excuse for not paying said balance within said 60 days, the plaintiff in his complaint alleges that, before the expiration of said 60 days from the date of said contract, the defendant, for a valuable consideration, extended the time of performance on the part of his assignors to a reasonable time after the expiration of said 60 days. The court found that the defendant never extended the time for the performance of the conditions expressed in said agreement, or for the payment of any money stipulated to be paid as balance of the purchase price of said land, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. From that judgment and the order overruling his motion for a new trial, this appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff. We cannot say that the finding, of which we have above given the substance, was not justified by the evidence. We shall therefore consider the case as we would were there no claim made of an extension of the time specified in the written contract for the payment of the deferred payment. As before stated, plaintiff's assignors agreed to pay defendant $150 of said purchase money down, upon the delivery of the agreement, and the balance within 60 days from the date thereof, (August 31, 1887,) otherwise the agreement to be null and void. Neither plaintiff nor his assignors performed, or offered to perform, the conditions expressed in said agreement within 60 days from the date thereof, and said agreement was not assigned to plaintiff within 60 days from the date thereof. The court finds that the plaintiff, after the assignment of said agreement to him, offered to pay and tendered all the balance of the purchase money required to be paid by said agreement. No other excuse or reason than the one above stated is alleged in the complaint, by plaintiff or his assignors, for non-performance of the condition expressed in the contract. The plaintiff alleges that, upon the delivery of said contract to his assignors, they entered into the possession of said land, and expended the sum of $270 in valuable improvements. The court finds: "That said M. J. and P. B. Donahoo (plaintiff's assignors) accepted said agreement, and paid said sum of $150, and plowed said land, surveyed, mapped, and platted it into lots, but did not expend any sum of money whatever in the improvement of said real property." This finding is justified by the evidence introduced by the plaintiff as to what his assignors did upon the land, although one of the witnesses stated that the expense of the plowing was $30. We are not prepared to hold that what was done upon the land constituted an improvement. We think the finding last above quoted is a sufficient finding that plaintiff's assignor entered into possession of said land at the time alleged in plaintiff's complaint. The precise time at which plaintiff tendered the deferred payment provided for in the contract does not appear. But the court finds that he took an assignment of the contract after the time of making said payment had expired; and that, after he had received such assignment, he offered to pay all of the balance of the purchase money due thereunder.

This brings us to what we deem the principal question in the case. Was time made the essence of this contract? In other words, is the intent to make it so clearly, unequivocally, and unmistakably shown by the stipulation? The defendant's stipulation was that he would convey at any time within 60 days from the date of said agreement upon certain express conditions, one of which is that the final payment of the purchase money should be made within 60 days from the date of said agreement, otherwise the "agreement to be null and void." The contention of appellant's counsel, that the general rule of equity is that "time is not the essence of the contract," is not supported by any modern authority. The general rule, as expressed by 3 Pars. Cont. (7th Ed.) 339, and by this court, in Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359, is that "time is not necessarily the essence of a contract." But it may be made so. Prof. POMEROY says: "It is now thoroughly established that the intention of the parties must govern, and, if the intention clearly and unequivocally appears from the contract, by means of some express stipulation, that time shall be essential, the time of completion or of performance or of complying with the terms will be regarded as essential in equity as much as at law. No particular form of stipulation is necessary; but any clause will have the effect which clearly and absolutely provides that the contract is to be void, if the fulfillment is not within the prescribed time." Pom. Cont. 462. Among the numerous cases cited by the learned author in support of this doctrine is that of Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, decided by Chancellor KENT. In that case the contract was signed by the defendant only, and he agreed to give a deed upon certain express conditions being performed by the plaintiff at the specified times; "but if he should fail in them, or either of them, the agreement to be void." The plaintiff failed to perform within the time specified, but offered to after the expiration of that time. The opinion of the learned chancellor is the most full and satisfactory explanation of the question involved in this case that has ever fallen under our observation; but we deem it unnecessary to quote more from it than the following: "There was an express stipulation in this contract that, if the plaintiff failed in either of his payments, the agreement was to be void. The first question which naturally presents itself is whether the time was not here made part of the essence of the contract, and whether the contract did not become void on the failure of the plaintiff to make the first payment." He held that it was, and decreed accordingly. In that case the intention of the parties to make time the essence of the contract did not more clearly and unequivocally appear than it does in this case. Grey v. Tubbs, supra, is in the same line as Benedict v. Lynch. In Grey v. Tubbs, this court said: "Courts of equity have not the power to make contracts for parties, nor to alter those which the parties have deliberately made; and, whenever it appears that the parties have in fact contracted that, if the purchaser make default in the payments as agreed upon, he shall not be entitled to a conveyance, and shall lose the benefit of his purchase, and when it also appears that the purchaser is without excuse for his delay, the courts will not relieve him from the consequences of his default." Judgment and order affirmed.

STREET ASSESSMENTS—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN.

1. Laws Cal. 1885, p. 147, § 7, provides that the expense of work on a street under the act "shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, * * * each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed in proportion to frontage." Section 8 provides that the assessment shall show the number of each lot, and the assessment thereon, with the name of the owner, or, if he is unknown, then "unknown" shall be writ ten opposite the number, and for a diagram showing the location of each lot with reference to the work done, and that the warrant of assessment shall then be recorded with the superintendent of streets. Section 9 declares that when so recorded "the several amounts assessed shall be a lien upon the lands or portions of lots assessed, respectively." Held, that the liability of each lot is a separate cause of action, and foreclosure of the lien upon one lot will not prevent a subsequent action against the same person to foreclose on another lot owned by him.

2. Under section 12, allowing an attorney's fee in all cases of recovery in actions to foreclose the lien, the fee may be allowed as to each lot, although owned by the same person.

3. Where the warrant of assessment was properly signed by the superintendent of streets, and countersigned by the mayor as required by the act, the fact that the signature of the mayor was omitted in recording the warrant did not invalidate the assessment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Luce, McDonald & Henderson, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Lamme, for respondents.

GIBSON, C. This action was brought to foreclose a street-assessment lien for the grading of Logan avenue, in the city of San Diego. The defendant, in his answer, put in issue some of the material allegations of the complaint, and, as one of his affirmative defenses, set up a former recovery in another action between the same parties. This plea in bar was, upon plaintiffs' motion, stricken out, and upon the trial subsequently had before the court, without a jury, judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, from which the defendant appeals. Appellant's counsel maintain that the court erred in striking out the plea in bar. The property affected in the former action was lot 2, in block 179, of Manassee & Schiller's addition to the city; while in this action it is lot 9 in the same block. They both were and are owned by the defendant, and front on Logan avenue, and were both assessed for the same grading, which was let as a single contract by the city to the plaintiffs, who performed the work. The latter brought a separate action against the defendant as to lot 2, and obtained a judgment, which appears to have been satisfied. And it is now claimed that, as that judgment was rendered in an action upon the same assessment, which constituted but one entire demand, it was a recovery upon a portion of such demand, and is good as a plea in bar of the present action. But we think an examination of the act of March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147,) under which the improvement and assessment were made, will show that the rule invoked by the appellant has no application here. It is provided in the first subdivision of section 7 of that act that the expenses incurred for any work authorized by the act "shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon; * * * each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed, in proportion to the frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expenses of the work." And section 8 provides that "after the contractor of any street work has fulfilled his contract to the satisfaction of the street superintendent of the said city, or city council on appeal, the street superintendent shall make an assessment to cover the sum due for the work performed and specified in said contract, [including any incidental expenses.] This assessment shall show, among other things: "The amount of each assessment, the name of the owner of each lot, or portion of a lot, [if known to the street superintendent.] If unknown, the word 'unknown' shall be written opposite the number of the lot, and the amount assessed thereon, the number of each lot, or portion of a lot assessed, and shall have attached thereto a diagram exhibiting * * * the relative location of each distinct lot, or portion of a lot, to the work done," etc. Section 9 provides that a warrant signed by the superintendent of streets, and countersigned by the mayor of the city, shall be attached to the assessment. The warrant, assessment, and diagram must then be recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets. "When so recorded, the several amounts assessed shall be a lien upon the lands, or portions of lots assessed, respectively, for the period of two years from the date of said recording, unless sooner discharged. After said warrant, assessment, and diagram are recorded, the same shall be delivered to the contractor, or his agents or assigns on demand, * * * and, by virtue of said warrant, said contractor or his agents or assigns shall be authorized to demand and receive the amount of the several assessments made to cover the sum due for the work specified in such contracts and assessments."

Thus it appears that the expense of the improvement is a charge upon the property benefited, and not a charge against the owner personally. In furtherance of this end, the identity of the lot assessed, and not the person who may be the owner, is made the essential requirement of the statute. The first must be specifically described, while the latter may be designated as "unknown," as in the present case. Nowhere in the statute does any intention appear to charge the owner personally. In Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241, it was held that, in cases of this character, the owner could not be made personally liable for the proportion of the expense of the improvement assessed against his property. And in Dyer v. Barstow, 50 Cal. 652, it was held that there was no privity of contract between the owner and the person who contracted with the city to do the work. It is to be observed that the several assessments which the contractor is authorized to demand and receive are the particular assessments against each lot, or portion of a lot. He is not empowered, in cases where a person owns two or more lots liable for their proportion of the cost of the improvement, to demand the sum of the several assessments against two or more lots, but must make a several demand as to each lot. Thus, in a case like the one here, where a demand was made upon the premises assessed, as may now be done, where the owner named in the assessment, or his agent, cannot conveniently be found, and which must be done whenever the name of the owner is stated as "unknown," (St. 1885, § 10,) a demand upon each of two lots for the sum of the assessments due upon both was held to be bad, and insufficient to support a recovery. Schirmer v. Hoyt, 54 Cal. 280. Again in the same section of the act last referred to, the assessment against each lot is treated as a separate and distinct demand, for the superintendent of streets "may release any assessment upon the books of his office on the payment to him of the amount of the assessment against any lot with interest, or on the production to him of the receipt of the party or his assigns, to whom the assessment and warrant were issued." And, by section 12, when suit is brought: "The court in which suit shall be commenced shall have power to adjudge and decree a lien against the premises assessed, and to order such premises to be sold on execution, as in other cases of the sale of real estate by the process of said courts." It is obvious that the lien here referred to is one for the particular amount assessed against each lot, and not the whole amount of several assessments against all the lots of one owner without regard to the proportion properly chargeable to each. Thus, in Brady v. Kelly, 52 Cal. 372, it was said: "Where two or more lots are assessed for the expenses of work on a street, each lot is chargeable only with the amount assessed upon it, and not for the amount assessed against another lot, and in enforcing the lien of the assessment the judgment should state the amount for which each lot is liable, and should order a sale of each lot, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy such amount, and costs." We, therefore, think it manifest that each lot, or portion of a lot, is separately liable for its proportion of the cost of the improvement and that the liability of each is independent of any other, and constitutes a separate demand upon which a separate cause of action may be based. And, since this is so, the recovery as to lot 2, in the former action, although between the same parties, was not upon the same, but a different, cause of action, and therefore was not good as a plea in bar of this action, and was for that reason properly stricken out.

What we have said on this point also disposes of the suggestion regarding the allowance of $15 as an attorney's fee, in addition to taxable costs, in all cases of recovery under the provisions of the statute, (section 12;) for it necessarily follows that if the charge against each lot, or portion thereof, is a separate and distinct demand, the attorney's fee prescribed by section 12 may be allowed in each case. And, in response to appellant's argument regarding this burden, it may be proper to add that such burden may be escaped by paying for the improvement before suit is brought. The appellant further maintains that the judgment is not sustained by the findings, since it appears from the latter that the warrant issued to the plaintiffs was never recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets. As already shown, a warrant of the character of the one in question must, in order to create a lien upon the property charged, be recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets, before it is delivered to the contractor or his assigns. Act March 18, 1885, § 9. See Himmelmänn v. Danos, 35 Cal. 450; Himmelmänn v. Bateman, 50 Cal. 11; Norton v. Courtney, 53 Cal. 691. The findings here disclosed that the warrant, which was properly signed by the superintendent of streets, and countersigned by the mayor, was recorded in the office of the first-mentioned officer, but that the name of the mayor, and the designation of his office,—viz., "W. J. Hunsacker, mayor,"—were omitted from the record. And this omission, it is claimed, made the recording ineffectual. In San Francisco v. Real Estate, 50 Cal. 188, which was an action in rem to enforce a street assessment, the duplicate assessment roll required to be made under section 7 of the act of February 1, 1870, amendatory of the act of March 30, 1868, (St. 1869-70, p. 41,) did not contain the certificate of the mayor, which was appended to the original assessment roll. This omission on the trial was held to be immaterial, and in sustaining the ruling on appeal, this court said: "It appears in the record that the original roll was duly made, and properly certified by the mayor, who delivered it to the auditor; but in making the duplicate for the collector the auditor omitted therefrom the certificate of the mayor. The court below held the omission to be immaterial, and we agree in that opinion." So, here, the record shows that the warrant was properly signed and countersigned, but that the superintendent of streets, in recording it in the record book in his office, failed to copy the name and official designation of the mayor. We can see no difference in principle between this case and the one quoted from. The original warrant here was authenticated, as the original assessment roll was there, in the manner required by law, and the omission of the mayor's certificate from the duplicate of the original assessment roll in the latter case was deemed immaterial. And we think the omission complained of here is of the same character. This defect is not the same as those held to be fatal in Himmelmänn v. Bateman, and Norton v. Courtney, supra. In each of those cases the omission from the record was an essential part of the description of the premises against which the lien was sought to be enforced. In the first, the depth of the lot was, by mistake, omitted from the diagram; and in the second, the arrow showing the courses on the diagram was, in like manner, omitted. Compare this last case with Whiting v. Quackenbush, 54 Cal. 306. These omissions were fatal, because they rendered it impossible in either case to identify the property from the record. In Himmelmänn v. Danos, supra, which is to the same effect, the record of the assessment and diagram and warrant was held to be no record at all, because the same was not certified to by the superintendent of streets, or by any one for him. This disposes of the appellant's argument, and finding no error in the record we think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCILIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACT—TIME OF ESSENCE—RESCISSION.

1. Time is of the essence of a contract for the sale of land which provides for the payment of the purchase money in installments at specified dates, and for the execution of a good and sufficient deed by the vendor on the receipt of the final installment, and that, "in the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the vendee, the vendor shall be released from all obligations in law or in equity to convey said property, and said vendee shall forfeit all right thereto."

2. The vendor is in default on his failure to execute the deed after a tender of the final installment by the vendee when due; and, where the vendee had elected to rescind the contract by a tender of a quitclaim deed of the land and a demand for the return of the installments already paid, no subsequent offer of performance on the part of the vendor will relieve him from the effects of his default.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge. Willis, Cole & Craig, for appellant. Smith & Northrop, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiffs obtained judgment against the defendant for the sum of $3,405.75, and costs. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted on the judgment roll. The parties hereto entered into the following contract: "This agreement, made and entered into the 25th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, between the Semi-Tropic Land and Water Company, a corporation, party of the first part, and Jesse W. Woodruff and George E. Baldwin, of the city and county of San Bernardino, state of California, the parties of the second part, witnesseth: That said party of the first part, in pursuance of a resolution of the board of directors of said corporation, duly passed, authorizing this agreement, and in consideration of the covenants and agreements on the part of the said parties of the second part hereinafter contained, agrees to sell and convey unto the said parties of the second part all that certain lot or parcel of land situated in the county of San Bernardino and state of California, and bounded and more particularly described as follows, to-wit: Farm block 28, containing 20.06 acres, (more or less,) in accordance with the map of the town of Rialto, and adjoining subdivisions, as recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds in and for San Bernardino county, California, —, 18—, book —, page —. The party of the first part reserves from premises above agreed to be sold the right of way to enter upon to ditch and to lay pipes for the distribution of water. And the said party of the first part agrees to sell said property for the sum of four thousand twelve dollars, gold coin of the United States. And the said parties of the second part, in consideration of the premises, agree to pay to the said party of the first part the said sum of four thousand twelve dollars, gold coin, as follows, to-wit: Thirteen hundred thirty-eight dollars, cash on delivery of this agreement, receipt of which sum is hereby acknowledged by party of the first part; thirteen hundred thirty-seven dollars on or before August 25, 1888; thirteen hundred thirty-seven dollars on or before August 25, 1889,—with interest payable semi-annually upon the deferred payments, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. And, if any part of the principal or interest be now (not) paid when due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of twelve percent. per annum until fully paid, according to the terms of two certain promissory notes of said second parties of even date herewith, made in favor of said party of the first part, and payable at the Los Angeles National Bank, in Los Angeles, California. And the said parties of the second part agree to pay all state, school, and county taxes or assessments of whatsoever nature which may become due on the premises above described, and all assessments that may be lawfully made upon the shares of water-stock herein agreed to be delivered after the date of this agreement. In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said parties of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and said parties of the second part shall forfeit all rights thereto. And the said party of the first part, on receiving such payment at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the said parties of the second part, or their assigns, a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale, together with one share of stock in the Lytle Creek Water and Improvement Company for each acre of land above agreed to be sold. The party of the first part also agrees to pipe the water to a point adjacent to each twenty-acre lot of said tract, and to each town lot above agreed to be sold, after which the second parties, and other stockholders in said water company, must bear the expense of keeping up the water system. And it is understood that the stipulations aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of the respective parties." From the pleadings it appears that the plaintiffs here (the parties of the second part) paid to the defendant, on the 27th of August, 1887, $1,338, on the agreement, and at the same time executed and delivered to it two promissory notes in accordance strictly with the terms of the contract, and at maturity thereof paid the first note, $1,443, principal and interest, and $160.44, being interest on the note due on or before August 25, 1889, and also $13.30, the amount of taxes assessed on the land included in the contract. On the 26th of August, 1889, when the last note was due, the plaintiffs were ready and willing, and offered in writing, to pay it and the interest due thereon, and then demanded a good and sufficient deed of bargain and sale of the premises above described, and also that the defendant deliver the water-stock included in the purchase. This the defendant failed and neglected to do. On the 21st day of November, 1889, the plaintiffs surrendered possession of the land and premises, and tendered to the defendant a quitclaim deed to the premises and to the water-stock, and demanded that the defendant pay back the payments in money that the plaintiffs had made, and interest at lawful rates from the date of making the payments, and that the defendant deliver up the promissory note due August 25, 1889. That the defendant refused to accept the deed of reconveyance, or pay the money. Damages in the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars were prayed for, the rescission of the agreement of August 25, 1887, and that the note due August 25, 1889, be given up and canceled. A demurrer was filed, and overruled, for want of prosecution. The defendant then answered denying damage done to the plaintiffs, and setting up the defense that prior to the service of summons in this case, it was able and willing to deliver a conveyance and the water-stock, upon the plaintiffs paying the balance of the purchase price, which offer the plaintiffs declined. And the defendant avers that it is still able and willing to carry out the contract upon the payment by the plaintiffs of the contract price for the property. The court found that all the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint were true, and that they had suffered damage in the sum of $3,405.75; that before November 29, 1889, the defendant failed and neglected to comply with the contract; that on that day, after the commencement of this action, but before the service of summons, the defendant offered to comply with the contract, but the plaintiffs would not accept it; and that, since that date, the defendant has been, and still is, ready to deliver the deed and shares of stock on the payment of the balance due by the plaintiffs. The conclusion of law is that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for $3,405.75, and costs. Judgment was rendered accordingly on the 17th of June, 1890.

The only point which seems to be made for a reversal of the judgment is that time was not of the essence of the contract, and therefore that the offer of performance on the 29th of November, 1889, was in a reasonable time after the date fixed for performance by the contract, or after suit brought by the plaintiffs to rescind. There is no doubt, however, that time was of the essence of this contract, as is seen by a reference to the opinions delivered in Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 364, and Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 321, 24 Pac. Rep. 280, where a similar contract was construed with reference to this point. Time being of the essence of the contract, the defendant, having failed to comply with it after a tender of performance by the vendee, was in default. The plaintiffs tendered a deed to the premises, giving all their title thereto, and also the water-stock, and surrendered possession of the premises on the 21st of November, 1889, and demanded a repayment back of their money, and the giving up and canceling of their unpaid note. This was all that the plaintiffs were required to do to effect a rescission of the contract, and, having done this, no subsequent offer of performance on the part of the defendant would relieve it from the effect of its default. Therefore we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: GIBSON, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

STATE v. CHEW MUCK YOU.

LARCENY BY BAILEE—DELIVERY TO BAILEE.

1. It is not necessary that, when the defendant is charged with being a bailee, the facts and circumstances of the bailment should be set out. When one is charged with being a bailee, the allegation covers all necessary facts.

2. A bailment takes place when any article of personal property is put into the hands of one for a special purpose, and it is to be returned by the bailee to the bailor, or delivered to some third person, when the object of the trust is accomplished. Where gold-dust was intrusted to the possession of another, to deliver to a third party in Portland, when the object of the trust would be accomplished, and, upon demand of such bailee for the property, he promised to deliver it, but, failing to do so upon the third demand, he denied having received it, and refused to account, held, (1) that this was conversion, and that the court had jurisdiction; (2) that his admissions were only corroborative.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; LOYAL B. STEARNS, Judge.

T. A. Stevens, Dist. Atty., and W. T. Hume, for plaintiff. McGinn & Simon and H. Pilkington, for defendant.

LORD, J. The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of larceny by bailee, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of one year. To reverse the judgment rendered herein is the purpose of the present appeal.

It is first objected that the demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained, for the reason that it does not set out the nature and terms of the bailment. In support of this position, People v. Poggi, 19 Cal. 600; People v. Peterson, 9 Cal. 313; and People v. Cohen, 8 Cal. 42,—are cited. These cases hold that it is not enough to charge the defendant with being bailee, but that the facts and circumstances of the bailment must be set out. Tested by the principle established in these cases, the indictment is not sufficient; but the practice has been in this state to follow the statute in this part of the allegation, upon the principle that, when one is charged with being bailee, the allegation covers all necessary facts. Referring to the cases cited, Mr. Bishop expresses the opinion that it is not necessary to aver the character or circumstances of the bailment, and suggests the following reasons: "First. Although the fact of the bailment is material, it is, in a certain sense, incidental; the offense consisting in the person who sustains the relation of bailee to the property doing the forbidden thing.

The gravamen of the charge is that this person did convert the same to his own use. It is not denied, and it cannot be, that it is sufficient to follow the statute in this part of the allegation; therefore, as for the first, it should be sufficient in the other part. Secondly. The relation of bailee is well known in the law; just as well known, though not quite so common, as the relation of owner. It is not necessary to allege how a man became owner of personal property, or to state the facts and circumstances of the ownership. When one is charged with being owner, the allegation covers all necessary facts. In like manner it should be held that, when one is charged with being bailee, the allegation covers all necessary facts." Bish. St. Crimes, § 423; Bish. Dir. & Forms, § 610, and notes. As the indictment is admitted to be within the principle thus announced, which is thought to be in accordance with the practice in this state, the indictment is sufficient, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

The next error relied upon is the refusal of the court to direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, upon the ground that there was an entire failure of proof to show that any crime had ever been committed in Multnomah county, or in the state of Oregon. To properly dispose of this objection, it is necessary to examine and state the substance of the facts proved. The bill of exceptions discloses that one Li Moy, who kept a Chinese restaurant at Pierce City, Idaho, desiring to send 27 ounces of gold-dust to one Li Fook, a resident of Portland, Or., delivered such gold-dust to the defendant, with instructions to convey the same to Portland, and deliver it to Li Fook; that the defendant received the gold-dust into his possession for that purpose, and came to Portland, but failed to deliver the gold-dust; that Li Moy wrote to Li Fook regarding the gold-dust, and, learning from Li Fook that he had never received the gold-dust, came to Portland to see about the matter; that immediately on receiving the information contained in the letter from Li Moy, Li Fook sought out Chew Muck You, and demanded the gold-dust. It is enough to say that when the first demand was made on the defendant for the gold-dust that he promised to turn it over, but failed to do so; that he was again sought, and made a like promise and failure; that he was again sought, and the gold-dust demanded of him, and that then he stated for the first time that he had not received any gold-dust; that the defendant has never turned over the gold-dust, nor accounted for it, and the same has been wholly lost to the complaining witness. Upon this evidence the counsel for the defendant makes two points: (1) That, in the absence of a statute conferring jurisdiction, there can be no prosecution in this state for larceny by bailee, where the property intrusted to him was delivered in another state, to be brought into this state, and where the bailee, after bringing the property into this state, converts it to his own use; and (2) that, if such jurisdiction be conceded, there is a total failure of proof of the commission of any crime in the venue laid, and that the jury ought to have been directed to return a verdict of not guilty. The first objection is based on the idea that the proof must establish a complete commission of the offense in the county where the offense was laid; otherwise, there is no jurisdiction to try it. The argument, in effect, is that, as the evidence discloses that the gold-dust was intrusted to the possession of the defendant in Idaho, to be transported by him into this state, such facts show that the bailment originated there, although the acts of conversion may have taken place here; but, as the facts both of bailment and conversion are necessary to constitute a complete offense, unless the facts in respect to each originated and occurred within Multnomah county, where the venue is laid, they do not show a complete commission of the offense in that county, and consequently, upon the facts as presented by this record, the court was without jurisdiction in the premises. The vice of this argument lies in supposing, because the contract of bailment originated in Idaho, it could have no binding force or effect in Oregon. It proceeds upon the hypothesis that, as the fact of bailment is essential to be proved, and as such fact in the present case originated without the state, it showed that the proof did not establish a complete offense in the county where the offense is laid, and therefore, no crime being proved, the court was without jurisdiction to inflict a judgment of punishment. A bailment is ordinarily defined to be a contract by which goods are delivered by one person to another for a certain purpose, upon an express or implied promise by the bailee to return them to the bailor, or to deliver them to some one designated by him, after the purpose has been fulfilled. But a bailment is not always accompanied by a contract, expressed or implied, and, in the absence of it, the law imposes duties which the bailee cannot neglect without liability. The duty of the bailee to make restitution of bail goods is one which the law imposes, and does not depend upon the existence of any contract. 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law "Bailment," p. 56. Within the meaning as to what constitutes a bailee of the criminal statutes there does not appear to be any doctrine peculiar to the criminal law. "A bailment," Mr. Bishop says, "is where one has personal property intrusted to him, to be returned, or delivered to another in specie, when the object of the trust is accomplished." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 857. Again he says: "A bailment takes place where an article of personal property is put into the hands of one for a special purpose, and it is to be returned by the bailee to the bailor, or delivered to some third person, when the object of the trust is accomplished." Bish. St. Crimes, § 423; Krause v. Com., 93 Pa. St. 418. It is said that the object of these statutes is to cover that which is not larceny at common law.

Bearing in mind, then, what constitutes a bailment within the meaning of these statutes, and the purposes for which they were enacted, upon the facts as disclosed by this record, what was the relation which the defendant sustained to the property put into his possession when it was demanded of him at Portland, and he refused to deliver it? When the gold-dust was intrusted to his possession, and he undertook to transport it to Portland, and deliver it to the party designated, his undertaking included the duty of a bailee, to be performed in this state, and the object of the trust he had assumed was only accomplished when he should deliver it to such party in Portland. That such an engagement is bailment, and valid here, where it is to be performed, and the relation of bailee terminated when the property should be delivered, would scarcely seem to admit of a doubt. The facts put themselves within the terms of the definition that certain "personal property was put into the hands of the defendant for a special purpose, to be delivered by him to a third person, when the object of the trust is accomplished." They established the relation of bailee in the defendant to the property intrusted to his possession, which continued with and followed him, from the nature of his engagement, until that relation should be terminated by a delivery of the property at Portland to the party designated, when the trust he had assumed would be discharged, and its object accomplished. There is no evidence or any pretense that he was in any way relieved from his engagement as bailee, or absolved from his trust, from its inception until his final repudiation of it in Portland, where he was then a bailee, within the venue in which his offense is laid, and subject to our laws, and to be punished by our courts in that locality for the violation of his trust. As bailee, when the defendant arrived in Portland in the performance of his trust, he was rightfully in the possession of the property, and was guilty of no violation of that trust, even after he had been sought out, and the gold-dust had been twice, and at different times, demanded of him, and he promised to deliver it in accordance with his engagement. So far as this record discloses, he had committed no offense here or elsewhere until he refused to account for it. But he was a bailee when he arrived in Portland, and sustained that relation to the property intrusted to him; and, as Mr. Bishop says, "our courts cannot ignore the relation sustained to the property by the defendant here, or the trespass committed upon it here, or the felonious intent which here existed." Bish. Crim. Law, § 130. When, therefore, sustaining the relation of bailee to the property intrusted to him, it was demanded of him by the person authorized to receive it, and he finally, upon the third demand, after he had promised twice to pay it over to such person, repudiated his trust, and refused to account for it, it was an act or conduct inconsistent with the nature of his trust, in violation of it, and effective as evidence of his conversion of the property. "Insolvency, flight, or refusal to pay," says Mr. Wharton, "are the usual and most effective evidences of conversion." Whart. Crim. Law, § 1950; Bish. St. Crimes, § 421. Being a bailee, and the conversion occurring within the venue where his offense is laid, the court had jurisdiction of this crime with which he was charged. "Some act of conversion or appropriation by the bailee," says Mr. Wharton, "must be alleged and proved to have taken place within the jurisdiction of the court." Whart. Crim. Law, § 1957. And again, that "the defendant may be tried in any county where any part of the embezzlement was committed, or where, upon being called upon to account, he disowned having received the money." Id. § 1937. The gravamen of the charge, Mr. Bishop says, is that this person did convert the same to his own use. Bish. St. Crimes, § 422. "But here," said Lord ALVANLY, C. J., "there is no evidence of any act to bring the prisoner within the statute until he is called upon by his master to account. When called upon by his master to account for the money, the prisoner denied that he ever received it. This was the first act from which the jury could, with certainty, say that the prisoner intended to embezzle the money. In this case there was no evidence of the prisoner having done any act to embezzle in the county of Surry, nor could the offense be complete, nor the prisoner be guilty within the act, until he refused to account to his master. We are therefore of the opinion that the prisoner was properly indicted in the county of Middlesex." Rex v. Taylor, 3 Bos. & P. 596. Nor, in the present case, was there any evidence of any act for which the defendant was liable, or which indicated an intent to repudiate his trust, and convert the property to his own use, until he denied receiving the money, and refused to account. This, being charged, and proved to have taken place within the venue where his offense is laid, was within the jurisdiction of the court which tried and convicted him.

The next objection is that, conceding jurisdiction, there was no evidence of the commission of any crime, except the confessions of the defendant, or, in other words, there must be other proof of the corpus delicti than the confessions or admissions of the defendant. This is based on the assumption that the only evidence of the relation of the defendant as bailee to the property was the admission of the defendant, when, after his arrival in Portland, the gold-dust was demanded of him by the person authorized to receive it, he promised to turn over to him on two separate occasions. But enough has already been said to show that there was evidence that the gold-dust was intrusted to his possession, to be delivered to a designated person in Portland, and that he sustained the relation of bailee to such property when it was demanded of him, and that, if he had then and there refused to account for it or to deliver it, without any acknowledgment on his part of such relation as bailee to the property, it would have made a case for the consideration of the jury. The effect of his admissions was only to strengthen the evidence for the prosecution that he was such bailee of the property. It was only corroborative of his character as bailee of the property intrusted to him, and his intention then to fulfill his trust; but this was not enough.

Some act of conversion or appropriation of the property to his own use must be charged and proved before he could be guilty of the offense of larceny by bailee. That proof which is the gravamen of the charge was not furnished by him or by his admissions, but by another witness. It was when, as a bailee being called upon to account, he disowned having received the gold-dust, that he furnished the decisive evidence of its conversion. That a conviction should not be had on the extrajudicial confessions of the defendant, unsupported by any corroborating facts and circumstances, need not be questioned. It is proof abundant of the corpus delicti which is required, and Mr. Bishop intimates that the rule in this regard would be better applied as one of caution and discretion, than of law. 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 1070, 1071. But, however that may be here, neither the fact that the gold-dust was intrusted to his possession for the special purpose of delivering it to a third person in Portland, or the violation of such trust, and the conversion of the property to his own use, stands upon his unsupported admissions alone. All that can be said is that, when it was proved that such property was intrusted to his possession, to be delivered as specified, and the person designated to receive it applied to him for it, and he promised to deliver it, he only corroborated what had already been proven, and recognized his relation to the property as bailee, and perhaps his intention to fulfill the trust confided to him. It may be that Chinese testimony is open to the criticism claimed, but the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight and value of testimony, is for the jury, and not for our decision. We think the judgment must be affirmed.

HARTVIG v. N. P. LUMBER CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

1. It is well settled that a wrong-doer is liable for an injury which resulted as the natural and probable consequences of his wrongful act, and which he ought to have foreseen in the light of surrounding circumstances.

2. It is ordinarily the province of the jury to ascertain whether the injury is the natural and proximate cause of the wrong complained of.

3. It is the duty of the master to observe due care, and not to expose his servants to unreasonable risks, and, when the nature of the business requires it, to make needful rules or regulations for its safe conduct so as to protect those in his employment against accidents.

4. It is not for the court to speculate upon the facts, but to submit them to the jury, if they tend to support the cause of action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

R. Citron, for plaintiff. Thos. N. Strong, for defendant.

LORD, J. This is an action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff on account of the negligence of the defendant, its agents and servants. The only error complained of is the refusal of the court to grant a motion for nonsuit interposed by the defendant. In substance, the facts are these: The plaintiff was an ordinary laborer on the night force at the defendant's saw-mill, who was engaged with other laborers at the foot of the lumber chute for the purpose of removing lumber as it descended to the foot of the chute, and distributing it about the yard. On the evening alleged, while the plaintiff was at his work, it being nearly dark, and the lighting of the lamps in the mill had begun, a large stick of timber was passed out from the saws over the rollers to the head of the chute by the men above, and when it passed the last rollers, coming end first, one-half of the stick would project straight out, and when the center was passed, without giving any warning, it was let go, and descended down the chute with great force, striking in its descent a small timber in the pile, which flew around and violently struck the plaintiff, and injured him. In the performance of this work at the foot of the chute, the evidence shows that the pushing of timber over the rollers at the head of the chute, especially when a heavy timber like the one in question was to be sent down it, rendered the place at which the men worked at the foot of the chute extremely dangerous, and an unsafe place to work, unless some notice or outcry was given so that they might take precautions for their safety. It does not appear that the defendant, in the conduct of this work, established any rule or regulation requiring such warning to be given, or that the men at the top of the chute gave it, except of their own choice, which was irregularly, and often caused the interchange of much swearing between the men at the top of the chute, and those at work at its foot. The plaintiff is a Russian Finn, and speaks very little English; had done little or no work of that kind; was not acquainted with, nor informed of, the dangers of the work. When the injury occurred, the plaintiff was a few feet away from the foot of the chute, engaged in the duties required by his employment. Upon this state of facts, the contention is (1) that the failure to give the warning when the timber was started in its descent down the chute was not the proximate cause of the injury; (2) that, if the failure to give the warning was negligence which caused the injury, it was the negligence of a fellow-servant, for which the defendant company was not liable; and (3) that if the warning had been given, a like injury would have occurred to the plaintiff. Taking these propositions as stated in their order, the first contention is that the injury was not occasioned by the descent of the timber for which no warning was given, but by another piece in the pile of lumber at the foot of the chute which it struck with great force and misplaced and sent forcibly and violently against the plaintiff, causing and inflicting upon him the injury of which he complains. The evidence shows that it was not unusual for timber and lumber to accumulate at the foot of the chute, and on the chute; that the chute is hardly ever free from it; that sometimes it is so full or choked with lumber that such lumber acts as a buffer, and retards the downward progress of the descending timber,—all of which tends to show that if there are only some pieces of timber on the chute, or piled at the bottom of it, when a large piece is started down the incline, and the chute is not so choked up as to retard its headway, that, from the nature of the incline, it must descend with great force, and necessarily is liable to strike other sticks of timber, as here, of much less size, to which it will communicate its force and propelling power, sending it forcibly in the direction the power is received. But in this there is no break in the causal connection between the wrong complained of and the injury occasioned by it, no intervening agency changing or affecting the operation of the prime cause of the injury. As the heavy stick of timber was sent down the chute, without any warning to the men at work at its foot, the wrong in thus sending it is naturally and directly communicated to the other piece of timber, which was there at the time, under the circumstances indicated, and not through the intervention of some independent agency, making no break in the succession of events from the primary cause to its result in the injury. One event followed the other in a continuous sequence without any immediate cause operating between the wrong and injury. The small piece of timber struck was there as an incident to the work in hand, and it derived its force and propulsion, and became linked with the prime cause, by a causal connection, which made the injury it occasioned the natural and probable consequences of the wrongful act or omission. Railway Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 475; Jucker v. Railroad Co., 52 Wis. 152, 8 N. W. Rep. 862; Nelson v. Railroad Co., 30 Minn. 77, 14 N. W. Rep. 360; Railroad Co. v. Hope, 80 Pa. St. 377. This being true the wrongful act or omission was the proximate cause of the injury. The principle is well settled that a wrong-doer is liable for the injury which resulted as the natural and probable consequence of his wrongful act of which he ought to have foreseen in the light of surrounding circumstances, and, as the court said in Ransier v. Railroad Co., 32 Minn. 334, 20 N. W. Rep. 332, "whether the injury in a particular case was such natural and proximate result of the wrong complained of is ordinarily for the decision of the jury." Reiper v. Nichols, 31 Hun, 495. It is their province to look at the facts as they transpire, and ascertain whether they are naturally and probably connected in orderly sequence with the prime cause, or disconnected by some intervening agency affecting its operation. Upon this state of the evidence, we are not authorized to take the case from the jury, and say the wrongful act or omission was not the proximate cause of the injury.

The next contention is based on the assumption that, as the men at the top of the chute and those at the foot were engaged in a common undertaking, they were fellow-servants, and, as the failure to give the warning was the negligence of some one of those above, it was the negligence of a fellow-servant, for which the defendant company was not responsible, and therefore no recovery can be sustained upon that state of facts. The evidence establishes that it was the duty of the defendant company to provide such rule or regulation for the conduct of the work as would make the place at which the plaintiff worked reasonably safe; that to accomplish this object, and render those at the foot of the chute where the plaintiff worked reasonably safe, it was necessary that a warning outcry should be given, so that when timber was started down the chute, and especially heavy timber, and at night-time, the men at the foot of the chute might have notice of its coming, and get out of danger, or take precautions for their safety. The evidence shows that the plaintiff provided no such rule or regulation for the conduct of this dangerous work, but left the men engaged at the top of the chute without any direction in the matter, those at the top and bottom of the chute shouting backward and forward at each other, and, as the counsel for the defendant says, the men at the foot of the chute abusing and swearing at those at the top whenever, in their opinion, they failed to give the proper warnings. This exhibits a condition of things than which nothing could more plainly show the necessity of the defendant providing a rule or regulation in the conduct of the work, prescribing and requiring those at the head of the chute not to start timber, and especially heavy timber, and at night-time, when the danger is increased, without giving a warning outcry, in order that those at the foot of the chute engaged in the performance of their labor might have notice of the descent, and take precautions for their safety. The place at which they and the plaintiff worked could only be rendered reasonably safe by the establishment of some such rule or regulation. As it is the duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place for his servant to work, it became the duty of the defendant company to provide such reasonable rule or regulation in the conduct of the business as would protect the men while engaged in their work at the foot of the chute. It required the defendant not simply to employ skillful and competent agents and employees in its service, but to adopt rules and regulations adapted to the dangerous nature of the business, so as to guard against accidents; in a word, to be vigilant in the use of means, and in the adoption of measures, to make the servants reasonably safe in their employment. To this extent the master assumes the risks, while the servant assumes the natural and ordinary risks incident to the business in which he is engaged, including those arising from the negligence of his fellow-servants. As was said in Anderson v. Bennett, 16 Or. 529, 19 Pac. Rep. 755, the duty devolving on the master is affirmative to take such measures, or to adopt such precautionary measures, as the proper and safe conduct of his business requires to avoid accidents. An application of this principle to the defendant requires it to establish some suitable rule or regulation for the prosecution of this business which would render its employees reasonably safe in the discharge of their duties in the course of their employment. It was bound to observance of such care as would not expose them to risks and perils which might be guarded against by proper diligence, or by the promulgation of suitable or needful rules for the safe management of its business. If the defendant had provided some such rule, requiring the men at the head of the chute to give warning before timber was started down the chute, and they should neglect to do it, and an injury should occur to those below, the defendant, having performed its duty, would not be liable, no more than when a master furnishes a safe instrument and competent servant, and, in using it, such servant negligently injures a co-servant. Upon the facts as disclosed by this record, the defendant has not exercised that care which the exigency of the situation required for the safety of those employed at the foot of the chute, and is not in a condition to avail himself of the rule of non-responsibility to a servant for an injury caused by a fellow-servant. "Though we have said," justly remarked Baron ALDERSON, "that a master is not generally responsible to a servant for an injury occasioned by a fellow-servant while they are acting in a common service, yet this must be taken with the qualification that the master shall have taken due care not to expose his servants to unreasonable risks. It results that upon this phase of the case there was no error in refusing to take the case from the jury.

The last point of contention is that, if the warning had been given when the timber was started down the incline, a like injury would have happened to the plaintiff. This is based on the assumption that the facts show that the position he occupied relative to the foot of the chute, when the injury occurred, was reasonably safe, and that if the warning had been given he would have remained where he was, and not likely have changed it. The evidence shows that he was at work near the foot of the chute, the nature of which necessarily required him to stoop often, his head in front of him, and his body inclined over, so that at such time it was not possible for him to see the timber, although it may be seen by looking while it is being trimmed. How he would have acted if the warning had been given, under such circumstances, it is not possible for us to know. The piece of timber was unusually large, and came down with a terrible crash and impetus, and we are bound to assume, in view of the facts, that he would have taken such precautions as the instincts of self-preservation would have suggested on the occasion. It is not for us to speculate upon this, especially when the fact appears that he was injured at the place where he was near the foot of the chute, while engaged in the performance of the duties. These facts tend to show that the place at which he worked was dangerous or unsafe, unless warning was given, and to emphasize its necessity, to afford him an opportunity at least to take precautions for his safety. In cases of this character, it is the peculiar province of the jury to determine the facts;

SALE—WHEN TITLE PASSES—EVIDENCE.

1. In the sale of personal property, where there has been a complete delivery of the property in accordance with the terms of sale, and nothing remains to be done, in relation to the property, to effect the transfer, the title passes, although there remains something to be done in order to ascertain the total quantity or value of the goods at the price specified in the contract.

2. In an action for wood sold, when the defense is that wood was not of the quality specified in the contract, evidence is inadmissible by the plaintiff to show the merchantable quality of wood of the same grade cut from the same place, and on hand a day or two before the trial, and some considerable time after the delivery of the wood sued for.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

This action is founded upon the following agreement in writing: "This agreement made at Portland, Oregon, this 21st day of June, 1889, between Borthwick and Fraine, parties of the first part, and S. M. Barr, party of the second part, witnesseth: Said parties of the first part are to furnish cars sufficient to carry fifteen hundred cords of wood. Said cars to be placed on what it known as 'Barr's Spur' on the O. R. & N. Co. R. R.; and said parties of the first part are to pay the party of the second part the sum of two dollars ($2) per cord for the said fifteen hundred cords of wood. Said party of the second part is to place on board said cars, when furnished, 1,500 cords of good, merchantable fir wood. Said parties of the second part are to accept the measurement as given by the government at Walla Walla. [Signed] BORTHWICK & FRANE. S. M. BARR. Witness: J. M. LEAVENS." The complaint avers the plaintiff did sell and deliver to defendants, on board the cars, at place designated in contract, 1,500 cords of good, merchantable wood, in all respects as agreed; that defendants have paid $1,000 on account thereof, and no more; and demands judgment for $2,000, the balance claimed to be due. The answer denies the delivery of any greater number of cords of wood than 1,054 cords. It alleges that it was understood between the parties to the agreement at the time it was made, and when the wood was sold and purchased, that defendants were purchasing it to fill a contract they had with the United States quartermaster for use at Walla Walla; that it was a provision of said contract between plaintiff and defendants, and was therein expressly stipulated and agreed, that plaintiff should accept the measurement of said wood made by the government officer on its delivery to the government at Walla Walla; that plaintiff furnished 1,325 cords of fir wood to apply on the contract, but that 271 cords of it were unmerchantable, and not good wood, and were rejected and refused, for that reason, by the government agent at Walla Walla, where and when the wood was measured and inspected; that, by a subsequent contract, it was agreed that defendants should pay to the plaintiff on said contract $1,000, when 1,000 cords of good, merchantable wood had been furnished thereunder, and that the remainder of the purchase price of said 1,500 cords of wood should be due and payable when said contract was completed, and said 1,500 cords of good, merchantable wood had been delivered at Walla Walla, and paid for and accepted by the government, and not otherwise. That said contract has not been completed or filled by plaintiff, and he has only delivered, under said contract, 1,054 cords of wood; that the government has not paid defendants for said wood already delivered, and will not, until said contract for 1,500 cords of wood is completed. They deny that $2,000, or any other sum, is due or owing from them to plaintiff. The reply denies specifically each material allegation of the answer, and the only allegation of new matter it contains is that it was by the fault of the defendants that said wood was not measured by the government at Walla Walla, or elsewhere. A trial was had before a jury, and a verdict and judgment in favor of respondent was rendered for the amount demanded in the complaint, from which this appeal is taken. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Watson, Hume & Watson and R. G. Morrow, for appellants. R. & E. B. Williams & Carey and C. J. McDougall, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first question for our consideration is whether the court below erred in instructing the jury that under the contract in this case, the wood of the quality specified in the contract, when put on board the cars for the defendants at Barr's Spur, was thereafter at the risk of the defendants, and that plaintiff thereafter had no further liability or responsibility in respect to the wood. The contention of defendants is that the measurement of the wood, by the government at Walla Walla, is made, by the contract, a condition precedent to the transfer of the property. This contract, being in writing, must be construed by the court, and the intention of the parties, as gathered therefrom, must control; the general rule of law being that when the goods are to be weighed or measured, in order to ascertain the quantity, unless it appears that the intention of the parties was otherwise, the title does not pass until such measuring or weighing is done. Rosenthal v. Kahn, 24 Pac. Rep. 989, (decided this term.) But when there has been a complete delivery of the property, in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale, and nothing remains to be done, in relation to the property, to effect the transfer, the title passes, although there remains something to be done in order to ascertain the total quantity or value of the goods at the price specified in the contract. Burrows v. Whittaker, 71 N. Y. 291; Graff v. Fitch, 58 Ill. 373; Hatch v. Oil Co., 100 U. S. 124. The delivery of the property is an important factor in determining the intent of the parties, and is usually indicative of an intent that the title should pass, though not conclusive. If goods be completely delivered to the purchaser, it is usually very strong evidence of an intent that the property should pass to him, and be at his risk, notwithstanding that weighing or measuring is to be done afterwards. The inference to be derived from a delivery to the purchaser may, of course, be overcome by the terms of the contract, but, in the absence of any provisions indicating a different intention, it is usually considered that the title vests upon the delivery. The provisions of the contract in this case are that the defendants should provide the cars for the wood purchased by them of plaintiff, and should furnish these cars at a certain designated place on the Oregon Railway & Navigation Company's road. The only engagement of plaintiff was to load in these cars when furnished 1,500 cords of wood, of the quality called for in the contract. When he did this his contract was complete, and nothing remained to be done by either of the parties to effect the transfer. The possession of the wood passed from plaintiff to defendants as soon as put aboard of the cars, and there is nothing in the contract which would prevent the title vesting in them as completely as if plaintiff had delivered the wood in defendant's wood-yard, or loaded it in wagons furnished by them. The possession and control of the wood was immediately transferred from plaintiff to defendants, and upon what principle of either reason or authority it can be claimed that plaintiff had any further liability, or responsibility, in regard to the wood, we are at a loss to understand. The provision in the contract that plaintiff should accept the measurement, as given by the government at Walla Walla, simply bound him to abide by that measurement, if made, and cannot be construed into a condition precedent to the passing of the title. The contract does not provide for the receipt or acceptance of this wood by the government at Walla Walla, or that the government shall have anything whatever to do with the wood except to measure it, if it reached Walla Walla. The only effect of this provision is that if the wood should be transported to Walla Walla by the defendants, and there measured by the government, and such measurement did not agree with that made by the plaintiff, he will be bound by the quantity, as ascertained at Walla Walla. The duty of causing this wood to be taken to Walla Walla and measured is for defendants, and, before they can bind plaintiff by such measurement, they must show that they have performed this duty. Appellants' counsel claimed on the argument that this case is within the rule announced in the case of Rosenthal v. Kahn, supra, (decided this term.) The contracts in the two cases are materially different. In the Rosenthal Case, the contract provided that Rosenthal should furnish Kahn 2,900 cords, more or less, of good, merchantable fir wood, at $1.90 per cord, on board the cars, at a certain station on the Oregon Railway & Navigation Company's road, said wood to be received and measured by the quartermaster at Walla Walla. There the amount of wood, more or less, delivered was, according to the terms of the contract, to be determined by a person whom the parties had agreed upon for that purpose, and, until the quantity was so determined, the contract was not complete. After the wood was put on board the cars, there yet remained something to be done according to the very terms of the contract to complete the sale,—namely, the receipt and measurement of the wood by the quartermaster at Walla Walla; while here the contract fixed the amount of wood to be furnished, and provided that defendants should furnish the cars, and plaintiff should load the wood on board thereof, when so furnished. When the cars were furnished by defendants at the place designated, they became their vehicles for the transportation of the wood, and a delivery of the wood on the cars was a delivery to them. In the Rosenthal Case, there was no agreement that Kahn should furnish the cars, or that the wood should be loaded in cars over which he had any control; but it was to be put on the cars of a common carrier, to be transported to the place agreed upon by the parties for the receipt and measurement, and therefore the loading on the cars was not a delivery to Kahn, and under the contract could not be so considered. It appears from the contract that Kahn was fulfilling a contract he had with the government at Walla Walla, through Rosenthal, and consequently the parties, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, made the quartermaster's receipt and measurement a condition precedent to a right to the price of the wood, and, while that could be withheld, the sale could not be executed. On the trial before the jury, the defendants gave evidence tending to show that a portion of the wood delivered to them by plaintiff was not merchantable. To rebut this, plaintiff gave evidence that on the Saturday before the trial plaintiff, in company with one Rosenthal, examined a lot of wood, perhaps four or five hundred cords, piled up along Barr's Spur, which plaintiff testified was the same kind of wood, and cut from the same place, and a part of it was from the same pile out of which the wood furnished the defendants was taken, and was of a like quality therewith, and that it was cut about the same time. Rosenthal, being called as a witness, was permitted, against defendant's objection, to testify as to the quality of the wood examined by him. In this we think there was error. It is elementary that evidence of collateral facts is inadmissible, for the reason that such evidence tends to draw the minds of the jury from the real fact at issue, and in dispute, and the opposite party, having had no notice of such a course, is not prepared to rebut it. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 52. The wood examined by Rosenthal was not the same or any part of the wood delivered to defendants, and, if it was competent for plaintiff to introduce evidence tending to show it was the same kind, the defendants might have introduced evidence to contradict it, and thus a new issue would have been presented to the jury, having nothing to do with the issue on trial. Henkel v. Burke, 10 Atl. Rep. 249; Morawetz v. McGovern, 32 N. W. Rep. 290; Love v. Frogge, 19 Mo. App. 368. The defendants did not claim that all the wood delivered to them was not merchantable, but only 271 cords thereof, and we think the evidence should have been confined to the quality of the wood actually delivered. The fact that the wood examined by Rosenthal was cut from the same place, or that a part of it was from the same pile, as that delivered to defendants would be a very remote circumstance indicating the quality of the wood actually delivered. Plaintiff was furnishing large quantities of wood from the same place to other parties, at the rate of from 800 to 1,000 cords per month, during the time he was furnishing wood to defendants, and it would be unsafe to say that he could show the quality of the wood delivered to the defendants by showing the quality of from four to five hundred cords that remained along the side track a few days before the trial, and evidently some time after he had ceased furnishing wood under his contract. The other alleged errors assigned in the notice of appeal under the views we have expressed become immaterial on this appeal, and it is not necessary for us to consider them. The judgment of the court will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

1. A collateral attack on a judgment or decree is any proceeding which is not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying such decree, or enjoining its execution.

2. The possession of land usually follows the legal title, where no adverse possession is shown, and the possession of one tenant in common, in the absence of an ouster, will inure to the benefit of his co-tenant.

3. When a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, its judgment cannot be impeached collaterally for errors of law or irregularity in practice.

4. When a party to a suit has an opportunity to present his defense, and neglects to do so, the decree against him is binding in a collateral proceeding.

5. A decree for partition is conclusive upon the parties and privies that they were tenants in common and in possession of the land at the date of its rendition.

6. A judgment of a court of this state having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter cannot be attacked collaterally for fraud altunde the record by the parties or privies.

7. Where only one referee is appointed in a partition suit, such proceeding is only an irregularity, and cannot be inquired into collaterally.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; LOYAL B. STEARNS, Judge.

This is a suit brought under section 504, Hill's Code, by plaintiff and respondent, to quiet her title to lot No. 3, block 116, in the city of Portland. The complaint avers that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and in the actual possession of this lot; that she derives her title thereto by good and sufficient mesne conveyances from the United States, and also by virtue of the statute of limitations. The separate answer of defendant Killen avers that defendant Eli Morrill is the owner of the north 19 feet of this lot, and that on the 18th day of March, 1883, said Morrill executed a mortgage to him on this 19 feet, to secure the payment of the sum of $1,000. The defendant Eli Morrill, after denying plaintiff's ownership in the north 19 feet of this lot, alleges that he is the owner in fee thereof, and as a further defense, and by way of estoppel, avers that in 1883 he instituted a suit for partition of the property described in the complaint against plaintiff, Ida Morrill, in the circuit court of Multnomah county; that she was duly served with process, and appeared by her attorney and defended said suit; that such proceedings were had in said suit that on June 7, 1883, a decree was duly entered by the court, adjudging and decreeing that this defendant, Eli Morrill, and plaintiff, Ida Morrill, were tenants in common and in possession of lot 3, block 116, in the city of Portland; that Eli Morrill was the owner of an undivided one-third of said lot, and said Ida Morrill was the owner of an undivided two-thirds thereof; that a partition of said lot could be made without prejudice to the rights of the parties; that said property was divided and partitioned in accordance with said decree by setting off in severalty to Eli Morrill the north 19 feet of said lot, and to Ida Morrill the south 31 feet thereof, and that said decree was duly entered in the journal of said court, and that said decree is in full force and effect. The reply, after denying the allegations of the answer, sets forth that on March 28, 1877, a divorce suit was brought in the circuit court of Multnomah county by Eli Morrill against his then wife, Ida, and a decree was made therein, among other things, decreeing Eli Morrill to be the owner of an undivided one-third of lot 3, block 116, and dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the parties. It then avers that Ida, soon after said decree, went into the adverse possession of said lot 3, and disseised and dispossessed the said Eli, and that ever since said date she has held it adversely. It also avers that defendant, for a valuable consideration, released his interest in said lot on August 19, 1879, and sets forth a copy of the alleged agreement as follows: "Agreement. In consequence of mutual agreement with Mrs. Ida Morrill, I declare under oath that I withdraw my individual right to the title in an undivided one-third interest in lot 3, block 116, in the city of Portland, allowed to me by law of the court. Portland, Oregon, August 9, 1879. [Signed] ELI MORRILL." The reply then attempts to impeach the partition suit by averring that the evidence did not justify it, and no referees were appointed as required by law; that, notwithstanding the failure and inability of said Eli Morrill to prove facts necessary to maintain said suit, her attorney therein, by and with the connivance and procurement of said Eli Morrill, was wrongfully induced, persuaded, and deceived into entering into a stipulation in said suit as to such facts, and in consenting to said decree of partition, without the knowledge, acquiescence, or consent of the plaintiff, and against her instructions and directions. It then alleges said decree of partition to be a fraud upon the court and plaintiff, and that she never knew of said decree until the filing of defendant's answer in the present suit, and that she has never knowingly acquiesced therein. A demurrer was interposed in the court below to that part of plaintiff's reply alleging new matter, which was overruled. The issues so made were then referred to C. H. Carey, Esq., to take the testimony, and report his finding of law and facts to the court. The findings of the referee were in favor of the plaintiff. Motions to confirm and set aside this report were duly filed. The court overruled defendant's motion, and sustained the motion of plaintiff to confirm said report, and a decree was thereupon entered in favor of plaintiff, and decreeing that she was the owner in fee of said lot 3, block 116, and that neither of said defendants had any right, title, or interest in or to the north 19 feet of said lot. From this decree the appeal is taken.

J. W. Whalley, for appellants. A. H. Tanner and R. R. Giltner, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is conceded by the parties that, if the decree in the partition suit of Morrill vs. Morrill is valid and binding on her, this case should be reversed. Briefly, the facts concerning the partition suit are these: In August, 1882, the defendant herein, Eli Morrill, commenced a suit for partition in the circuit court of Multnomah county, Or., against the plaintiff in this suit. The complaint was in the usual form, alleging that he and plaintiff were tenants in common and in possession of lot 3, in block 116, in the city of Portland, setting out the interests of the respective parties, and praying a partition thereof. A summons being duly issued and served, the plaintiff appeared by her counsel and filed an answer, in which she denied the possession of the premises by herself and defendant, and alleged, as a defense, that she was then, and had been since the 1st day of March, 1878, in the actual and exclusive possession of all of the property, and that her possession was not joint with that of plaintiff or any other person. A reply being filed denying the new matter alleged in the answer, the cause was referred to a referee to report the facts and the law to the court. In January, 1883, the parties, by their respective attorneys, appeared before the referee for the purpose of taking testimony. The plaintiff offered in evidence a certified copy of the judgment roll in the divorce case of Morrill vs. Morrill, and the following stipulation of the parties was entered into: "It is hereby stipulated by the parties that up till the 4th of February, 1882, both plaintiff and defendant occupied the premises described in the complaint; that since that time the defendant has been in the actual, exclusive occupancy of all of said premises, and has lived there as a home, and that neither the defendant nor any person for him has act-ally occupied said premises, or any part thereof, since February 4, 1882, as a home or otherwise; that both before and since February 4, 1882, and up to the present time, both plaintiff and defendant have paid taxes and street improvements according to their respective interests. It is understood that this stipulation shall not be construed so as to affect the rights of either party as a tenant in common. It is further agreed that the referee may make personal inspection and investigation of the premises in question, and from the facts thus obtained report to the court (if this suit can be maintained) (1) whether the property can be divided; (2) if it can, then how division shall be made; (3) if it cannot be divided, then recommend a sale." On May 4, 1883, the referee filed his report, the findings of fact and conclusions of law being in favor of defendant, and he also reported that pursuant to the stipulation of the parties, he had made personal inspection of the premises, and found that they could be divided without injury to the rights of either. The report recommended that the north 19 feet of the lot be set off to defendant, and the south 31 feet to plaintiff, each portion being particularly described in the report. Motions were made to confirm and set aside this report by the respective parties to the suit. On June 7, 1883, the court being fully advised, and the counsel of the respective parties consenting thereto in open court, a decree was entered confirming said report, and it was adjudged and decreed that plaintiff and defendant were tenants and in possession of the property; that plaintiff was the owner of an undivided two-thirds thereof, and defendant of the remaining one-third; that the premises could be partitioned according to the respective interests of the parties without prejudice to the rights of either, and confirming the partition as made by referee, particularly describing in said decree the portion set off to the respective parties.

It is argued on behalf of respondent here that the decree in the partition suit of Morrill vs. Morrill is void (1) because defendant was not in possession of the land sought to be partitioned at the commencement of the suit, and such fact, it is claimed, appears from the records thereof; (2) that the stipulation entered into by her attorney was without her knowledge and against her instructions, and was done for the purpose of defrauding her; (3) that no referees were appointed to partition the land as by law required. It is first important to determine whether this is a direct or collateral attack on this decree. The contention of respondent is that it is a direct attack, and therefore no presumptions are to be invoked in order to sustain it. The complaint contains no allegations concerning this decree, but the first mention thereof is in the answer, where defendant pleads it as an estoppel. The plaintiff then seeks to avoid its effect by averring in the reply matters which she claims are sufficient to invalidate it. This is undoubtedly a collateral attack. It is an attempt to impeach the decree in a proceeding not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying the decree or enjoining its execution. A collateral attack on a judgment is any proceeding which is not instituted for the express purpose of annulling, correcting, or modifying such decree or enjoining its execution. 12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 147j. The fact that the parties are the same, and that the plaintiff seeks to attack the decree by the allegation of the reply, cannot change the rule, or make the attack any the less a collateral one.

The first objection to the validity of this decree is based upon the stipulation of the attorney "that the defendant in the partition suit has since February 4th been in the actual, exclusive occupancy of all of said premises, and has lived there as a home, and that neither the defendant, nor any person for him, has actually occupied said premises or any part thereof since February 4, 1882, as a home or otherwise." The contention is that a plaintiff, in order to maintain a suit for partition, must not only be a tenant in common, but in the possession, of the land sought to be partitioned. If he has been ousted or dispossessed, and his co-tenant is holding adversely to him, the suit cannot be maintained, and many authorities are cited to that effect. It is urged that this stipulation shows that defendant was not in possession of these premises at the time he commenced this suit, but had been ousted by plaintiff long prior thereto. It may be doubted whether such a construction can be put upon the language of the stipulation, since possession usually follows the legal title where no adverse possession is shown, and the possession of one tenant in common of the land, in the absence of an ouster, will inure to the benefit of his co-tenant. Freem. Co-Ten. § 167. "Actual, exclusive occupancy" by the defendant in the partition suit may not have been inconsistent with the title of her co-tenant, but, however that may be, it was a question for the court before whom the suit was pending, and its decision, however erroneous it may have been, is binding on the parties, until reversed or annulled in some proper proceeding. Atkins v. Kinnan, 20 Wend. 246; Voorhees v. Bank, 10 Pet. 473; Dolph v. Barney, 5 Or. 192; Woodward v. Baker, 10 Or. 491; Norton v. Harding, 3 Or. 361; Hill v. Cooper, 8 Or. 254.

After a court has acquired jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question arising in the case, and, however erroneous its decision may be, it is binding on the parties until reversed or annulled. Here we have a competent court with admitted jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, with full power and authority to decide all questions arising in the case, and it is sought to impeach the validity of its decree, because, forsooth, it was mistaken, either as to the law applicable to the facts before it, or to the facts themselves. BALDWIN, J., in the case of Voorhees v. Bank, supra, speaking on this subject, says: "The errors of the court, however apparent, can be examined only by an appellate power; and by the laws of every country a time is fixed for such examination, whether in rendering judgment, issuing execution, or enforcing it by process of sale or imprisonment. No rule can be made more reasonable than that the person who complains of an injury done him should avail himself of his legal remedy in a reasonable time, or that that time should be limited by law. This has wisely been done by acts of limitations on writs of error and appeals. If that time elapses, common justice requires that what a defendant cannot directly do, in the mode pointed out by law, he shall not be permitted to do collaterally, by evasion. A judgment irreversible by a superior court cannot be declared a nullity by any authority of law. If, after its rendition, it is declared void for any matter which can be assigned for error only on a writ of error or appeal, then said court not only usurps the jurisdiction of an appellate court, but collaterally nullifies what such court is prohibited by express statute law from even reversing. If the principle once prevails that any proceeding of a court of competent jurisdiction can be declared to be a nullity by any court after a writ of error or appeal is barred by limitation, every county court or justice of the peace in the Union may exercise the same right, from which our own judgments or process would not be exempt. "We need not pursue the examination of this question any further, for the principle is so well settled that it is said to be "an axiom of the law" that, when a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, its judgments cannot be impeached collaterally for errors of law or irregularity in practice. Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308; Sibley v. Waffle, 16, N. Y. 191.

On the argument of this case much stress was laid upon the effect of the alleged agreement of defendant concerning the property in dispute made in August, 1879; and it was claimed that by virtue of that agreement plaintiff became the equitable owner of this property. There are two reasons—either of them sufficient, in our opinion—why plaintiff can claim nothing by virtue of this agreement in this suit. The first is, such agreement is not alleged in the complaint, or in any way referred to therein. If plaintiff intended to rely upon this agreement she should have so averred in her complaint. Not having done so, she cannot aid the complaint by departing from the cause of suit stated therein, and alleging another and different one in her reply. In her complaint plaintiff seeks to prevail by virtue of a pure legal title. This agreement, if executed by defendant, only gave her an equitable title at best. The other is that this writing was executed, if at all, long prior to the commencement of the partition suit, and plaintiff should have availed herself of any rights it gave her in that suit. Nell v. Tolman, 12 Or. 289, 7 Pac. Rep. 103. If she neglected or failed without some reasonable excuse to produce all the evidence in her possession in that suit, it is now too late for her to be heard to complain. There must be an end to litigation, and, where a party has an opportunity to present his defense and neglects to do so, the demands of the law require that he should take the consequences, when the judgment or decree is sought to be enforced against him in a collateral proceeding.

This decree in the partition suit is conclusive between the parties as to the title to the land, and is a solemn adjudication that they were tenants in common therein. Edson v. Munsell, 12 Allen, 600; Hancock v. Lopez, 53 Cal. 362; Freem. Co-Ten. § 530. The plaintiff is estopped by that decree from showing or attempting to show that she was holding the premises adversely to the defendant, or that he had no interest therein, at the date of its rendition.

The next question in this case is, can the decree in the partition suit be impeached for fraud? It is claimed by respondent that the evidence and findings of the referee show that the decree was obtained by fraud and collusion between her attorney in that suit and the defendant here. It is argued with much force and learning that, since defendants rely upon the particular decree as one of the muniments of their title, plaintiff should be permitted to show, if the facts are with her, that such decree was obtained by fraud and collusion between her attorney and adversary; that, since fraud vitiates every transaction, even a judgment, she ought to be permitted to treat this decree as invalid, when sought to be enforced or relied upon even in a collateral proceeding. This, we believe, is the first time this question has ever been before this court for decision. In the case of Murray v. Murray, 6 Or. 19, the court held that a judgment of a sister state could be attacked collaterally for fraud by a party, when offered in evidence in the courts of this state, for the reason that the party sought to be affected thereby has no opportunity to attack it in our own courts by a direct proceeding, and should not be required to go into a foreign state to do so. As we have already said, this cannot be considered a direct attack upon this judgment. No reference is made to the judgment in the complaint. No facts are alleged upon which a court could base a decree annulling the decree or judgment. The plaintiff in her complaint claims title by good and sufficient mesne conveyances from the government of the United States, and by virtue of the statute of limitations. This is not sufficient to entitle her to attack this judgment. U. S. v. Flint, 4 Sawy. 42; Mayor, etc., v. Brady, 115 N. Y. 599, 22 N. E. Rep. 237; U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61. It is a general rule, at common law, that parties and privies to a judgment may not attack it collaterally for fraud. And, after a party has been duly served with process, it is his duty to see that such a judgment is not obtained against him, and, if it is, he must take some proper proceedings to have it annulled. As long as it remains in full force and effect the parties cannot treat it as invalid, unless such invalidity appears upon the face of the judgment. It is true, fraud vitiates every transaction into which it enters, even a judgment, but such fraud must be made to appear in some appropriate proceeding known to the law. The statute points out ample methods by which a party may be relieved from such a judgment, such as a new trial, review for error of law, an application to be relieved therefrom; and, beyond the methods provided by statute, courts possess inherent powers, as has been said, "to an almost unlimited extent, to redress wrongs by modifying or setting aside judgments obtained by fraud or mistake." These methods, however, must be resorted to. They give no countenance to the idea that a judgment wrongfully obtained may be completely ignored, and the rights of the parties again inquired into in a collateral proceeding. Freem. Judgm. § 334; Davis v. Davis, 61 Me. 395; Mussey v. White, 58 Vt. 45, 8 Atl. Rep. 319; Granger v. Clark, 22 Me. 128; Railroad Corp. v. Sparhawk, 1 Allen 448; Demerit v. Lyford, 27 N. H. 541; Krekeler v. Ritter, 62 N. Y. 372; Weiss v. Guérineau, 109 Ind. 438, 9 N. E. Rep. 399; Callahan v. Griswold, 9 Mo. 457; Mason v. Messenger, 17 Iowa, 273. From these, and many other authorities that could be cited, we take the law to be that a judgment of a court of this state having jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties cannot be questioned collaterally for fraud alunde the record by the parties or privies. The case relied upon by the respondent as announcing a contrary doctrine is Mandeville v. Reynolds, 68 N. Y. 523. This was an action on a judgment, the defense to which was based upon a satisfaction of the judgment of record, and upon an order of court ratifying that satisfaction. The plaintiff offered to show that the entry upon the docket and the order were obtained by fraud and collusion. The court held that such evidence was competent, and in the opinion there are statements to the effect that a judgment obtained by fraud could be attacked collaterally. This decision was made under the reformed Code of Procedure of the state of New York, which permits equitable defenses to be pleaded in actions at law; and the court say: "The court acts upon the matters involved in the action now in a double capacity,—as a court of law and one of equity. As a court of equity it meets the question of the validity of the judgment, not as one of law, but as of equity, and takes hold of the facts offered to it, not as a collateral attack upon the judgment, but as a direct assault, which, by the changing nature of the suit and trial, has become the main question and legitimately before it for trial." In this state the distinction between proceedings at law and in equity is still maintained. Burrage v. Mining Co., 12 Or. 169, 6 Pac. Rep. 766. Authorities under the reformed Codes of Procedure are therefore not applicable here. We have so far treated this question on the theory that the evidence shows the decree to have been obtained by fraud, and our views as to the law render it unnecessary to examine the evidence, but in passing we deem it proper to say that we cannot agree with counsel for respondent in their construction of the testimony. We think the evidence significantly fails to show that the decree was obtained by fraud or collusion. It is also claimed that the stipulation in the partition suit was entered into by plaintiff's attorney without her knowledge or consent. This claim is not sustained by the testimony. It is true plaintiff says she knew nothing about the proceedings in the suit, but the attorney who appeared for her testifies that she was informed of and consented to every step taken therein, and the referee who made the partition says that she was present when he was examining the premises for the purpose of partitioning the same; that she knew what he was doing, and was consulted about the matter.

It is also claimed the decree is void because the partition was made by only one referee, and not three, as provided by statute. At most this was but an irregularity, and cannot be inquired into in this suit. Cole v. Hall, 2 Hill, 627; Kinnier v. Kinnler, 45 N. Y. 535.

It follows, therefore, that the decree of the court below must be reversed, and a decree entered here in favor of defendants.

MCCULSKY v. KLOSTERMAN.

CONTRACTS—EVIDENCE OF USAGE.

1. Usage may be used as evidence to interpret a contract, but not to vary or contradict it. Its purpose is to ascertain the intention of the parties where it cannot be ascertained by the terms of the contract.

2. In all contracts as to the subject-matter of which known usages prevail, the parties proceed on the tacit assumption of such usages, but commonly reduce into writing the particulars of their agreement, but omit to specify those known usages which are included as of course by mutual understanding.

3. Where, in a contract to ascertain the net profits of a firm, it was provided, among other things, that "from the outstanding accounts 5 per cent. be deducted to cover losses and bad accounts," and usage was admitted to show in such case that "outstanding accounts" meant those from which the bad accounts had been segregated and charged to profit and loss, held no error upon the facts as disclosed by the record.

4. Where the subject-matter of a contract is the ascertainment of the net profits of a firm for the purpose of paying in cash the value of a one-third share, the term "outstanding accounts," unless it otherwise appear, has a particular meaning, different from the common or ordinary meaning.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

This is a suit in equity for an accounting to enforce the rights of the plaintiff under a contract with the defendant, of which the following is a copy: "This agreement made and entered into this 6th day of August, 1889, by and between John Klosterman and Alexander E. McCulsky, both of the city of Portland, county of Multnomah, and state of Oregon, witnesseth: That whereas, said John Klosterman has been and now is doing business at Portland as a wholesale grocer, under the firm name of Klosterman & Co.; and whereas, he said A. E. McCulsky has been and now is in the employment of the firm of Klosterman & Co., in order to fix the compensation of the said A. E. McCulsky, it is agreed as follows: The said A. E. McCulsky shall be entitled to and shall receive one-fourth of the net profits of the said firm of Klosterman & Co., commencing ing with the 19th day of November, 1886, and extending to and including the 19th day of November, 1888, and from the 19th day of November, 1888, up to and including the 19th day of November, 1889, the said A. E. McCulsky shall be entitled to and shall receive a sum equal to one-third of the net profits of the said firm for the said time last above named. The payments above provided for and the amounts thereof shall be ascertained and made as follows: On the said 19th day of November, 1889, an account of stock shall be taken, and from the amount of the outstanding accounts of the firm there shall be first deducted five per cent. thereof to cover losses and bad accounts; and then there shall be paid to the said A. E. McCulsky the share of net profit after said deduction to which he is entitled under this agreement. Such payment shall be made by giving him a credit on the books of said firm, or in cash upon thirty days' notice that cash is demanded. From the sum above provided to be paid to the said A. E. McCulsky, there shall be deducted all moneys drawn by him from said firm during the times hereinbefore mentioned. If on or before the 19th day of November, 1889, a new agreement is made between John Klosterman and A. E. McCulsky for a further period of service, and A. E. McCulsky allows his share of the net profits, to which he is entitled under this agreement, to remain in the business, then there shall be no deduction made from the above amount, of the outstanding accounts, provided they are collected by the said firm of Klosterman & Co. to cover losses and bad accounts on the day of settlement or the 19th day of November, 1889. Witness our hands in duplicate this 9th day of August, 1889. JOHN KLOSTERMAN. A. E. McCULSKY Executed in the presence of NORVAL FORDYCE." The defendant, after making his denials, sets up, among other things, an alleged custom or usage existing among the merchants of the city of Portland, with reference to which the said contract was executed, and in contemplation of which the said contract was modified and controlled by said custom or usage to the extent and in the manner therein alleged. During the trial, evidence of such usage or custom was admitted, which the court found to exist, and in view of which the contract was made and executed, and, to the extent and effect specified and alleged, applied it to the contract in its construction, which resulting adversely to the claim of the plaintiff in the accounting, he appeals from the decree rendered therein to this court.

Williams & Wood, for appellant. Stott, Boise & Stott, for respondent.

LORD, J. This suit is brought against the defendant partnership by the plaintiff, who was employed by them, but who furnished no part of the capital invested in the business upon the above agreement by which they stipulated that he should receive a sum equal to one-third of the net profits of the business for the time specified. The controversy between them arises upon the construction to be given to the contract, the counsel for plaintiff claiming that it explains itself and needs no other interpretation, while those for the defendant insist that it was made with reference to a custom or usage, and extrinsic proof of that fact is essential to arrive at the true intention of the parties. The contract provides that the plaintiff shall receive a sum equal to one-third of the net profits, and that the payment shall be ascertained as follows: "On the said 19th day of November, 1889, an account of stock shall be taken, and from the outstanding accounts of the firm there shall be first deducted five per cent. thereof to cover losses and bad accounts, and then there shall be paid to the said A. E. McCulsky the share of net profits after said deduction to which he is entitled under this agreement." "Net profits" are said to be the gain which accrues on an investment after deducting expenses and losses. "The words 'net profits,'" said VAN FLEET, V. C., "define themselves. They mean what shall remain, as the clear gains of any business venture, after deducting the capital invested in the business, the expenses incurred in its conduct, and the losses sustained in its prosecution." Park v. Locomotive Works, 40 N. J. Eq. 121, 3 Atl. Rep. 162. With respect to the capital invested and the expenses incurred in the conduct of the business there is no controversy, and these elements may, for the present, be eliminated from our consideration. It is the losses sustained in the prosecution of the business to which our consideration is more particularly directed. The point of contention is confined to "bad accounts" as losses, under the contract, and involves an inquiry into net profits as there provided. That point is that, "from the outstanding accounts of the firm, there shall first be deducted five per cent. thereof to cover losses and bad accounts." Is the intention of the parties so clearly expressed by those words that no extrinsic proof of usage or custom is necessary to explain and ascertain what the parties meant by them? The argument for the plaintiff is that the language of the contract cited plainly means that 5 per cent. is to be deducted or allowed for bad accounts from the outstanding accounts, whether the bad accounts in fact amount to that much or not, and that it was so plainly fixed for the purpose of easily liquidating the amount of bad accounts as losses to be deducted in computing the net profits on account of the relation of the parties, and, to avoid the controversy which might otherwise arise by charging bad accounts to profit and loss, as is usually the custom. The argument for the defendant is that there is an immemorial usage or custom among the merchants of Portland to charge all accounts considered uncollectible, or bad accounts, to profit and loss, and that such bad or uncollectible accounts are not to be considered or estimated in determining the net profits; that the parties to the contract had full knowledge of such custom, and made the contract with reference to it; and that, construing the contract in contemplation of such usage or custom, the provisions of the contract adverted to only meant or were intended to mean that 5 per cent. should be deducted for bad accounts from the outstanding accounts as remained after the uncollectible or bad accounts had been segregated by charging them to profit and loss. It thus appears that the real question at the bottom of the controversy is, how shall bad accounts to cover losses be deducted under the contract as provided from outstanding accounts after uncollectible or bad accounts have been segregated and charged to profit and loss, or from the outstanding accounts, including good and bad accounts? In its general sense, "outstanding accounts" means such accounts as are due, unpaid, uncollectible, as an ordinary outstanding draft or bond or other indebtedness, and is broad enough to include within its terms good and bad accounts which are due and unpaid. In its mercantile sense, when net profits are to be ascertained, it means such accounts as are deemed good and collectible, and from which accounts deemed to be bad and uncollectible have been segregated and charged to profit and loss. If we take the words "outstanding accounts," and apply to them the general sense in construing the contract, it will include good and bad accounts due and unpaid, and from which the 5 per cent. is to be deducted to cover losses, or to segregate the bad accounts. But if we take the same words and apply to them the mercantile sense in the construction of the contract, it means such "outstanding accounts" as have had the bad accounts sifted and are supposed to be good, and from which are to be deducted 5 per cent. to cover losses, which may occur notwithstanding such outstanding accounts are supposed to be collectible. In ascertaining the net profits of a business, if we take the capital invested, the expenses of running it, and the losses incurred in its prosecution, which last element necessarily includes such accounts as are to be treated as bad and uncollectible, and deduct from the account of stock and the outstanding accounts now freed from bad accounts and treated as outstanding accounts collectible, the difference will be the net profits. This calculation proceeds upon the hypothesis that the outstanding accounts are good, and the bad accounts have been separated from them, and charged to the losses of the business.

But it is common knowledge that it sometimes happens that some of the outstanding accounts turn out to be uncollectible or bad accounts, notwithstanding they have been treated and deemed to be good accounts, and collectible. Was not then the object of the provision of the contract in dispute to cover losses which might arise from outstanding accounts deemed to be good and charged up as collectible, but some of which might turn out to be bad and uncollectible? It was to show such was the sense in which outstanding accounts were to be considered when net profits were sought to be ascertained that proof of usage or custom was resorted to to ascertain the intention of the parties. This proof, it is insisted, was inadmissible, because it violates the plain terms of the contract; that the provision needs no extrinsic proof to aid its interpretation; and that to allow it was to vary or contradict the plain meaning and effect of this provision of the contract. As contracts are said to derive their force from the mutual assent of the parties to its terms, it would follow that its operation is to be ascertained from the intention of the parties; and this intention is to be collected from the expressions used by the contracting parties. When parties so draw their contracts as to leave little, if anything, to construction, the legal effect of the agreement must be enforced. It is when their meaning is not clear, or the language is ambiguous, that contracts are to be construed in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties when the contract was made. Wilson v. Randall, 67 N. Y. 341; Walker v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 532; Williams v. Jones, 5 Barn. & C. 108; Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 737. Nor can usage or custom be admitted to vary or contradict the express terms of a contract, but it may be admitted to ascertain that which by the contract is left in doubt. "Usage," said Lord LYNCHBURST, "may be admissible to explain what is doubtful, but it is never admitted to contradict what is plain." Blackett v. Assurance Co., 2 Crompt. & J. 244. It may be used as evidence to explain or interpret, but not to vary a contract. Its purpose is to ascertain the real intention of the parties where it cannot be ascertained by the terms of the contract. But it cannot be used as evidence to supersede or contradict a positive and definite provision of a contract, because the presence of such a provision in the contract is evidence of the intention of the parties to overrule such usage or custom in conflict with its terms. "When it is sought," says Mr. Justice MILLER, "to incorporate the custom into an express contract whose terms are reduced to writing, and are expressed in language, neither technical nor ambiguous, and therefore needing no such aid in its construction, it amounts to establishing the principle that a custom may add to or vary or contradict the well-expressed intention of the parties made in writing." Partridge v. Insurance Co., 15 Wall. 573; Dixon v. Dunham, 14 Ill. 324; Harkins v. Warren, 115 Mass. 535. In a word, a contract which is clear, certain, and distinct in its terms is not subject to modification by proof of usage or custom. These authorities go to the full extent in upholding the principle which is invoked to exclude the proof of usage or custom admitted in the present case. But none go to the extent of holding, when the meaning of the words are doubtful or ambiguous, or of technical import as applied to the subject-matter, that extrinsic proof is not admissible to ascertain the intention of the parties. Now, by the admitted terms of the contract, the plaintiff was to receive a sum in payment equal to one-third of the net profits of the firm. It was a mercantile contract, and its subject-matter was the ascertainment of the net profits of the firm. The contract says it was to "be made and ascertained as follows:" "On the said 19th day of November, 1889, an account of stock shall be taken from the outstanding accounts of the firm, there shall be first deducted five per cent. to cover losses and bad accounts, and then there shall be paid to the said McCulsky his share of the net profits," etc. For the purpose of ascertaining the net profits of the firm, and paying the plaintiff a sum equal to his share, the contract provides the method in which it shall be ascertained and made, and yet it is too plain for argument that the taking of account of the stock, and deducting five per cent. from the outstanding accounts to cover losses and bad accounts, would not determine the net profits. There are other elements omitted, and which must be included in the calculation to ascertain the net profits, however outstanding accounts may be considered.

Upon the method provided by the contract, net profits cannot be ascertained, and his share of them computed for payment. It is true that there is no controversy between the parties in respect to them, and it is admitted "that running expenses were, of course, to be deducted before there could be any net profits," which shows quite plainly that the method provided to ascertain the net profits by the contract was imperfect, and not capable of accomplishing the object sought to be attained by it. The contract also provides that an account of stock shall be taken; but what object can be served by this, when the 5 per cent. deduction, further provided from outstanding accounts, in whatever way construed, will not ascertain the net profits? To say that this provision was only intended to ascertain the item of bad accounts as an element in determining net profits is to ignore this part of it; for to include it, the omitted matter must be supplied in the calculation, which not only exposes that the mode of ascertaining the net profits as provided is insufficient for that purpose, but tends strongly to indicate, if what is omitted shall be supplied, that the basis of such calculation will include outstanding accounts freed from bad accounts, subject to a deduction of 5 per cent. to cover losses arising from them, or as a protection against such liability, for the reason that the share of the net profits to which the plaintiff was entitled was to be paid in cash. But eliminating these matters, and confining ourselves exclusively to the matter of the deduction of 5 per cent. to cover bad accounts, do not the words "outstanding accounts," in a mercantile contract, when net profits are to be ascertained, have a technical or particular meaning different from their ordinary or general meaning when used without reference to net profits, or a calculation to ascertain net profits? The admission of the proof of usage was for this purpose, and the objection raised to its admissibility is not that the words may not have such particular meaning when net profits are to be determined, but that the parties have superseded this meaning by a plain and explicit statement that from the outstanding accounts 5 per cent. is to be deducted for bad accounts, which indicates clearly that it was the intention of the parties to overrule such usage in conflict with its terms. That it was plainly intended, as counsel say in their brief, that instead of charging bad accounts to profit and loss,—that is, instead of segregating the bad accounts bodily,—5 per cent. of all accounts, good or bad, should be deducted to cover bad accounts and losses that otherwise would be written up as profit and loss. This argument plainly admits, were it not for the plain and unambiguous meaning of the provision, as claimed, that bad accounts otherwise would be written up to profit and loss; in a word, that the provision is so explicit as to supersede the meaning that would otherwise be given to it, and evinces an intention to repudiate any meaning derived from usage or custom in conflict with it. Hence, the proof of usage to aid in the interpretation of the provision was inadmissible. Now, this argument admits that outstanding accounts, when net profits are to be ascertained, are freed from bad accounts by charging them to profit and loss except for such definite meaning as is insisted supersedes it; but it recognizes at the same time that there is a particular meaning attached to these words, or that they do have a commercial signification, different from the sense in which they are employed when outstanding accounts are referred to generally, which may include good or bad accounts. But how is this definite and settled meaning ascertained by which the mercantile sense of these words is overthrown or precluded from being shown? Simply by resorting to the dictionary and defining the word "outstanding" in this wise: "Outstanding: To stand or remain beyond the proper time; hence, to be unpaid, as a debt, and the like. The whole amount of the revenues, . . . as well outstanding as collected. To remain uncollected, unpaid, as outstanding contracts." Hence, all accounts uncollected are outstanding accounts, and include both bad and good accounts. But this is only defining the word in its general sense, without reference to a particular sense with which it may be clothed when used in a mercantile contract to determine net profits. That in their general sense, outstanding accounts mean unpaid accounts, and may include good and bad accounts, is not questioned, and has already been admitted. This is their common meaning. But we are called upon to interpret these words in a contract where they may have a technical meaning which may modify that meaning. What is there in these words, or the provision, that fixes and settles the general sense as the proper one to be applied to them to the exclusion of the technical sense sought to be applied in the interpretation of the contract? The contract is a mercantile one, and the subject-matter to which the words are to be applied is the ascertainment of the net profits of a firm. In such case it can hardly be disputed that they have a meaning different from their common meaning, unless the intention is plainly to exclude it. What word or phrase is there to show such intention, or give it that effect? The whole argument is based upon treating the words in their general sense when the nature of the contract, its subject-matter, and the usage of tradeshow that they have an accepted signification different from their common meaning. "What words," as Mr. Lawson says, "are more plain and unambiguous on their face than such words as 'a thousand,' 'a week,' 'a day.' Yet we shall see 'a thousand' has been held to mean 1,000, 'a week' only during a portion of the year, 'a day' only a working day." Lawson, Usages & Cust. 368. And again he says: "In all contracts as to the subject-matter of which known usages prevail, parties are found to proceed on the tacit assumption of these usages. They commonly reduce into writing the special particulars of their agreement, but omit to specify those known usages which are included; however, as of course by mutual understanding." In what respect are the words "outstanding accounts" plainer, of more positive signification, than "a thousand," or "a week," or the innumerable instances which might be referred to, and are cited in the excellent work just referred to? The case cited and relied upon is not in conflict with the principle of the admission of such testimony. The written agreement in that case, BILLINGS, J., said, "used a term—'working day'—which is unambiguous, and which had an accepted signification, both in commercial and judicial language;" and to allow "proof of usage to be introduced to show that the very respect in which this term had its origin, and a world-wide employment has a local meaning repugnant to its settled sense," would, as the learned judge said, certainly "introduce ambiguity where none exists, and defeat the clearly expressed intent of a written agreement." Pedersen v. Eugster, 14 Fed. Rep. 423, 424. In that case the meaning of the term was sought to be dwarfed from its accepted signification, alike in commerce and law, contrary to its settled sense,—a sense that could only be overcome by positive and definite language in the contract overruling it. No such settled sense alike attends the use of the words "outstanding accounts" without regard to the circumstances of its employment. They have a definite signification when employed to ascertain net profits by the usages of trade, unless the meaning is otherwise expressly intended, and the argument admits it. In such case, when the contract involves their employment for the purpose of computing net profits, the tacit assumption is that they were used in the sense of such usage, unless there is something in conflict with it. In the case at bar, the object of the proof was to show how "outstanding accounts" were understood and treated when net profits were computed, and that they had, by the usage of trade, a signification different than when otherwise employed, or generally. See Myers v. Sari, 107 E. C. L. 315. If we allow this proof, and give to these words this sense, the 5 per cent. is to be deducted from the outstanding accounts deemed to have been winnowed of its bad accounts. But it is common knowledge that outstanding accounts considered and treated as collectible often fail to realize the cash amount which they represent despite the utmost vigilance. All such calculations are based upon an approximation to the actual collectibility of such accounts, but it is every-day knowledge that such calculations are liable to disappoint our expectations, despite our utmost circumspection, and in the face of our best-considered judgments. Bearing in mind that, when the net profits are ascertained, the plaintiff is to receive a sum in cash payment equal to the one-third value of such net profits, it is not difficult to understand why the defendant should require and the plaintiff be willing to contract to give 5 per cent. deduction from such outstanding accounts. The basis is a cash valuation, and it is hardly probable that the accounts would realize more after such deduction of 5 per cent. The truth is, there are few merchants, whether wholesale or retail, who, after they have sifted their accounts of all indebtedness deemed non-collectible, would not readily take a reduction of 5 per cent. for the cash in preference to running the risk of their collectibility. It results that there was no error, and that the decree must be affirmed.

FLOWER V. BARNEKOFF.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PARTNERSHIP TO DEAL IN LAND.

1. A valid contract of partnership for the purpose of speculating in real estate may be made by parol.

2. In a suit by one of the partners for an accounting of the profits realized under such an agreement, after the same has been executed, a partner who has received the entire profits is estopped from claiming that the agreement is void under the statute of frauds.

3. Where two persons agree jointly to secure an option on a tract of land, for the purpose of jointly selling the land, and sharing in the profits of the transaction, they are partners as between themselves for that transaction, and owe to each other the rights and duties of that relation, although option may be taken in the name of one of the parties.

4. Evidence examined, and held to constitute a partnership.

Appeal from circuit court, Yamhill county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

This is a suit in equity for a dissolution of a partnership, and for an accounting. The complaint alleges that the contract of partnership was entered into between the plaintiff, James Flower, and the defendant, F. Barnekoff, on March 10, 1889, and that it had for its object the purchase on partnership account of an option upon certain lands of one H. A. Tucker, lying adjacent to the town of McMinnville, Yamhill county, Or. The purpose of the partnership so formed was, as soon as the privilege had been secured, to plat the land as an addition to McMinnville, and to put it upon the market in the shape of town lots and blocks. Each partner was to pay half of all expenses, and upon the property being sold was to receive half of what was left of the proceeds after providing for the purchase price to be paid Tucker. It was understood and agreed at the time the partnership was formed that Flower should have the special and exclusive charge of that part of the firm business which related to the platting of the land and putting it on the market. In pursuance of this partnership, and as a member of the firm, Barnekoff succeeded in getting a 60 days' option from Tucker on March 14, 1889, for which he paid him $100 cash, the purchase price agreed upon being $150 an acre. This option Barnekoff took in his own name, but for and in behalf of the firm. Barnekoff reported to Flower what he had done, and Flower approved of it, and then and there agreed to stand his half of the loss in the event of their not being able to turn over the purchase within the 60 days, to which agreement Barnekoff then and there became a party. The plaintiff at once set to work to carry out his part of the partnership, and before May 1, 1889, had secured a purchaser for the entire tract, able, willing, and ready to buy the same at an agreed price of $200 per acre. On that, Barnekoff, taking advantage of the fact that the option stood in his own name, sold the land to the Investment Company of Portland for $18,022, which was at the rate of $200 per acre, without the knowledge or consent of Flower, and in fraud of his rights under the partnership agreement. Barnekoff now refuses to account to Flower for the profits thus made,—viz., $4,505.50. The answer denies each and every allegation of the complaint, except that the defendant secured the Tucker option in his own name, and that he sold the land to the investment company at a profit of $4,505.50. The case was sent to a referee to take testimony, and, upon the coming in of his report, a decree was entered dismissing plaintiff's complaint, from which this appeal is taken.

Milton W. Smith, for appellant. W. D. Fenton, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is contended by respondent at the outset of this case that the agreement of the parties, if a contract of partnership, being for a partnership to deal in real estate, is void under the statute of frauds, because not in writing. This question has been much discussed by the courts, and there is considerable conflict in the adjudged cases. On the one hand it is claimed that a parol agreement for a partnership to deal in lands would be within the statute which provides that no "estate or interest in real property" * * * can be created, transferred, or declared otherwise than by operation of law, or by a conveyance or other instrument in writing, subscribed by the party creating, transferring, or declaring the same." 1 Hill, Code, § 781. And to this effect is the case of Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sum. 435. On the other hand there are many authorities which hold that such an agreement is not within the statute, for the reason that the real estate is treated in equity as personal property for all the purposes of partnership. Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369; Essex v. Essex, 20 Beav. 449; Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1. The question is ably and exhaustively examined in Dale v. Hamilton, and the conclusions reached by the vice-chancellor in that case seem to us to be supported both by reason and authority. The general doctrine is there laid down that a partnership agreement between A. and B. that they shall be jointly interested in a speculation for buying, improving for sale, and selling lands may be proved without being evidenced by a writing signed by, or by the authority of, the party to be charged therewith within the statute of frauds; and, such an agreement being proved, A. or B. may establish his interest in land, the subject of the partnership, without such interest being evidenced by any writing. In Chester v. Dickerson it is said: "Most of the conflict in the authorities has arisen in controversies about the title to the real estate after the dissolution of the partnership or the death of one of the partners. But, suppose two persons, by parol agreement, enter into a partnership to speculate in lands, how do they come in conflict with the statute of frauds? No estate or interest in lands has been granted, assigned, or declared. When the agreement is made, no lands are owned by the firm, and neither party attempts to convey or assign any to the other. The contract is a valid one, and in pursuance of this agreement they go on and buy, improve, and sell lands. While they are doing this, do they not act as partners, and bear a partnership relation to each other? Within the meaning of the statute, in such case, neither conveys or assigns any land to the other, and hence there is no conflict with the statute. The statute is not so broad as to prevent proof by parol of an interest in lands. It is simply aimed at the creation or conveyance of an estate in lands without a writing." In Knott v. Knott, 6 Or. 146, Watson, J., in discussing this question, says: "While there is a conflict in the authorities, many of the courts having followed the decision in Smith v. Burnham, we regard the doctrine laid down in Dale v. Hamilton as better adapted to the course of business in this country, where mercantile, manufacturing, and various other partnerships are necessarily compelled, in the course of their business, the investment of their capital, and the collection of debts due them, to become the owners of real property." While the case just referred to was not a partnership formed for the purpose of dealing in real estate, the decision shows the tendency of this court to follow Dale v. Hamilton rather than Smith v. Burnham. From a careful examination of the authorities, we are of the opinion that a valid contract of partnership for the purpose of speculating in real estate may be made by parol. Traphagen v. Burt, 67 N. Y. 30; King v. Barnes, 109 N. Y. 267, 16 N. E. Rep. 332; Richards v. Grinnell, 63 Iowa, 44, 18 N. W. Rep. 688; Treat v. Hiles, 68 Wis. 344, 32 N. W. Rep. 517; Wallace v. Carpenter, 85 Ill. 590; Holmes v. McCray, 51 Ind. 358; Newell v. Cochran, 41 Minn. 374, 43 N. W. Rep. 84; Black v. Black, 15 Ga. 449; Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. Rep. 359; Meagher v. Reed, 24 Pac. Rep. 681. Many of the cases above cited go much further than is necessary for us to go in this case in order to admit the proof of the formation of the partnership here. The contract does not in any way affect the title to real estate, nor does the present controversy involve any such question. The subject-matter of the contract was the profits to be realized from the sale of the Tucker land, and the controversy here is as to such profits. The contract of purchase from Tucker was not secured to hold as land, or with any intention of ultimately vesting the legal title in the partnership, but for the purpose of sale and the acquisition of profits. It was secured simply as an article of commerce, and for speculation. No controversy exists here about the title to any land taken or owned by the partners, but it simply relates to the conduct of the defendant while he was acting as a partner; and in such a case the statute of frauds certainly cannot be invoked to defeat this suit. The object of the alleged partnership has been accomplished, and this suit is for the purpose of adjusting the accounts between the parties. This is a matter over which a court of equity has jurisdiction, and the defendant cannot, after the contract has been executed and the profits of the transaction gone into his hands, be heard to say that the contract, under which the profits were realized, is void under the statute of frauds. Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. Rep. 359; Morrill v. Colehour, 82 Ill. 619; Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1.

The next question presents more difficulty and relates to the allegation of partnership set up in the complaint and denied in the answer. The defendant, Barnekoff, resides at McMinnville, and is engaged in the milling business, while the plaintiff is a real-estate dealer in Portland. About the 1st of March, 1890, defendant, desiring to purchase some land for use in his business, applied to one H. A. Tucker, who owned a tract of land, containing 90 acres, adjoining defendant's mill property, with that object in view; but Tucker refused to divide his land, or sell any portion without selling the entire tract. The defendant then called upon plaintiff, with whom he had had previous dealings, for the purpose of obtaining his assistance in securing a purchaser for the Tucker land. What took place between the parties is thus related by plaintiff: "In Mr. Barnekoff's visits to our office he had several times mentioned the fact of a tract of land abutting on the town adjoining his mill property that he thought could be secured. After conversation and consultation with him, we concluded we could handle the property, the price being satisfactory, in our view. It was mutually agreed that we would secure a contract on the land consisting of 90 acres. The matter was all talked over, and fully understood, before any proceedings were taken towards securing the land. First it was suggested to procure a contract on the land on the most favorable terms possible, a small payment to be made to secure the land in lieu of a bond for a deed. It was agreed that the contract be taken in the name of F. Barnekoff, so as to create no suspicion of a movement in or around McMinnville, Mr. Barnekoff assuring me that he would stand a better chance of getting the contract in his name than by using the name of a non-resident, as he had had previous business transactions with Mr. Tucker in land. * * * The agreement was that a contract should be secured on this land for as small a sum as possible; * * * that the entire handling of the property after securing such contract would be left with myself. The profits, if any, arising from the handling were to be divided share and share alike; and the losses, if any, in the same proportion. This was with Barnekoff and myself. On March 14th, Mr. Barnekoff did secure a contract on this identical piece of property, by paying the sum of $100 to secure the same. The contract was duly drawn in legal shape, and, on the 16th of the same month, Mr. Barnekoff called at my office and produced the contract. I read it over, and said it was legally drawn, but said to him: 'I see you have paid $100; don't you think you have paid a good deal of money for so short a time on this land?' He said it was the very best he could do. I then told him that, while the time was short, I felt perfectly satisfied in being able to handle the land as agreed upon, and that if it was not handled in the specified time I would reimburse him one-half of the $100, and it was agreed on. He left the contract with me. I had it in my possession for four or five days. Proceeded to McMinnville on the 17th, examined the land carefully, and with him figured exactly how we should handle it. After a careful examination I surrendered the contract to him, and returned to Portland." The witness then narrates what he did in trying to secure a buyer for the land, and finally, as he claims, by consent and agreement of defendant, contracted to sell the land to Mr. Markle for $200 per acre; but before the sale was consummated the defendant sold the property to other parties for $200 per acre, and refused to recognize either plaintiff or Markle's right or interest in the matter. R. S. Howard, a witness for plaintiff, who was present at the conversation between plaintiff and defendant concerning this land, says: "My recollection is that probably the conversation began in February or March. * * * There was a proposition to buy a piece of land adjoining McMinnville, some ninety acres more or less. Mr. Flower, my partner, insisted on going in with Mr. Barnekoff and buying this tract of land jointly, near McMinnville, and having it platted into lots and sold. Was present when Barnekoff came down with the contract. He remarked that he had secured a contract on the land,—my recollection is at $150 per acre for sixty or ninety days,—and he and Flower talked it over here; that they could place the land at a profit, even before platting; that they could probably sell the land without platting it, but, in case that was not done, we were as real-estate agents; Howard and Flower to assist in placing the property,—in selling it. Flower said, 'If we do not succeed in placing it, I will give you my half of it back, [the $100.]' My understanding was that Flower was an equal partner with Mr. Barnekoff in the profits of the transaction." Mr. George B. Markle, to whom plaintiff had negotiated a sale of this property, and who, after being informed that defendant refused to consent to his purchase, but had sold the land to other parties, went to McMinnville in company with plaintiff to see defendant about the matter, testifies that after he and plaintiff arrived at McMinnville, and found that defendant would not let him have the property, "a discussion arose then between Mr. Barnekoff and Mr. Flower as to their working together,—as to the partnership. Mr. Flower asked Mr. Barnekoff if he had not agreed with him, if he did not tell him in the first place how, to secure this land; and afterwards, when Mr. Barnekoff did secure it, and pay some down, or agree to, whether he did not agree to reimburse him for half of the amount if the sale did not go through. At first Mr. Barnekoff said there was some talk about that, but he afterwards admitted that was the case. Then was the question put to him by Mr. Flower, 'Are we not partners in this deal?' Mr. Barnekoff admitted that they were partners in the deal." Mr. Barnekoff, the defendant, after testifying that he paid $100 to Tucker on this contract for the land, and that he was not a partner with Flower in any transaction whatever, gives his version of the matter as follows: "Well, the first I thought of this land I needed some more land for my mill. I bought my mill-ground from the same party, H. A. Tucker. He told me that I could not have any land without buying the whole; so the next time I went down I went into Mr. Flower's office, and told him there was a piece of land up there, and the man did not want to sell it, except to sell as a whole, and if he could get a buyer for it I wished he would. He asked me the price of the land, and I told him that H. A. Tucker wanted $150 an acre. He said: 'Well, I cannot get a buyer without we have some contract for it.' Well I told him that probably I could get a contract from H. A. Tucker. 'Well,' he says, 'if you can secure a contract, why get it, and then we will see what we can do towards handling the land, and getting a buyer for it.' After I got the agreement I went down and told Mr. Flower that I had got a contract for it, and if he would get a buyer I would like him to get one. Well, he said he would try and see if he could get one. That was all the talk we had that day. The next time I came down he made a proposition to me, and insisted on it, that he would like to go in with me, and we should buy the land. I told him right then and there that I had no money to buy land with, and that I had all my money invested in my mill, and that I could not go in on that agreement. 'Well,' he says, 'then I will try and get a buyer, and how would it be supposing we got $200 an acre for it; supposing I get a buyer, and you take a share in it?' I told him that I had no money to put into land at all; that I would not handle the land on any consideration; that I had the land sold for the reason that I wanted a piece of land for my mill. That was all there was said about it at that time, and he said he was going to try to get a buyer for the land in some shape or other. I went in repeatedly to ask if he had secured a buyer yet for that land. Question. Upon what terms was he to secure a buyer? Answer. He was going to— I asked him if his commission was going to be the same as on the mill, and he said, 'Yes; without you agree to take up the proposition I made.' I did not conclude any arrangement with Flower at $200 per acre, or at any other price. I did not give him the exclusive right to find a buyer for this land, but reserved the right to place the land for my own benefit while he was trying to find a buyer." The witness then gives his version of the Markle transaction, and of his disposal of the land to the investment company for $200 per acre. Says that Flower never agreed to repay him one-half of the $100 paid to Tucker in case the land was not sold; there never was any definite interest agreed upon between him and Flower in case the land was sold; took the contract from Tucker in his own name and for his benefit alone; nothing was ever mentioned about the partnership. The witness also denies the admission testified to by Markle. The foregoing is substantially all the testimony in this case material to be considered, and the question is, does it prove a partnership between plaintiff and defendant, in this transaction concerning the Tucker land?

A "partnership" is usually defined to be a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor, and skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, with the understanding that there shall be communion of the profits and losses thereof between them. Story, Partn. § 2; 3 Kent, Comm. 23. Partnership and community of interest independently considered are not always the same thing, nor is a mere community of interest sufficient; but there must be an agreement to share the profits and loss, and such profits must be shared as the result of the adventure or enterprise, in which both are interested, and not simply as a measure of compensation. Cogswell v. Wilson, 11 Or. 372, 4 Pac. Rep. 1130. More briefly, a "partnership" has been defined to be a contract in which two or more persons agree to put in something in common with a view of dividing the benefits which result from it. Strader v. White, 2 Neb. 362. There may be a general partnership at large, or it may be limited to a particular branch of business, or to one particular subject, as where the parties have united to share the benefits of a single transaction, (3 Kent, Comm. 30,) and may exist in the purchase and dealing in lands, (Kelley v. Bourne, 15 Or. 476, 16 Pac. Rep. 40.) The intention of the parties in forming a particular relation governs in determining whether they are partners or not. Where the facts are given, this question is one of law, and the intention of the parties will be determined from the effect of the whole contract, regardless of special expressions, (1 Bates, Partn. § 17;) the declaration of the parties, if not inconsistent with the other terms of the contract, of course controlling. A community of profits and loss in the adventure or business is usually considered a test of a partnership, and an agreement to share in the profits and loss of a business shows an intention to create a partnership, unless such intention is controlled by the stipulation of the parties, or inferred from conduct inconsistent therewith. Id. § 25. Where it appears that there is community of interest in the capital stock, and also a community of interest in the profits and loss, then it is clear an actual partnership exists between the parties. Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 541. Profits may be, and in fact often are, received as mere compensation in case of service or special agency, where the employee has no interest in the business, or power as a member of the firm, and no interest in the profits, as such, but is employed as a servant, special agent, or broker, and to receive a given proportion of the profits as compensation for his services. In such case the receipt of profits does not constitute a partnership. 1 Rates, Partn. § 43; Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 536; Ogden v. Astor, 4 Sandf. 311. This distinction is recognized by repeated decisions of the courts; and while cases arise on one side or the other of the line, approaching, in their facts, so near to each other that the difference between them may appear to be unsubstantial, yet the distinction itself is recognized, and the only difficulty is in the application of the principle on which it rests. That a partnership may be formed to deal in land has already been held by this court, (Kelley v. Bourne, 15 Or. 476, 16 Pac. Rep. 40,) and it would seem that if two or more persons agree jointly to buy a tract of land for the purpose of jointly selling it, and sharing in the profits of the transaction, that they are ordinarily considered partners as between themselves for that transaction, and owe to each other the rights and duties of that relation. Yeoman v. Lasley, 40 Ohio St. 190; Hulett v. Fairbanks, Id. 233; Morse v. Richmond, 97 Ill. 303; Canada v. Barksdale, 76 Va. 899; Clagett v. Kilbourne, 1 Black, 346; Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare. 369. Without commenting on the evidence in this case, we are of the opinion that the preponderance of the testimony is with the plaintiff; and, while the case comes very close to the line between a partnership and a co-ownership, we think the facts show such a community of interest in the subject-matter of the contract and the profit and loss of the enterprise as to constitute a partnership. But whether the agreement constituted a partnership in a technical legal sense or a co-ownership is thought to be immaterial in this suit. The rights and liabilities of the parties rest upon their agreement, and are now to be enforced upon the principles applicable to partnership transactions. King v. Barnes, 109 N. Y. 285, 16 N. E. Rep. 332; Hackett v. Railway Co., 12 Or. 129, 6 Pac. Rep. 659. The avowed object of defendant in consulting plaintiff about the matter was to obtain his skill and experience in securing a purchaser for the land. The option was secured at plaintiff's suggestion, and under his advice. It was submitted to him for examination and approval after it was secured. He proceeded in good faith, with defendant's approval, to secure a buyer for this land, evidently believing that he was to share in the profits if a sale could be made. Defendant was present and participated in the negotiations with Markle, and at his suggestion a date was fixed for the examination of the land by Markle, with the understanding that if it was found as represented Markle would take it at $200 per acre. But, before the time fixed for the examination of the land by Markle had arrived, defendant disposed of it at a profit of $4,500, and now refuses to account to plaintiff for any portion of such profit. It is true, defendant claims that plaintiff was acting as a mere agent for him in the matter, and so testifies. This claim depends upon his own unsupported testimony, which is contradicted, not only by plaintiff, but the witnesses Howard and Markle, as well as the circumstances and action of the parties themselves. The defendant no doubt testifies to what he understands and believes to be a correct state of the facts, and the same may be said of the other witnesses in the case. In such conflict of the testimony, it is not only a delicate but difficult matter to adjust the conflicting statements so as to arrive at the true facts. Approximation is all that can be expected, and we must determine the question in accordance with the weight of evidence as we understand it. The acts performed by plaintiff, and the interested part he took in the matter, strongly rebut any presumption that he was a mere agent, to dispose of this land for defendant, and to receive a commission for so doing, and, in the absence of convincing proof that he was such agent, leaves no alternative but to conclude that his claim is correct, and that he was to share in the profit to be derived from the sale of this land. The conduct of defendant is, we think, inconsistent with the idea that he was the principal, and plaintiff his agent. He allowed plaintiff to handle this property under the belief that he was to share in the profits if a sale could be made, at no time intimating that he claimed the sole ownership of the option. He participated in the negotiations with Markle, and in so doing gave Markle to understand that he and plaintiff were jointly interested in the matter as partners. Not until a sale was about to be made to Markle do we hear of defendant's claiming a sole ownership in the option. Then, for the first time, it would seem, he conceived the idea of selling this land, and appropriating the entire proceeds to his own use, never even offering to compensate plaintiff for the services rendered by him. It is true the Tucker option was taken in defendant's name, but if our view of the testimony is correct it was so taken in pursuance of the contract of partnership, and was for the benefit of the firm. Defendant can claim no advantage by reason of that fact. The defendant contends that, if there was an agreement for a partnership, it never was executed, and there was no valid consideration to support it. In this view, we are unable to concur. The contention is that, even if defendant entered into a contract of partnership, the business of the firm never was launched; nothing was done in furtherance of it; nothing was earned or lost by it; the defendant has simply violated his contract; and plaintiff's remedy is at law.

The business of the partnership was to secure an option on the Tucker land, and, if possible, dispose of the land at a profit. This business was entered upon and prosecuted until it was accomplished, and the land disposed of, and not until that time did defendant intimate that he would not comply with his agreement. The business of the firm was fully completed before defendant undertook to violate his contract, and then only in refusing to account to plaintiff for the profits of the enterprise. Under such circumstances, it is difficult to conceive how the contract can be an executory one. A sufficient consideration is afforded by the fact that the parties mutually promised to share the losses, if any, and to share equally in the profits of the contemplated enterprise. The profit realized by defendants from a sale of the Tucker land is admitted to have been $4,505.50. It therefore follows that the decree of the court below must be reversed, and a decree entered here in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,252.75, and the costs and disbursements in this court and the court below.

1. If upon the arraignment the defendant be allowed a day to plead or to answer the indictment, he may, before otherwise pleading thereto, move to set it aside in answer to the arraignment; and, when such time is allowed to the defendant by the court, section 1315, Hill's Code, does not preclude him from making the motion at any time before pleading.

2. Facts referred to, and held they were sufficient to admit the account given by the deceased of how and by whom he was injured as dying declarations.

Appeal from circuit court, Douglas county; R. S. BEAN, Judge.

On the 20th day of October, 1880, the defendant was indicted for the crime of murder. The journal entry recites that he was arraigned on the 18th of March, 1890, and pleaded not guilty; but, before pleading to the indictment, he moved to set the same aside, because the names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury were not indorsed on the indictment. The bill of exceptions, however, shows that he was arraigned on the 17th day of March, 1890, and asked his day to plead to said indictment, which was granted by the court. The bill of exceptions also shows that the defendant nor his counsel had no opportunity to inspect said indictment or to know its contents or the indorsements thereon, until the copy thereof was delivered to the defendant on the arraignment. On the 18th day of March, 1890, the defendant appeared in court with his counsel, and, before otherwise pleading to said indictment, he moved to set the same aside, for the reason that the names of all the witnesses examined before the grand jury which returned the indictment are not inserted at the foot of the indictment, or indorsed thereon, as required by chapters 7 and 10 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The court overruled said motion, to which defendant duly excepted. Afterwards, on the 25th day of June, 1890, the defendant was tried before a jury, and convicted of the crime of manslaughter, from which this appeal was taken. It is proper to add that the record discloses the fact that one Tiller was examined as a witness before the grand jury in relation to the charge against the defendant, and his name is not indorsed on the indictment, or set down at the foot thereof.

W. R. Willis and Lane & Lane, for appellant. S. W. Condon, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first question is, did the failure of the grand jury to set Tiller's name down at the foot of the indictment, or indorse it thereon, entitle the defendant to have the same set aside? This question must be answered by reference to the statute. Section 1314, Hill's Code, provides: "The indictment must be set aside by the court upon the motion of the defendant in either of the following cases: * * *

(2) When the names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury are not inserted at the foot of the indictment, or indorsed thereon." Section 1315 provides: "The motion to set aside the indictment must be made and heard at the time of the arraignment, unless for good cause the court postpone the hearing to a future time; and, if not so made, the defendant is precluded from taking the objections mentioned in section 1314." Section 1293 says that the arraignment "consists in reading the indictment to the defendant, and delivering to him a copy thereof, and the indorsements thereon, including the list of witnesses indorsed on it or appended thereto, and asking him whether he pleads guilty or not guilty to the indictment." Section 1298 is as follows: "If on the arraignment the defendant require it, he must be allowed until the next day, or such further time as the court may deem reasonable, to answer the indictment." And section 1299 is in these words: "If the defendant do not require time, as provided in the last section, or, if he do, then on the next day, or at such further day as the court may have allowed him, he may, in answer to the arraignment, either move the court to set aside the indictment, or he may demur or plead thereto." The reasons upon which the learned circuit judge overruled the motion to set aside the indictment do not appear in this record, but it is to be inferred that it was because the defendant did not, at the precise time of the arraignment, interpose the motion to set aside the indictment. It was argued here with much force that the defendant was bound to make this motion when the indictment was read to him, and he was furnished with a copy thereof, or be forever precluded. Such a construction would be very inconvenient in practice. Counsel would never be able to make an objection according to the facts. If compelled to make the objection at that particular instant, he must do it in ignorance of all of the facts upon which such objection would have to be based. He could not know who had been witnesses before the grand jury, nor any other fact that would justify the filing of a motion. Accordingly section 1299, supra, secures to the defendant the right on the arraignment to have until the next day, or such further time as the court may deem reasonable, to answer the indictment. How answer the indictment? Manifestly in any manner which the law has authorized or provided. In this case the record says he took his day to plead. This is not the precise form in which the entry should be made, but it is the one usually adopted, and it must be held to be of the same import as an order allowing time in which to answer the indictment. If time be allowed to answer the indictment, then section 1299, supra, declares what the answer may be. The defendant may, at such time as may have been granted to him by the court, in answer to the arraignment, either move the court to set aside the indictment, or may demur or plead thereto. These rights are secured to the defendant in plain and unambiguous language, and it is not believed that they are taken away by section 1315, supra. The postponement, when allowed, carries over with it every right which the defendant has, and cannot prejudice him in any way. By allowing time, the court postpones the hearing of whatever motion, plea, or demurrer the law authorizes the defendant to file, and this is entirely consistent with the requirements of the section under consideration. The first part of the section requires that "the motion to set aside the indictment must be made and heard at the time of the arraignment, unless," etc., can mean no more than that it must be done then, unless the court gives time, and this time, when given, is not confined to pleading to the indictment, but includes the rights to move to set it aside as well.

The exception to the admission of McNeill's statement to Morgan as a dying declaration cannot be sustained. McNeill's statement at the time he gave an account of the manner and by whom he was injured shows clearly enough the state of his mind. He was conscious that he stood within death's shadow, and could not escape. "I will not last long, and cannot get well, but will soon die." And the sequel proved too quickly the accuracy of his judgment. He died within 36 hours. The trial court thought the declarations excepted to were made by McNeill under a full consciousness that death was impending, and that he then had no hope or expectation of recovery; and we have no doubt that this conclusion was fully justified by the evidence. For the error of the court in refusing to set aside the indictment on the defendant's motion, the judgment must be reversed, with directions to the court below to set aside the indictment, and for such further proceedings as are by law authorized or required.

BEAN, J., having tried this case below, did not sit, and took no part in the decision.

HOUSE v. FOWLE.

DOWER—RELEASE TO HUSBAND.

Section 2369, Hill's Code, which provides that when property is owned by either husband or wife, the other has no interest therein which can be made the subject of contract between them, includes the wife's dower in the husband's lands and husband's estate by curtesy in the wife's lands, and therefore a conveyance or release to the husband, by the wife, of her inchoate right of dower in his lands, is a nullity.

Appeal from circuit court, Polk county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

The object of this action is to recover dower. There is a stipulation in the record as to the facts, from which it appears: (1) The lands in controversy in this action were owned by R. M. Montgomery, in his life-time. (2) That Temperance House, the plaintiff, was the widow of said Montgomery. (3) In 1880 the plaintiff, then Temperance Montgomery, gave a quitclaim deed for the consideration of $300 to her then husband, R. M. Montgomery, conveying all of her right, estate, and dower in the lands in dispute. (4) That in 1884 said Montgomery died, and one Shedd was appointed administrator of his estate, who in due course of administration sold the real property described in the complaint to pay claims against said estate, and that at such sale the defendant became the purchaser thereof at the price and sum of $3,400, and received the deed of the administrator therefor. The deed referred to is as follows: "This indenture witnesseth: That I, Temperance Montgomery, for and in consideration of the sum of three hundred dollars, to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have bargained, sold, and quitclaimed, and by these presents do, bargain, sell, and quitclaim, unto R. M. Montgomery, my husband, all my right, interest, and dower in and to the following described premises, to-wit: The south half of the donation land claim of John M. Zumwalt and wife, being notification No. 5,076, claim No. 49, in T. No. 9 S., R. 6 west, Willamette meridian, in the county of Polk, state of Oregon. To have and to hold the said premises with their appurtenances unto the said R. M. Montgomery, his heirs and assigns forever. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal the 24th day of March, A. D. 1880. TEMPERANCE MONTGOMERY. [Seal.] Done in presence of J. L. JOHNSON, M. M. ELLIS." This deed was acknowledged in the usual form, and recorded in Polk county the 24th of March, 1880. A jury trial was waived, and the court, after hearing the evidence in the cause, found in favor of the plaintiff on all the issues, and rendered a judgment in her favor for an equal undivided one-third of said real property for and during her natural life, from which the defendant has appealed to this court.

F. A. Chenoweth, for appellant. J. J. Daly, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) A single question has been presented on this appeal, and to that only will our attention be directed. It was conceded upon the argument that the judgment appealed from is right, and must be affirmed, unless the plaintiff is barred of her dower by her deed to her husband, R. M. Montgomery. 1 Hill's Code, § 2954, provides: "The widow of every deceased person shall be entitled to dower, or the use, during her natural life, of the one-third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seised, of an estate of inheritance, at any time during the marriage, unless she is lawfully barred thereof." Section 2966 provides that a married woman may bar her right of dower in any estate conveyed by her husband, or by his guardian if he be a minor, by joining in the deed of conveyance, and acknowledging the same as prescribed in the Code, or by joining with her husband in a subsequent deed acknowledged in like manner. Section 2967 provides that a widow's dower may also be barred by a jointure settled on her with her assent before the marriage, but such jointure must consist of a freehold estate in lands, for the life of the wife at least, to take effect in possession or profit immediately on the death of her husband. Section 2969 provides that a pecuniary provision, made for an intended wife, and in lieu of dower, shall if assented to in the manner provided in the statute, bar her dower in all the lands of her husband. Section 2970 provides for an election in case of jointure or pecuniary provision after the death of the husband where the same has not been assented to, and section 2971 for an election in case lands are devised to her by the husband's will, unless it plainly appears that the testator intended she should have both. These are the only provisions in the statute of this state prescribing the manner in which a woman may be barred of dower in the husband's lands, and they clearly do not include the bar relied upon by the defendant. The effect of other statutes upon the transaction between Montgomery and wife remains to be noticed. Section 2992 provides that the property and pecuniary rights of every married woman, at the time of her marriage or afterwards, acquired by gift, devise, or inheritance, shall not be subject to the debts or contracts of her husband, and she may manage, sell, convey, or devise the same by will to the same extent and in the same manner that her husband can property belonging to him. This section does not in any way relate to a wife's dower in her husband's property, but it does enable her to manage, sell, convey, or devise the property therein specified to the same extent and manner and as completely as the husband can property belonging to him, and it renders inapplicable much of the learning of the common law in relation to the disabilities of a married woman. Section 2993 places all property acquired by a married woman during coverture by her own labor, under the same protection as property owned by her at the time of her marriage or afterwards acquired by gift, devise, or inheritance. Section 2997 provides that contracts may be made by a wife, and liabilities incurred and the same enforced by or against her to the same extent and in the same manner as if she were unmarried. Section 2870 provides; "Should either the husband or wife obtain possession or control of property belonging to the other, either before or after marriage, the owner of the property may maintain an action therefor, or for any right growing out of the same in the same manner and extent as if they were unmarried." Section 2869 provides that when property is owned by either husband or wife the other has no interest therein which can be the subject of contract between them or such interest as will make the same liable for the contracts or liabilities of either the husband or wife, who is not the owner of the property except as provided in the act; and section 2871 provides that a conveyance, transfer, or lien executed by either husband or wife to or in favor of the other, shall be valid to the same extent as between other persons. Section 2983 makes the husband, on the wife's death, tenant for life by curtesy in all the lands in which the husband and wife are seised in her right of any estate of inheritance. Unless authorized by statute a married woman cannot bar her right of dower by any release made to the husband during the coverture. Rowe v. Hamilton, 3 Greenl. 63; Martin's Heirs v. Martin, 22 Ala. 86; 2 Scrib. Dower, 290; Carson v. Murray, 3 Paige, 483. But it is unnecessary to pursue this line of authorities, for the reason that the proper construction of our own statute is decisive of this question. Our act of 1878, from which the main provisions above recited were copied into the Code, was taken literally from the Iowa Code. Prior to this enactment in that state the supreme court had held that under an agreement to separate a husband and wife could relinquish to each other dower held by each in the property of the other. Robertson v. Robertson, 25 Iowa, 350; McKee v. Reynolds, 26 Iowa, 578. After the enactment of section 2208 of the Code of Iowa, which is almost identical with section 2869, supra, it was held that it changed the rule theretofore announced. In construing it the court said: "This provision relates to the interest which a husband or wife holds in the lands owned by his or her spouse which arises under the marriage relations. It does not refer to a property interest that may be based upon contract, or may be derived from sources other than the marriage relation. This section evidently contemplates and includes in its language the dower estate. Upon the marriage relation this estate is based." And further on in the same opinion, that court said that the exception referred to other provisions of the Code which were cited, and that it could not be construed as applicable to contracts relating to dower. Linton v. Crosby, 54 Iowa, 478, 6 N. W. Rep. 726. This construction includes estates or interests growing out of the marriage relation from the classes of property concerning which a husband and wife may contract with each other. They include dower and estates by curtesy. The reason of the distinction is obvious enough. These estates have their origin in public policy. They tend to strengthen the marriage relation, and to some extent they preserve to the survivor valuable property interests which may enable him or her to enjoy some of the fruits of their joint lives and in a measure render them independent of the vicissitudes of fortune. The judgment appealed from must therefore be affirmed.

CURTIS v. LA GRANDE HYDRAULIC WATER CO.

RIPARIAN RIGHTS—ESTOPPEL.

Facts examined and held, under the circumstances of the particular case, the plaintiff should not be permitted to set up her riparian interest so as to defeat the defendant's right to a certain portion of the water of Mill creek, where the diversion was made under a claim of title, and the defendant believed, and had reason to believe, that the claim was well founded, and the plaintiff stood by without asserting or making known her claim, while the defendant was expending large sums of money, and making extensive improvements under an honest and reasonable belief that it had the right to make such diversion, and without which its expenditures would prove a total loss. Modifying 23 Pac. Rep. 808.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 23 Pac. Rep. 808.

STRAHAN, C. J. This case was heretofore before this court, and a conclusion was reached reversing the decree of the court below, and enjoining the defendant from making the diversion of the water complained of. 23 Pac. Rep. 808. On the petition of the respondent a rehearing was ordered, and the case has been again fully argued at this term. There is one question that was overlooked, or at least the attention of the court was not sufficiently drawn to it, and that is the passive acquiescence of the plaintiff, or those under whom she claims, in the removal of the dam from the point on Mill creek where the La Grande Water Company had established it in about the year 1865 to a point about 1,000 feet higher up said stream, and the expenditures made by plaintiff in consequence of such removal. These are some of the findings of the referee and of the court below on those subjects: "(17) That the said defendant, since the said last diversion referred to, constructed a system of water-works in connection therewith in the said town of La Grande, Oregon, and have expended the sum of $8,000 in the construction of the same; (18) that the construction of said water-works was public, and plaintiff knew of the same, but that she never objected to the construction thereof; (19) that the diversion of the nine square inches of water from Mill creek by the defendant and its grantor, the La Grande Water Company, as hereinbefore stated, was for the period of 22 years, and was open, notorious, uninterrupted, practically continuous, by the acquiescence of the plaintiff and her grantors, and under a claim of right, from the month of July, 1865, to the time the defendant built the new dam, in 1887; (20) that the plaintiff purchased her land described in her complaint subject to the right of the La Grande Water Company and its successors to divert said water out of said Mill creek as aforesaid, and with notice of the same at the time of her purchase, and that she is estopped to deny the same or allege to the contrary." The court, in disposing of the referee's report, among others, made the following findings: "No. 9. The court finds as follows: That in the month of July, 1865, after the organization of said company, the said Green Arnold gave to the said La Grande Water Company the right to enter and go upon the said lands hereinafter described, and to divert water from Mill creek for the purpose of supplying the town of La Grande with water for hire, or otherwise, and also gave it the exclusive right to erect and maintain all necessary works for the purpose of conducting said waters so diverted to the town of La Grande, Oregon, the same to be distributed as said company saw fit; that immediately thereafter the said La Grande Water Company, in pursuance of said grant, did enter upon said land of said Green Arnold aforesaid, at a point about sixty rods above the plaintiff's premises, on said Mill creek, and diverted water therefrom by means of a square box about 12 feet long and 3x3 inches at one end and 5x6 inches at the other, and also constructed across said creek a dam five feet high, and put in a system of water." "No. 19. The court finds as follows: That the diversion of five-sixths of the water of said Mill creek, during the dry season of the year, and as much water as said box, used for diverting purposes, and hereinbefore described, will carry during the remainder of the year, has been open, notorious, uninterrupted, peaceable, continuous, and under claim of right, by the defendant and its grantor, the La Grande Water Company, for a period of twenty-two years, and said use and enjoyment of said water and the rights and privileges thereto belonging had been acquiesced in by the plaintiff and her grantors ever since the month of July, A. D. 1865, to the time defendant built his new dam, in 1887." "No. 21. The court finds as follows: That the plaintiff has sustained no damage by reason of the removal of said dam or the diversion of said water."

The defendant and its predecessor in interest have been in the actual use of this water for a long time, so far as appears, without objection from any one, and it assumed that such possession had ripened into an absolute title. Whether the plaintiff participated in that view at the time of the removal does not appear affirmatively, nor is it material. She knew of the removal. She also knew that the defendant was making extensive improvements and large expenditures in money which, without the use of the water, would be utterly worthless. She knew that the defendant, in making these improvements, relied upon its assumed right to divert the water at its new dam, and she must have known that the defendant would not have made these expenditures if it had known such right did not exist. Under these circumstances, we think, she could not be silent. She was bound to make known her claim to defendant before it had so far changed its position that the assertion of such claim would operate as a fraud upon it, and inflict great damage without any possibility of compensation. We have the less hesitancy in announcing this conclusion for the reason that the plaintiff's situation is no worse than it was before the dam was moved up the creek. The same quantity of water will pass the upper dam that did the lower, and whatever advantages accrued to the plaintiff prior to such change will still be hers. Upon the second argument counsel for the appellant have cited Ang. Water-Courses, § 29; Washb. Easem., p. 661; Gould, Waters, § 237; Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 179; Junkans v. Bergin, 7 Pac. Rep. 686; Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 34; Fuller v. Mining Co., 19 Pac. Rep. 336; Belknap v. Trimble, 3 Paige, 605; Whittier v. Cochecho Co., 9 N. H. 454,—as tending to sustain his contention on the other question discussed, that is, the right claimed by the appellant to change the place of diversion of the water without forfeiting its right to the water. But it is not thought that these authorities reach the facts of this particular case. We do not deem it of importance to enter upon the re-examination of that question. The former opinion will therefore be so far modified that the defendant, its successors and assigns, may take from said mill creek, at its present dam and point of diversion, the same quantity of water, and no more, that it and its predecessor in interest had been accustomed to take at the lower dam. The defendant will also be required to have or permit no waste gate at its reservoir, so that the surplus water shall flow back into Mill creek at its dam, or, if that be impracticable by reason of the extent of the fall between the dam and the reservoir, then the defendant shall cause said surplus water entering its reservoir to flow back into Mill creek at the highest point up said stream above the plaintiff's premises, where the same is reasonably practicable, and for that purpose it may establish a waste gate at said reservoir; and for the purpose of giving effect to this decree the court below is authorized to issue such writs of injunction, mandatory or otherwise, as may be necessary. The parties may also, from time to time, apply to the court below for such modification of this decree in relation to the manner of the use of said water by the defendant as the justice of the case may require. In view of all the circumstances of this case, we have thought proper to award costs to the plaintiff.

ASTORIA & S. C. R. CO. v. HILL.

CORPORATIONS—ASSESSMENT OF STOCK.

1. After one-half of the capital stock of a private corporation in this state has been subscribed, and a board of directors elected, assessments may be legally be made upon the stock so subscribed. Approving Freighting Co. v. Stanus, 4 Or. 261.

2. In case of an ordinary subscription to the capital stock of a corporation, a tender of the certificate for the shares so subscribed is not a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action to recover assessments legally made on such shares.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

This is an action to recover $1,500, and interest, claimed to be due plaintiff from defendant as delinquent assessments on 20 shares of plaintiff's capital stock of the par value of $100 each, subscribed for by defendant. A trial was had in the court below, which resulted adversely to defendant, and hence this appeal.

C. J. Curtis, for appellant. C. W. Fulton, for respondent.

BEAN, J. The facts in this case are these: On August 11, 1888, plaintiff was duly incorporated with a capital stock of $75,000, divided into 750 shares of $100 each, for the purpose of constructing, owning, and operating a railroad from Astoria to Tillamook bay, with its principal office at Astoria. On August 13th stock-books were duly opened to receive subscriptions to its capital stock, when defendant and other persons subscribed to the following contract, in writing, in said book, to-wit: "Subscriptions to the capital stock of the Astoria and South Coast Railway Company, incorporated Aug. 11th, 1888, at Astoria, Oregon, capital stock $75,000, amount of each share $100. We, the undersigned, hereby subscribe to the capital stock of the Astoria and South Coast Railway Company the number of shares set opposite our respective names, by us subscribed, and we agree to pay for each share the sum of one hundred dollars at the time or times and in the manner assessed and ordered by the board of directors of said corporation hereafter." That, when defendant subscribed said contract, he set opposite his name 10 shares, and the sum of $1,000, as being the sum he agreed to pay therefor. On August 18th, more than one-half, but not all, of the capital stock of plaintiff having been subscribed at a meeting of the stockholders duly called, plaintiff was duly organized, and a board of directors elected, who immediately qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties. On September 25, 1888, an assessment of 25 per cent., on November 3, 1888, an assessment of 10 per cent., and on February 25, 1889, an assessment of 65 per cent., was duly levied on the capital stock of the plaintiff. The defendant was notified of each of said assessments, and payment thereof demanded, and paid the assessments of September 25 and November 3, 1888, and $150 on that of February 25, 1889, and no more. That in July, 1889, said stock-book of plaintiff still being open to receive subscriptions to its capital stock, defendant again subscribed for 10 shares, of the par value of $100 per share. That on July 8, 1889, a large number of additional shares having been subscribed, including the 10 shares subscribed for by defendant, an assessment of 25 per cent. on each share of said additional subscription was duly levied, and on August 12, 1889, an additional assessment of 75 per cent. was duly levied on each of said shares. That defendant, being duly notified of each of said assessments, refused to pay any part thereof. The defendant claims that, before plaintiff can maintain this action against him, it must aver and prove that its full capital stock has been subscribed; that it was an implied part of his contract of subscription that the contract was to be binding and enforceable against him only after the full $75,000, the amount of plaintiff's capital stock, had been subscribed; and that, until the stock was all subscribed, the corporation could do no business except to elect directors. There are many authorities to the effect, and we suppose it will be generally conceded, that, unless otherwise provided by the act of the legislature authorizing the corporation to be created, or by the charter of the company, or by the contract of subscription, all the capital stock of the proposed corporation must be subscribed for before any stockholder can be compelled to pay any assessment on his stock, or before the company can enter upon any of its corporate business, but the act of incorporation may of course vary this rule. See sections 176, 177, Cook, Stocks, and notes, where the authorities seem to be fully collated. Plaintiff was incorporated under the general incorporation act of this state, which, among other things, provides "that it shall be lawful, in the organization of any corporation, to elect a board of directors as soon as one-half of the capital stock has been subscribed." 2 Hill's Code, § 3222. The question of defendant's liability must be determined by the construction to be given to this provision of the Code, in connection with the remaining provision of the general incorporation act. The question now before us was considered by this court in the case of Freighting Co. v. Stannus, 4 Or. 261, and the conclusion there reached, after an elaborate argument by counsel, and a careful and exhaustive examination by the court, was that in this state the subscription to the entire amount of the capital stock of a corporation is not a condition precedent to a legal corporate existence; and that, after one-half of the capital stock is subscribed, the stockholders may proceed to the election of directors, and, after the election thereof, assessments may be legally made upon the unpaid stock so subscribed, although the full amount has not been subscribed. The same construction of the statute is recognized by this court in the case of Mining Co. v. Ruble, 8 Or. 294, where BOISE, J., in speaking of Ruble's supposed liability to the plaintiff, says: "It is claimed that he owed the corporation this amount at the commencement of this suit. To put him in such a position, he must be a subscriber to the stock of $50,000. The records of the corporation must show that this amount is due and owing. To show this, it must be shown by the records of the corporation (1) by the stock-books signed by Ruble, or evidence equivalent to such signing; (2) that one-half of the capital stock of the corporation has been subscribed; (3) that an assessment has been made on all of such stock for twenty-five per cent. of such stock." The decision in Freighting Co. v. Stannus has been recognized as the settled law of this state, since its rendition, in 1872. Corporations have been organized, and, we must assume, have proceeded to business, without all the capital stock being subscribed for, relying on the doctrine of that case, as plaintiff probably did. They have levied and collected assessments on the subscribed capital stock, incurred debts and obligations, and engaged in vast and important enterprises, so that, whatever we might be disposed to hold if the question was res integra, we do not feel at liberty to depart from the rule heretofore announced by this court.

It is also claimed that the issuance and tender to defendant of certificates for the shares of stock subscribed for by him is a condition precedent to the right to maintain an action for the unpaid assessments. The effect of the ordinary subscription to the capital stock of a corporation is to constitute the subscriber a shareholder immediately, with the right to vote at meetings, and share in the dividends, and subject to a liability to contribute to the amount of his subscription, when called upon in a legal manner. His engagement is created directly by the act of subscription. It is the subscription that makes him a shareholder. The certificate is but evidence of the fact of his being a shareholder,—a written acknowledgment on the part of the corporation of his interest in the corporate franchise and property. It has been repeatedly held that the tender of a certificate for shares is never a condition precedent to the liability of a shareholder to contribute the amount of his shares after a proper call. 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 61, 148; Railroad Co. v. Parks, 8 S. W. Rep. 842; Hawley v. Upton, 102 U. S. 314; Fulgram v. Railroad Co., 44 Ga. 597; Railroad Co. v. Ayres, 56 Ga. 230; Cook, Stocks, § 10. The case of an ordinary subscription for shares in a corporation differs from a sale and purchase. Where a person agrees to take or purchase shares, many authorities hold it is the intention to buy the certificates as a saleable article. The delivery of the certificate, and payment of the price, are considered concurrent acts; and, in a failure to carry out the contract, neither party can charge the other, without averring a tender of performance. Of this class is the case of Railroad Co. v. Robbins, 23 Minn. 439, relied on by defendant. This was an action to recover the amount of a subscription to preferred stock of the plaintiff, ordered issued and sold long after the company was organized, and was not a subscription to the original stock. The court held that the subscription by defendant constituted a valid contract on the part of the company to issue the stock to defendant, and on his part to pay for it, but before the company could maintain the action it must allege and prove a tender of the certificate for the stock to defendant. The court, in its opinion, however, recognizes the doctrine we have above announced as applicable to ordinary subscriptions, and says: "Such a subscription gives to the subscriber an interest in the corporation and the right to take part in organizing it, and this interest and right are a sufficient consideration to support his promise." Judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

BUTLER v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Nov. 24, 1890.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL — RETURN OF EXECUTION — RIGHT TO PROCEEDS — DOWER RIGHTS — ADMINISTRATOR.

1. Cases reviewed, and Lindley v. Wallis, 2 Or. 204, followed.

2. Subdivision 3, § 296, Hill, Code, requires a sheriff upon return of an execution to pay the money realized thereon to the clerk. Held, in an action against the sheriff to recover the surplus realized from the sale of land over and above the sum due on a decree of a foreclosure, that the complaint was demurrable which failed to allege that the sheriff neglected or failed to pay such money to the clerk at the time his writ was returnable; and that, for the want of such allegation, it is to be presumed that official duty has been regularly performed.

3. A wife's inchoate right of dower attaches to the surplus moneys realized upon a sale of the husband's lands upon a decree of foreclosure, and her interest in the fund will be protected against the deceased husband's creditors; but her rights cannot be litigated in an action to recover the fund in a case where she is not a party.

4. The administrator is entitled to the possession of all of the property of the deceased, both real and personal, for the purposes of administration; but the county court has power to protect the widow's dower interest in moneys in the hands of such administrator.

Appeal from circuit court, Polk county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

This case comes here on a demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint, which was sustained in the court below. The substance of the complaint is as follows: That plaintiff is the administrator of the estate of Isaac Vanhorn, deceased; that defendant is the sheriff of Polk county; that by virtue of an execution duly issued out of said circuit court, January 16, 1889, directed to such sheriff, upon a certain judgment and decree of foreclosure of said court, in favor of B. F. Smith, as executor of the estate of William Burns, deceased, against Isaac Vanhorn and Melissa Vanhorn, rendered May 11, 1885, for $2,167.50, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and $200 attorney's fees, and $17.60 costs and disbursements, such sheriff, the defendant, did, on February 16, 1889, duly sell the lands described in the decree to one B. F. Smith for $2,850, a copy of which execution and return of sheriff herein is set out and made a part of the complaint as Exhibit A; that there was due on said execution $2,415.72, and no more; that after the payment of said $2,415.72, and the costs upon said suit of $35.30, there remained in the hands of the said sheriff, the defendant, the sum of $398.48, payable to plaintiff as such administrator; that said sale was confirmed by said court at the May term for the year 1889; that said premises, at the time they were sold, belonged to the estate of said Isaac Vanhorn, deceased; that said estate is unsettled, but in course of administration; that all of the personal estate has been applied, and exhausted, in payment of claims against the estate allowed by law, and that there remains a large amount of claims unpaid; that there is no money, or other property, in plaintiff's hands, belonging to said estate, with which to pay these claims; that said $398.48 has long since been and is now due and owing and payable from defendant to plaintiff; that defendant neglects and refuses to pay the same, though often demanded of him by plaintiff. The respondent filed a motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that both the respondent and his attorney, at the time of the service, resided in Polk county.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) 1. The first question presented is the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal. The objection taken is that both the respondent and his attorney resided in Polk county at the time of the service, and that the notice was served on the respondent personally, and not on his attorney. This question has arisen in this court several times, and it is to be regretted that the decisions on the subject are not entirely uniform. Section 531, Hill, Code, provides: "When a party is absent from the state, and has no attorney in the action or suit, service may be made by mail, if his residence be known; if not known, on the clerk for him. When a party, whether absent or not from the state, has an attorney in the action or suit, service of the notice, or other papers, shall be made upon the attorney, if he reside in the county where the action or suit is pending, instead of the party, and not otherwise." But this section must be construed in connection with section 537, which provides: "An appeal shall be taken and perfected in the manner prescribed in this section, and not otherwise. The appellant shall cause a notice to be served on the adverse party," etc. Lindley v. Wallis, 2 Or. 204, is the earliest reported case on the subject. It was then held that service of notice of appeal may be made either upon the party or upon his attorney of record residing in the county where the trial was had. Outside of the county, the service can only be made upon the party. This construction was followed by Upton, J., upon the circuit, in Carr v. Hurd, 3 Or. 160. It was again followed in Rees v. Rees, 7 Or. 78. In Watts v. Hoyt, Append. Sess. Acts 1872, p. 333, this court again followed Lindley v. Wallis; the court, per McArthur, J., saying: "The rule of practice followed in this case appears to be so obvious, and so well established, that we feel justified in indulging the hope that all misconceptions in relation thereto will be of rare occurrence in the future." I have been unable to find this case elsewhere reported. The only reported expressions of this court which are directly opposed to these authorities are found in Shirley v. Birch, 16 Or. 1. 18 Pac. Rep. 344. In passing on the question as to who might give a notice of appeal, Thayer, J., disapproved the rule of practice announced in Lindley v. Wallis, supra, but this was not necessary to the decision of that case. It was only referred to by way of illustrating the particular question then before the court. Besides, it is believed that whatever may be the individual views of the members of this court, in relation to the proper construction of these provisions of the Code, it has already been settled by the cases cited declaring a rule of practice, which ought not to be departed from. On a mere question of practice, it is better that it should be fixed and settled, even though the grounds of the opinion may not be so manifest. The construction which was adopted at an early period of our judicial history is convenient in practice, affects no one's rights injuriously, has become well understood by the profession, and will be adhered to. It was said on the argument that there are some unreported cases at variance with these views. We have not had the opportunity of looking into those cases, or of examining the grounds upon which the decisions proceeded; but we feel constrained to say that, if they are at variance with Lindley v. Wallis, supra, they must be regarded as overruled. The respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal cannot, therefore, prevail.

2. This leaves the question presented by the demurrer to the complaint to be disposed of. The object of the action is to recover the amount realized from the sale of the property of plaintiff's intestate over and above the amount of the decree made in the foreclosure suit. Subdivision 3, § 296, Hill, Code, directs that, upon the return of the execution, the sheriff shall pay the proceeds of the sale to the clerk. There is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant failed to perform that plain duty. In the absence of some allegation by the plaintiff to the contrary, the ordinary presumption must prevail that official duty has been regularly performed. Subdivision 15, § 776, Id. Upon the argument there was considerable discussion whether a demand was necessary before the commencement of the action. The rule seems to be, where the officer cannot exonerate himself by the payment of the money into court, a demand is necessary. Murfree, Sher. § 962; Sims v. Anderson, 1 Hill, (S. C.) 394; Church v. Clark, 1 Root, 303; De La Garza v. Booth, 28 Tex. 478. But the decision of this question is unnecessary, for the reasons already suggested.

3. Defendant's counsel suggested that the plaintiff in his representative capacity was not entitled to the money sought to be recovered for the purposes of administration, for the reason that the same is to be regarded as land, and the widow of the estate would be entitled to dower therein. The better view is that the wife's inchoate right of dower in the husband's lands follows the surplus moneys raised by a sale in virtue of the power of sale in a mortgage executed by her with her husband, and will be protected against the claims of her husband's creditors. Vartie v. Underwood, 18 Barb. 561. She has a dower in the surplus as she had in the land before sale. Matthews v. Duryee, 45 Barb. 69. But this right of the widow to dower in this money in no manner interferes with the right of the administrator to the possession and control of the property of the deceased, both real and personal, and to receive the rents and profits thereof, until the administration is completed, or the same is surrendered to the heirs or devisees by order of the court or judge thereof. Hill, Code, § 1120. No doubt the county court of Polk county will, at the proper time, make the necessary orders in respect to this fund, to fully secure her dower interest in this fund, and if an order should be made, which injuriously affects her interests, it will be time enough for her to complain. In any event, the sheriff does not represent her interests, nor can her rights be litigated in this case. If the plaintiff shall hereafter apply to the county clerk of Polk county for this money, and fail to receive it, he will then be entitled to such remedy as the law affords in such case against the defaulting officer. But in this action, the court is unable to afford him any relief. Let the judgment be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. DURKHEIMER et al. v. GRACE.

MANDAMUS—PARTIES—COUNTY-SEAT ELECTION.

1. When the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to enforce the performance of a public duty, it is sufficient for the relator to show that he is a citizen of the county, and as such is interested in the execution of the laws.

2. Where an act of the legislature, after providing that the town of Harney shall be the temporary county-seat of the county, (which was a newly-organized county,) until otherwise located, as provided by the act, proceeds: "At the next general election the question of the location of the county-seat shall be submitted to the legal voters of the county, and the place receiving a majority of all the votes cast shall be the permanent county-seat of the county,"—held, that the words "a majority of all the votes cast" refers to the "place" receiving them, and means on "the question of the location of the county-seat," and not on some other question, for which votes may have been cast at such election.

Appeal from circuit court, Harney county; M. D. CLIFFORD, Judge.

This is a proceeding for a mandamus to require and direct the defendant to keep the office of county clerk in the town of Burns, the alleged county-seat of Harney county. The facts, in substance, are these: The petitioners allege that they are residents within the county and legal voters and tax-payers therein, etc., and that the town of Burns is situated in said county of Harney; that the defendant was and now is the duly qualified and elected county clerk of said county, and, by virtue of his official position, is now, and at all of said times has been, in the possession of the public records, documents, etc., which, by the laws of the state, are records of the county clerk's office, and that the same are now, and have been at all times, held and kept by him in the town of Harney, within said county; that by an act of the legislative assembly, approved February 25, 1889, the county of Harney was created one of the counties of the state of Oregon, and that, among other things, it was provided that the said town of Harney should be the temporary county-seat until otherwise located by said act, which further provided that, at the next general election, etc., the question of the permanent location of the county-seat of said county should be submitted to the legal voters of said county, and that the place receiving the largest majority of all the votes cast therefor should be the county-seat of said county, etc.; that the permanent location of the same was duly submitted to the legal voters, as provided by said act, and thereafter the vote cast was duly canvassed, etc.; that upon such canvass it was found that the town of Burns received 512 votes, all of which were so polled and voted by the legal voters of said county in favor of locating the county-seat at Burns, and that said 512 votes was a full majority of all the votes cast at said election on the said question of the permanent location of the county-seat of said county, etc., and that, by reason thereof, the said town of Burns became the permanent county-seat of said Harney county, and is the only proper and legal place in said county for keeping the county records, files, documents, etc., of which the defendant herein now holds and has possession and custody thereof as said county clerk, and, by virtue of the act as aforesaid, the town of Burns is the only legal place in said county where the office of county clerk can be legally held, etc.; that the defendant, as such county clerk, now keeps and maintains, etc., all said records, files, etc., at the town of Harney, and conducts the office and official business there, and all of which is against the will of the legal voters of said county, and that the defendant unlawfully refuses to recognize said town of Burns as the said permanent county-seat, and unlawfully neglects and refuses to remove the records, etc., from Harney to the said town of Burns; that the defendant refuses for the reason that he says that the said town of Burns did not receive the majority of all the votes cast, etc., but your petitioners allege that the total of all the votes cast at the election upon the question of the permanent county-seat was the sum total of 1,016 votes, and no other or greater number; that, by reason of such neglect and refusal, etc., your petitioners pray, etc. Upon this petition an order was made for the issuance of a peremptory writ, from which this appeal is taken.

Williams & Wood and Rufus Mallory, for plaintiffs. Thornton Williams and W. W. Thayer, for defendant.

LORD, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Two questions are presented by this record: (1) That the petitioners, as relators, do not have such an interest in the subject-matter as to authorize them to institute such a proceeding; and (2) that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it does not show that the town of Burns in the election received a majority of the votes cast for a permanent county-seat as found by the canvass of such votes. Upon the first point the contention is that the fact that the petitioners are residents, legal voters, and tax-payers of Harney county, does not vest in them any particular interest or right distinct from the public at large. Our statute provides that the writ shall be allowed by the court or judge thereof, upon the petition, verified as a complaint in an action, of the party beneficially interested. Hill's Code, § 594. It has been held that a petitioner, who is a tax-payer within the district of which the defendant is assessor, is "a party beneficially interested" in having all the taxable property in the district assessed. Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 360. And it would seem, upon like principle, that the petitioners, who are voters and tax-payers within the county of which the defendant is county clerk, is "a party beneficially interested" in having the records of the county clerk's office at the county-seat of the county, and is therefore a proper party to petition for the issuance of the writ. But, if there should be any doubt on the suggested analogy to justify its issuance, the case of State v. Saxton, 11 Wis. 23, discloses that one of the reasons assigned for quashing the writ there was that the relator did not state any right which entitled him to the relief prayed for; yet the court denied the motion, holding that a proceeding by a writ of mandamus was the proper remedy to test the result of an election as to the removal of a county-seat, and to compel a sheriff or other county officer to hold or keep his office at the place to which it is alleged to have been removed. When the question is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to enforce the performance of a public duty, it is sufficient for the relator to show that he is a resident and citizen of the county, and as such is interested in the execution of the laws. State v. Ware, 13 Or. 380, 10 Pac. Rep. 885.

That the defendant, as county clerk, should keep the office of county clerk at the county-seat, as required by law, is the subject-matter in which the relator as a citizen and voter of the county has a general interest, and, in the absence of any other objection affecting the remedy by mandamus, that interest is sufficient to enable him to maintain this proceeding. When the law appoints a place for a county-seat, and fixes its officers thereat, it is a matter of public right in which all the citizens of the county are interested, and the officers should be kept at that place for the transaction of the public business. Such being the case the relators, as residents, voters, and tax-payers, are parties "beneficially interested" in the execution of the laws, and as such are entitled to enforce the performance of duty which devolves upon such officers to keep their offices at the county-seat by the writ of mandamus. While the authorities indicate some diversity of judicial opinion upon the question whether private persons can sue out the writ to enforce the performance of a public duty, unless its neglect entails some special injury, or affects some particular interest, the decided preponderance of American authority, Mr. Justice STRONG thinks, is "in favor of the doctrine that a private person may move for a mandamus to enforce a public duty not due to the government as such without the intervention of the government law officers." Railroad Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 355. The writ is no longer regarded in this country or England as prerogative in its nature; nor does the right to it, nor the power to issue it, depend upon any of the privileges or prerogatives of power, but it is treated as an ordinary process in those cases to which it is applicable. Hence, as the question at bar is one of public right, and the object of the mandamus is to enforce the performance of a public duty, the people being regarded as the real parties in interest, it is not necessary that the relators should show any special interest or particular right to be affected by the result.

It is next assigned as error that the petition does not show that the town of Burns, at the election referred to therein, received a majority of the votes cast thereat for the permanent location of the county-seat. This objection involved at the argument two contentions: (1) That the facts stated in the petition were insufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, (2) assuming them to be sufficient, that it is not enough for the town of Burns to have received a majority of all the votes cast upon the county-seat question, but that the petition must show that it received a majority of all the votes at said election for any and every purpose. The objection upon the first point is to the effect that the petitioners do not allege that it appeared from said canvass that said 512 votes so cast was a full and complete majority of all the votes cast at said election, etc., nor exhibit any copy of the canvass, etc., but the petition does allege that the permanent location of the county-seat was duly submitted to the legal voters, as provided by the act, and that thereafter the votes so cast at such election was duly and regularly canvassed as by law in such cases made and provided, and that, upon such canvass, it was found that the town of Burns received 512 votes, all of which number of 512 votes, as polled and voted by the legal voters aforesaid, in favor of establishing the county-seat of said Harney county, at the said town of Burns, and that the said 512 votes was a full and complete majority of all the votes cast, etc., and that the total sum of all the votes cast upon the permanent location of the county-seat was the sum total of 1,016 votes, and no other or greater number. As the objection treats the facts alleged as upon demurrer, taking them as true, it does appear that the votes were duly canvassed as provided by law, and that it was found, because it so appeared from the canvass, that the town of Burns received 512 votes, which was a full and complete majority of all the votes so cast. Nor is the failure to attach as an exhibit a copy of the canvass fatal to the sufficiency of the complaint, for that is to be regarded rather as evidence of the facts to be alleged. It must be said, however, that these facts, although somewhat inartificially alleged, nevertheless present issuable matter which cannot stand confessed or admitted without conceding the town of Burns to be the permanent, legal county-seat, and putting the defendant in default in the performance of a public duty. It is manifest, then, that the trial court ought not to have allowed, upon the state of facts presented by the petition, a peremptory, but an alternative, writ to be issued, for the defendant may set up as a defense that the county-seat has not been removed from Harney to Burns by a vote of the people, or some other proper defense which he may have to the action, and as the case of State v. Saxton, supra, shows he may do.

The next question presented is that, while the petition sufficiently shows that the town of Burns received a majority of the votes on the county-seat question, it does not show and allege that it received a majority of the votes cast for every purpose at that election; that is to say that, if there was, at the time of the election upon the county-seat question, an election for other county officers, the petition must show that there was a larger number of votes cast upon the county-seat question than for any county officer. These facts are not alleged, nor is it necessary, unless the act requires that it must appear that a majority of all the votes cast at that election, which was a regular election, and included the election of county officers, were in favor of permanently locating the county-seat at the town of Burns, and not a majority of the votes cast upon the single question of permanently locating the county-seat. The act, after providing that the town of Harney shall be the temporary county-seat of the county until otherwise located, etc., provides that, "at the next general election, the question of the location of a county-seat shall be submitted to the legal voters of the county, and the place receiving the majority of all the votes cast shall be the permanent county-seat of the county." Sess. Laws 1889, p. 47. Under this statute the contention of counsel for the relator is that it is sufficient to allege and show that the town of Burns received a majority of all the votes cast upon the county-seat question, and that the fact that it was a general election, and other county officers were elected at the same election, cannot affect the plain intention that it is a majority of the votes cast upon the county-seat question that is to govern. In some of the states there is a constitutional provision restricting the removal of the county-seat without the consent of the majority of the legal voters of the county, and in such cases, where two or more questions are submitted at the same election, it has been held that it must appear that a majority of the voters at that election had cast their votes in favor of removal before the county-seat could be changed. Section 5, art. 7, Const. Ill., provides that "no county-seat shall be removed until the point to which it is proposed to be removed shall be fixed by law, and a majority of the voters of the county shall have voted in favor of its removal to such point." In People v. Wiant, 48 Ill., 264, where this constitutional provision was interpreted, it was held that, where an election on the question of the removal of a county-seat happens to be held at the same time there is another election, as for a circuit judge, the votes cast on the single question of removal will not govern as to whether a majority of all the legal votes of the county were given in favor of removal; but it must appear that a majority of all the votes cast at that election were so given. In Bayard v. Klinge, 18 Minn. 249, (Gil. 221,) it is held that when the constitution provides that a question must be submitted to a vote of "the electors of the county," and requires "a majority of the electors voting thereon," it means a majority of the electors who vote at such election, and not merely of those voting on the particular question. In consonance with this principle, where the words of the constitution were "a majority of the legal voters of said county," it was held, in State v. Lancaster Co., 6 Neb. 474, that it does not mean a majority of those voting on the question to be submitted, but a majority of all the legal voters of the county. See, also, County-Seat of Linn County, 15 Kan. 530; State v. Sutterfield, 54 Mo. 396; Braden v. Stumph, 16 Lea, 581; Vance v. Austell, 45 Ark. 400.

Where county-seats have been located, and there are constitutional provisions restricting such removal to the majority of the legal voters of the county, or without the consent of the majority of the electors of the county, the reasons are various and manifest why it has been construed and held under constitutional restrictions of this character to mean a majority of all the votes cast at such election, when there are means of ascertaining that fact, as by the vote for some county officer at the same election. But in this state there are no constitutional restrictions in respect to this matter, and the intention of the statute must be collected from its language, and the purpose it was designed to subserve. It is not the case of the removal of a county-seat once permanently located, but of a new county with its county-seat temporarily located, and an act of the legislature providing a method for the voters of the county to determine the place where their county-seat may be permanently located. The only question, then, involved is the construction of the section cited. Does it mean a majority of all the votes cast at such general election, or a majority of all the votes cast on the question of the location of the county-seat? While the section provides that the question of the location shall be submitted to the voters at the next general election, the object of such submission is to determine the place where it shall be permanently located by a "majority of all the votes cast." Its language is, "the place receiving the majority of all the votes cast," and not a majority of all the voters of the county, which, as we have seen, as a constitutional restriction, or in a statute, (State v. Winkelmeier, 35 Mo. 103,) when some other question was presented at the same election, and the vote showed a larger vote than on the county-seat question, furnished clear and decisive evidence that a majority of the legal voters of the county had not voted for such change of location. "The place receiving the majority of all the votes cast" necessarily relates to the question of locating the county-seat, and not to some other question which may be involved at such general election, and means that the "place receiving the majority of all the votes cast" on that question "shall be the permanent county-seat of the county." This seems to us to be the plain intent of the statute in view of its language and the purpose to be subserved. In State v. Echols, 41 Kan. 1, 20 Pac. Rep. 523, the statute provided that, "after said election, the ballots on said question shall be canvassed in the same manner as in the election of county officers, and, if a majority of all the votes cast shall be in favor of establishing such high school," the county commissioners are required to appoint trustees, etc., and the court held that, where an election is legally called, etc., to determine whether a county high school shall be established, and at which a majority of the votes cast upon the proposition are in favor of the same, the proposition will be adopted, although it may not have received a majority of all the votes cast upon other questions submitted at the same election. In Walker v. Oswald, 63 Md. 146, 11 Atl. Rep. 711, the court held that the rule that, when an election is held at which the subject-matter is to be determined by a majority of the voters entitled to cast ballots thereat, those absenting themselves, and those who, being present, abstain from voting, are considered as acquiescing in the result declared by those actually voting, applies equally where at a general election the measure, though receiving a majority of the votes cast on that subject, failed to receive a majority of the votes cast upon some other subject. See, also, Cass Co. v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 369; Gillespie v. Palmer, 20 Wis. 572; Sanford v. Prentice, 28 Wis. 358. Under provisions of this sort, as distinguished from those recognizing "a majority of the legal voters of the county," the cases cited sustain the argument that the assent of those voting on the subject or question was to be presumed by their silence as acquiescing in the action of the majority. Keeping this distinction in mind, and that the provision of our statute was to secure the permanent location of a county-seat in a new county in which its county-seat had only been temporarily located, and we think the words "the place receiving a majority of all the votes cast" means cast on "the question of the location of the county-seat," and not cast upon some other question which may have been voted on at that election. In this view the complaint was not defective, and the objection cannot prevail. As the facts alleged were traversible, an alternative writ should have been allowed, which the argument indicated would have been, except for an excusable inadvertence or mistake. It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

COOK V. CITY OF ALBINA.

APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT FILED PREMATURELY.

A transcript filed in this court before the time allowed by law for excepting to sufficiency of the sureties on the appeal is filed prematurely, and such appeal is not perfected by afterwards filing a new undertaking in the court below without leave, and more than 10 days after the service of notice, nor by having the surety justify on notice more than 5 days after such exception.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

The notice of appeal in this case was served on the 1st day of March, 1890. The undertaking on appeal was filed the same day. The transcript was filed in this court on the 4th day of March, 1890. The case was continued at the March term. On the 6th day of March, 1890, the respondent's attorney gave notice that he excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties on appeal. On the 15th day of October, 1890, the appellant's counsel gave notice that he would produce the surety before the clerk on the 17th of October, 1890, for the purpose of justifying. On that day a new undertaking with the same surety was executed and filed in the court below. The said L. E. Thompson, surety, also justified as surety on the previous undertaking, of which fact the clerk made and filed a certificate. The present term of this court commenced on the 8th day of October, 1890. On the 13th day of said month, on motion of appellant, he was allowed time in which to perfect his appeal.

John M. Gearin, for appellant. P. L. Willis and C. H. Carey, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal, for the reason that the same has never been perfected as required by law, was submitted under the direction of the court, with an argument upon the merits. Also, appellant filed a motion for leave to be permitted to file an undertaking on appeal in this court now, which was also submitted with an argument on the merits. As will be seen from the statement of facts, the appellant filed his transcript in this court prematurely,—that is, before the respondent's time allowed by law for excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties had expired; and within the time allowed by law, the respondent did except to the sufficiency of the surety. In a similar case it was held by this court that, in legal contemplation, there was no undertaking for the appeal. Simison v. Simison, 9 Or. 335. Whether, as in this case, when the transcript is filed in this court prematurely, and before the appeal is or can be perfected in the court below, this court acquires any jurisdiction to allow anything to be done here by way of perfecting the appeal may well be doubted. At the time the transcript was filed in this court, the cause was still pending in the court below, for the purpose of the justification of the surety. It is only from the expiration of the time allowed to except to the sureties in the undertaking, or from the justification thereof, if excepted to, that the appeal shall be deemed perfected. Subdivision 4, § 537, Hill's Code. The appeal was inchoate and imperfect, then, when the transcript was filed, and, in such state of the record, it may well be doubted whether this court ever acquired any jurisdiction over the appeal. But, waiving this objection, the appeal is still imperfect. At the present term, on the application of the appellant's attorney, he was allowed time in which to perfect his appeal. He did not specify in what particular he deemed his appeal imperfect, and the court was not then advised of the state of the record. Instead of applying for leave to file an undertaking, he gave notice of the justification of the surety on the first undertaking long after the time fixed by law for such justification, and he also filed a new undertaking in the court below. None of these proceedings tended in any way to perfect or aid the appeal. To assume the authority of allowing an undertaking to be filed at the last moment, under all the circumstances, would be going a step beyond any precedent to be found in this court. For the reason that the transcript was filed before the appeal was perfected, and for the further reason that no sufficient undertaking has been given, as required by law, the appeal must be dismissed.

DEDICATION—MAP OR PLAT—EVIDENCE.

1. In order to constitute a dedication by parol, there must be some acts proved evincing a clear intention to dedicate the land to the public use.

2. Where it is sought to establish a dedication by the sale of lots with reference to a map or plat, the extent of such dedication is to be determined from the consideration of the whole map, the object being to ascertain the intention of the donor, the cardinal rule of construction being to give effect to the intention of the party as manifested by his acts.

3. A dedication of land to the public use is not presumed, but must appear by acts and declarations of the owner of such a public and deliberate character as clearly show an intention on his part to surrender his land for the use of the public, and the burden of proof is on the party asserting such dedication.

4. In order to constitute a common-law dedication, the owner's acts and declarations must be deliberate, unequivocal, and decisive, manifesting a positive and unmistakable intention to permanently abandon his property to the public use.

5. When the owner of land lays out a town, and records a plat thereof, on which streets are dedicated to the public, and it is sought to establish another and different dedication by the acts and conduct of the owner, in exhibiting to intending purchasers another map prepared on the same day, and selling lots by reference to the second plat, such second plat, to have this effect, must be essentially different from the recorded one, showing on its face an intention on the part of the owner to make an additional dedication.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; LOYAL B. STEARNS, Judge.

The plaintiff being the owner of a tract of land in size 1,141 feet north and south, and 408 feet east and west, within the corporate limits of the city of Albina, on April 3, 1889, caused an addition to the city to be laid off, of which under the name of "Albina Addition" a map or plan was made, signed, acknowledged, and recorded by him, representing said addition, with its streets, lots, and blocks, the size and width thereof being stated thereon. On this plan or map a strip of land about about 18 feet wide along the south side of block 1 was dedicated to the public as a part of Morris street, which, together with a strip of land adjoining on the south before dedicated by the owner thereof, made Morris street in front of this addition about 46 feet wide. That prior to the platting of Albina addition, Riverside addition, which lies west of and adjoining the Railroad-Shops addition, which lies south of and adjoining said Albina addition, and Proebstel's addition, which lies south of and adjoining Riverside addition, had each been laid out, platted, and the streets therein dedicated to the public, and the plats thereof duly recorded. That Morris street, extending east and west between Albina addition and Riverside addition on the north, and Railroad-Shops addition and Proebstel's addition on the south, and between Riverside Addition, is 60 feet wide, and between Railroad-Shops addition and Albina addition is 46 feet wide, according to the said recorded plats, the south line of said street being a continuous straight line. On April 3, 1889, after making and filing the plat of Albina addition by plaintiff, he caused to be published and exhibited to intending purchasers a map of said addition upon which is represented lots, blocks, and streets, named and numbered, the same as on the recorded plat, and also represented, or attempted to represent thereon, the streets and public ways connecting with the streets in his said addition, but neither the size of lots or blocks nor width of streets are marked upon said last-named plat. On this plat, the north line of Morris street is represented to be a continuous, straight line, but its width is not marked on the map, nor does the map indicate that block 1 abutting on this street is of any less width than the other blocks in the addition. That prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff sold and conveyed lots in Albina addition by reference to said map, but no sales were made by lots fronting on Morris street. That on May 23, 1889, the city of Albina duly passed an ordinance providing for the time and manner of improving said Morris street along and in front of Albina addition, the full width thereof, and on July 13, 1889, the city duly entered into a contract with defendant Richardson for the improvement of said Morris street, according to said ordinance, to the full width of 60 feet. That Richardson commenced the improvement of said street to the width of 60 feet, and, in doing so, entered upon a part of said street, — a strip of land 14 feet wide, — from the south side of block 1, Albina addition, as appeared on the recorded plat. Whereupon plaintiff began this suit for an injunction to restrain the defendants from entering upon said strip of land. A trial in the court below resulted in a decree in favor of the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken.

P. L. Willis and C. H. Carey, for appellants. H. W. Hogue and C. M. Idleman, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The contention of the defendants is that plaintiff, by making and exhibiting to intending purchasers the second map or plat of Albina addition showing the north line of Morris street to be a continuous straight line, and by selling lots with reference to this plat, thereby dedicated to the public the south 14 feet of block 1 of this addition as shown on the recorded plat. It is not claimed that plaintiff ever expressly dedicated this strip of land to the public, or ever had any express intention so to do, but it is sought to conclude him upon the ground that he has suffered the public and individuals, relying upon his acts and conduct in exhibiting the second map to intending purchasers, and making sale of lots by reference to such plat, to acquire rights upon the faith that he has devoted this strip of land to the use of the public as a part of Morris street. The law is well settled that where the owner of land lays out and establishes a town thereon, and makes and exhibits a map or plan of the town, with lots, blocks, streets and alleys, and sells lots with reference to such plan, he thereby dedicated to the public the streets and public ways marked thereon; that the sale and conveyance of lots, according to such plan or map, implies a grant or covenant that the streets or other public places represented by the map shall never be appropriated by the owner to a use inconsistent with that represented by the map on the faith of which the lots are sold, and in this state such dedication becomes irrevocable, and no formal acceptance by the public or corporate authorities is necessary. Carter v. City of Portland, 4 Or. 339; Meier v. Railway Co., 16 Or. 500, 19 Pac. Rep. 610.

It is, however, conceded in this case, by the plaintiff, that he did dedicate to the public a portion of his land as a part of Morris street, but the controversy here is whether the strip of land so dedicated is 18 feet wide, as claimed by plaintiff, or 32 feet, as contended for by the defendants, and this question must be determined from plaintiff's intention as evinced by his acts and conduct. In order to constitute a dedication by parol, there must be some acts proved evincing a clear intention to devote the premises to the public use. Carter v. City of Portland, 4 Or. 339. It is essential that the donor should intend to set apart the land for the use of the public, for it is held without contrariety of opinion that there can be no dedication unless there is a present intent to appropriate the land to the public. Elliot, Roads & St. 92; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 636, and note. This intention is not a secret one, but that which is expressed in the visible and open conduct of the owner. His acts and declarations may, and often do, evince an intention to dedicate land to the public as a highway, when he had no real intention of so doing. His intention is to be inferred from his acts and declarations, but such acts and declarations must clearly indicate an intention on the part of the donor to dedicate the land to the public, or no dedication can exist. When it is sought to establish a dedication by the sale of lots with reference to a map or plat, the extent of such dedication is to be determined from the consideration of the whole map, the chief object being to ascertain the intention of the donor, for the cardinal rule of construction is to give effect to the intention of the party as manifested by his acts. A dedication is not presumed, but must be shown by the acts and declarations of the owner of such a public and deliberate character as clearly show an intention on his part to surrender his land for the use of the public, and the burden of proof is on the party asserting such dedication. In Tinges v. Mayor, etc., 51 Md. 609, it is said: "It is well settled by the decisions of this court that an intent on the part of the owner to dedicate his land to the particular use alleged is absolutely essential, and, unless such intention is clearly proved by the facts and circumstances of the particular case, no dedication exists. McCormick v. Mayor, 45 Md. 524." So in Shellhouse v. State, 110 Ind. 513, 11 N. E. Rep. 484: "To constitute a valid dedication, there must have been an actual intention on the part of the owner, clearly indicated by unequivocal acts or conduct, to dedicate the land to the public for use as an alley. Tucker v. Conrad, 103 Ind. 349, 2 N. E. Rep. 803, and cases cited. As was in effect said in the case above cited, unless there appears an actual intent to dedicate on the part of the owner, the court cannot do otherwise than to find that there was no dedication." So in Holdane v. Trustees of Village of Cold Spring, 21 N. Y. 477: "The owner's acts and declarations should be deliberate, unequivocal, and decisive, manifesting a positive and unmistakable intention to permanently abandon his property to the specific public use. If they be equivocal, and do not clearly and plainly indicate the intention to permanently abandon the property to the use of the public, they are insufficient to establish a case of dedication." In Lowndale v. City of Portland, 1 Or. 405, DEADY, J., in discussing this question, says: "The burden of proof rests on the defendant to show a dedication. It must be clear and satisfactory. * * * The security and certainty of the title to real estate are among the most important objects of the laws of any civilized community. Around it the law has thrown certain solemnities and formalities so that the fact may be known and read by all men. What a man once had he is not to be presumed to have parted with, but the fact must be shown beyond conjecture; and although, in the case of streets and public grounds in towns, from the nature of the case a dedication may be shown by acts resting in parol, they must be of such a public and deliberate character as makes them generally known, and not of doubtful intention." To the same effect are Lee v. Lake, 14 Mich. 18; People v. Jones, 6 Mich. 176; Bridge Co. v. Bachman, 66 N. Y. 261; Rowan's Ex'rs v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 232; Ang. & D. Highw. § 142; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 400, and note. From these and other authorities that might be cited it may be stated that the question of intent to dedicate is the paramount one in all cases of disputed dedication, and is to be determined as the question of mixed law and fact, from the evidence in each particular case.

The controversy here is not between a purchaser of lots fronting on Morris street and the plaintiff, but between him and the city of Albina acting on behalf of the public. The claim of the city is based wholly upon the fact that the north line of Morris street as shown upon the second map is a continuous straight line, and for that reason it is insisted that plaintiff is estopped from denying the dedication of the land in controversy to the public as a part of that street. This second map was made and published on the same day the original plat of Albina addition was recorded, and was evidently designed to be used by the plaintiff or his agents in the sale of lots, and to this end it undertakes to represent the public ways connecting with the streets in this addition, the distance from school-houses, churches, and public lines of transportation, and has published therein a statement of the many advantages claimed for this particular property. As far as Albina addition is concerned, it appears to be an exact copy of the recorded map, except that the size of lots and width of streets are not marked thereon. In fact the map in evidence, and by stipulation of the parties conceded to be a copy of the recorded map, appears to be one of the second maps published by plaintiff, with the portion representing the adjoining property removed, and with the size of lots and width of streets marked thereon in pencil; so that, as far as plaintiff's property is concerned, there is no difference whatever in the two plats, but one is an exact copy of the other, and there is nothing on the second plat to indicate that Morris street is more than 46 feet wide, unless it be that the north line of this street is represented to be a continuous straight line from the south-east corner of this addition, extending west. Block 1 of this addition, which fronts on this street, appears to be the same size and contains the same number of lots as the other blocks in the addition, which could not be the case if a strip 14 feet wide from the south side of this block is a part of Morris street. From an inspection of the map, we think it much more probable that plaintiff only intended to represent the width of Morris street as actually located in front of his property than its width in front of the adjoining property, which he did not own, or in any way control.

As we have already seen, in order to constitute a common-law dedication, "the owner's acts must be deliberate, unequivocal, and decisive, manifesting a positive and unmistakable intention to permanently abandon his property to the public use," and particularly is this true when there has been a statutory dedication by recording an acknowledged plat, and it is sought to establish another and different dedication by the acts and conduct of the owner in exhibiting to intending purchasers a map prepared on the same day as the recorded plat, and selling lots by reference to the second map. The second plat, to have this effect, should be essentially different from the recorded one, showing on its face an intention on the part of its owner to make an additional dedication. In this case the second map, as far as plaintiff's property is concerned, is precisely the same as the prior recorded one. The dimensions of streets, lots, and blocks are not exhibited upon it, nor does it contain any evidence of an intention to make any dedication different from that already made. It is simply a plat, and made by the plaintiff for his own convenience in selling the property. Where the owner of property has complied with the statutory requirements in making and filing a plat of his proposed town or addition, we know of no rule of law that requires him to be bound by another or additional dedication simply because he makes a copy of his recorded plat for his own convenience in disposing of his property, upon which the lines do not appear with that complete accuracy as on the recorded plat, and especially when it does not clearly appear to be radically different from the recorded one. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. WISECARVER v. SMITH.

SCHOOL MEETINGS—POWERS.

Appeal from circuit court, Yamhill county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

Geo. G. Bingham, Dist. Atty., and James McCain, for appellant. N. L. Butler, John J. Daly, and W. D. Fenton, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J. In all of its essential features this case is like State v. McKee, ante, 292, (just decided,) and which must govern it. The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the findings of law set aside, and the findings of law of this court substituted, and judgment of ouster entered against the respondent, and a judgment also entered admitting the relator to the office of school clerk mentioned in the pleadings.

HUMPHREY v. CHILCAT CANNING CO.

PAROL CONTRACT—MEMORANDUM.

Where, at the time parties enter into a parol contract, a memorandum is read containing the terms thereof, which are assented to by the parties except in two particulars, such memorandum becomes a part of the transaction, and in an action on the contract the same is competent evidence as a part of res gestae, and may be considered by the jury for the purpose of assisting them to determine what the terms of the contract were.

Appeal from circuit court, Clatsop county; FRANK J. TAYLOR, Judge.

The substance of the complaint is as follows: The complaint alleged that on February 9, 1889, defendant employed plaintiff to work at its cannery in Alaska for eight months, and agreed to pay him $800 therefor, and his passage money between Astoria and Alaska, going and returning, and to board and lodge plaintiff during said period; that pursuant to said agreement plaintiff went to Alaska, and worked for defendant until March 10, 1889, when defendant wrongfully, and without any cause, discharged plaintiff. Also alleges that plaintiff was at all times ready and willing, and offered to perform his contract during said period, and alleges value of his board and lodging, and cost of passage; and alleges an indebtedness thereby of $985 to his damage. The defendant's answer denies employing plaintiff for any definite period of time, or for any definite sum, except $100 per month, with board and lodging, and return passage if not discharged. For a further and separate answer plaintiff alleged that on or about the 23d day of January, 1889, this defendant offered to enter into a written contract with the said plaintiff at and for the sum of $100 per month for the period of eight months, or for and during the canning season in Alaska, upon the following terms and conditions, to-wit: "In consideration of free passage from Astoria to Chilcat, Alaska, and $100 per month of thirty days, Sundays included, the said plaintiff agrees to go to Alaska with the Chilcat Canning Company, and work at their salmon cannery in Alaska during the season of 1889, fishing and doing any other work required by this defendant, such as erecting the necessary cannery buildings, getting out the necessary wood for fuel, lightering freight to and from the steamer to the cannery, and in fact doing any and all kinds of work, at any and all times whenever required by this defendant, and to act, if requested, as net tender when the fishing season began. The Chilcat Canning Company to pay plaintiff's passage from Chilcat, Alaska, to Astoria, Oregon, at the end of the season, but reserving the right to discharge said Humphrey for any cause, such as intoxication, neglect of duty, disobedience, or refusal to work whenever called upon at any time. The Chilcat Canning Company not to pay his return fare if so discharged, or if he quits on his own account, nor allow any wages for the time going up to Alaska on the steamer, but to pay only for the actual time worked in Alaska. Time to commence when steamer leaves Astoria and end when said Humphrey is landed back to Astoria, at end of season. Wages to be paid at end of season at the office of the Chilcat Canning Company in Astoria, Oregon." The plaintiff agreed to all of the terms of said contract except that he refused to bind himself, or this defendant, for any definite period of time for the service to continue, and on that account refused to sign the written contract, but offered to enter this defendant's service upon all the other terms as proposed aforesaid, reserving the right to either party to terminate the employment at any time at pleasure. The defendant thereupon accepted said plaintiff's offer and he thereupon entered into the employment of this defendant on or about February 9, 1889, under said contract as accepted as aforesaid, at which time said steamer left Astoria; that plaintiff arrived in Alaska, and wrought for defendant for the time only of two weeks, when, on March 10, 1889, the said plaintiff wrongfully violated his agreement to work, and failed and refused to work as requested by this defendant, in putting up the buildings to receive the freight from the beach, then exposed to the weather, which work was then and there necessary to be done and performed. During all of said time in Alaska, in defendant's employ, the said plaintiff was insubordinate in his conduct, and was creating a like spirit in his fellow-workmen. Thereupon this defendant dismissed the said plaintiff from its service on said 10th day of March, 1889. Plaintiff's reply denied the new matter in defendant's answer, including said written contract, except that he admits he refused to perform work on the 10th day of March, 1889, for the reason that said day was Sunday. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for the amount claimed, and defendant appeals.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The principal exceptions relied upon were taken during the progress of the trial. The record recites that the plaintiff gave evidence tending to support his cause of action, and then rested. The defendant then introduced testimony tending to prove that one Murray was its general manager, and engaged in hiring men to enter its service and go to Alaska and there engage in the business of canning salmon; that at the time said contract of hiring was closed, plaintiff and about 25 other persons, wishing to enter the defendant's service, were present; that at said time the contract, containing the terms upon which the men were being employed by the defendant, was read over, in the plaintiff's presence and hearing, and that he then and there assented to all of its terms, except that he would not be bound for any definite time, and his wages were to be $100 a month. For the purpose of placing before the jury all of the terms and conditions of the contract, which the defendant claimed the plaintiff entered into with it, the defendant's counsel then offered to read to the jury the said writing, and to show that plaintiff assented to all of its terms except as above, but the court excluded it, and an exception was taken. The writing is as follows: "This agreement made and entered into this 23d day of January, 1889, by and between the Chilcat Canning Co. of Astoria, Oregon, and the undersigned, witnesseth: That, for the consideration of free passage from Astoria to Chilcat, Alaska, and $50, with board, per month of thirty days, Sundays included, we do hereby agree to go to Alaska with the Chilcat Canning Company and work at their salmon cannery in Alaska during the season of 1889, fishing and doing any other work required by us, such as erecting necessary cannery buildings, getting out the necessary wood for fuel, lightering freight to and from the steamer to the cannery, and in fact doing any and all kinds of work, at any and at all times whenever required by us. The Chilcat Canning Company further agree to pay to the undersigned one cent for every red salmon caught and delivered into their cannery, and also pay their passage from Chilcat, Alaska, to Astoria, Oregon, at end of season. The Chilcat Canning Company reserve the right to discharge any of the undersigned for any cause, such as intoxication, neglect of duty, disobedience, or refusal to work whenever called upon at any time. The Chilcat Canning Company will not pay the return fare of any one so discharged, or any one that quits of his own account, nor allow any wages for the time going up to Alaska on the steamer, but will only pay for the actual time worked in Alaska. Time to commence when steamer leaves Astoria and end when the undersigned are landed back to Astoria at end of season. Wages to be paid at end of season at the office of Chilcat Canning Company, in Astoria, Oregon. CHILCAT CANNING COMPANY, D. MORGAN, President. By W. A. SHERMAN, Secretary. [Signatures of employees.]"

The defendant's contention on this appeal is that this writing was read over to the plaintiff, and in his presence and hearing, at the time he was employed, and that he orally assented to all of its terms, and that it thus became a part of the transaction itself,—a part of what was said and done by the parties at the time of the hiring,—tending to prove what the contract was between the plaintiff and defendant, and that for this purpose it was competent. It is not claimed that the contract between the plaintiff and defendant is a written contract. On the contrary, it exists entirely in parol; but what was said and done by the parties, and what was read at the time the contract is alleged to have been entered into, were competent evidence to be considered by the jury for the purpose of enabling them to determine what the terms of such contract were. Hill's Code, § 686, clearly and succinctly states the principle of law applicable in such case: "Where, also, the declaration, act, or omission forms part of the transaction, which is itself the fact in dispute or evidence of the fact, such declaration, act, or omission is evidence as a part of that transaction." This section is declaratory of the common law. It is a legislative definition of res gestæ. What are res gestæ, and what not, are sometimes difficult to distinguish; but the difficulty in making the application does not in any manner impair the rule. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1102, says: "It may, however, happen that statements of a party are so interwoven with a contract as to form a part of it, or are so wrought up in a transaction that they form a necessary incident of any narrative of such transaction. In such case the party's declarations are admissible, as we have already seen, as a part of the res gestæ." So it is said in Wood, Pr. Ev. p. 431, § 150, "that, whenever the acts or declarations of a party, made at the time of a transaction, and so intimately connected therewith as to form a part of it, which tend to explain the transaction, or to aid in arriving at the real nature, character, and purpose of the transaction, are admissible in evidence, as well for as against the party making them." So, in Bank v. Kennedy, 17 Wall. 19, it was held that conversations occurring during the negotiation of a loan or other transaction, as well as the instruments given or received, being part of the res gestæ, are competent evidence to show the nature of the transaction, and the parties for whose benefit it was made, when that is material. Lathrop v. Bramhall, 64 N. Y. 365, was a case where a memorandum relating to the terms of a parol contract was made at the time by one of the parties negotiating the contract, and read over to the others, and it was held that although not itself a valid contract it was competent as evidence to corroborate the oral evidence as to the terms of the contract. In that case, MILLER, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It was not offered to refresh the memory of the witness, and was not admissible in that point of view, and the rule applicable in such case cannot be invoked, nor was it competent alone as the contract of the parties, but it was evidence which corroborated the oral proof as it coincided with it as to the terms of the contract. The two together showed what the contract was, and there can be no valid objection where an oral contract is made to prove that its principal terms were written down and a memorandum made of them and read at the time. The one is not a substitute for the other, and both are properly admissible without violating any rule of law. It is not a case where a valid contract is made in writing, which entirely supersedes the oral contract, but one where an oral contract is entered into and a memorandum made at the time regarding its general features and characteristics." The effect of these authorities is not countervailed or broken by anything presented in behalf of the respondent, and the paper offered in evidence was clearly within the principle announced. According to the defendant's contention the paper in question, with the exceptions already noted, recited the terms of the contract which the defendant entered into with the plaintiff. It became so not because it was executed by certain of the parties, but because it was read over in his presence and hearing at the time of the hiring, and assented to by the plaintiff. This made it admissible as a part of the transaction, and in the strictest sense res gestæ. Of course, in what is here said it could not be understood that we express any opinion as to the weight of any of the evidence. That is not the province of the court. All that we decide is that the memorandum offered was competent evidence to be submitted to the jury under the circumstances, and that its exclusion was error, for which the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

SALE—REFUSAL TO ACCEPT—REMEDIES OF SELLER.

1. In an action for goods sold and delivered, if the plaintiff alleges and proves a delivery at the place agreed, and nothing remains for him to do, he need not show an acceptance by the defendant.

2. Where, however, defendant refuses to accept or pay for such goods, plaintiff may elect to treat the goods as belonging to defendant, and bring an action for contract price; or he may otherwise dispose of the goods, and sue for damages.

3. Where, after such delivery and refusal of payment, plaintiff mortgages or pledges the goods to secure a loan of money, he cannot maintain an action for the value of the goods against the defendant.

Appeal from circuit court, Linn county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

This is an action to recover the value of wood alleged to have been cut and delivered to defendant by plaintiff, and for damages for breach of contract. The first cause of action set out in the complaint is as follows: "That on or about the 22d day of December, 1888, in Linn county, state of Oregon, the plaintiff made and entered into a contract with the said defendant above named, the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company, whereby and wherein plaintiff undertook and agreed to cut all the wood on a certain piece or parcel of land bought by said company from G. W. Drewery, in Fox Valley, in Linn county, Oregon, and the right of way of said company, near said premises, into cord-wood, and suitable for use in the railroad engines, and deliver the same to the said company on their said right of way, along the line of the railroad of said company, whenever it was convenient to deliver said wood, and the said Oregon Pacific Railroad Company promised and agreed to pay plaintiff, at the end of each month, for all wood delivered by him in accordance with said contract during said month, at the rate of two dollars per cord, deducting ten cents per cord for the wood or timber furnished by said company; that plaintiff, in accordance with the terms of said contract, cut and delivered to the said company, along the line of their said road, 306 cords of wood, of the agreed value of $612, and of the net value, deducting the price of the timber purchased by defendant, of $591.40, and that said wood was all cut and delivered, as aforesaid, prior to the 22d day of April, 1889; that defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to pay plaintiff for said wood, or any part thereof." There was a claim for damages and lumber also set forth in the complaint, but for the purposes of this appeal they are immaterial. The answer denies specifically each and every allegation of the complaint, and, among other defenses, alleges the following: "That said plaintiff never delivered to defendant any of the wood so cut by him, but sold and delivered the same to Fred Bender on the 11th day of March, 1889, together with other wood and property then claimed to be owned by him, and received from said Bender full payment therefor." The plaintiff, in his reply, denies each and every allegation in this part of the answer, with the qualifying phrase, "except as herein-after alleged," and then makes the following allegation in reference thereto: "Plaintiff, for a further and separate reply to defendant's further and separate answer, alleges that on or about the 11th day of March, 1889, plaintiff was, by reason of defendant's failure and refusal to comply with the terms of the contract for cutting wood mentioned in the complaint herein, and pay the money as it became due on said wood, according to the terms of said contract, compelled to give a lien on said wood to one Fred Bender, to raise money to pay off the men employed to cut said wood; that said lien was paid and satisfied and released in full before the commencement of this action." A jury was called, and, after the evidence was introduced and argument of counsel, they returned into court the following verdict: "Emil Schneider vs. Oregon Pacific Railroad Company. We, the jury in the above case, find for plaintiff for two hundred and eighty-two and a half cords of wood, at $1.90 per cord, $536.75, and lumber in the sum of $34,—total, $570.75."

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The only error complained of here is the entry of a judgment on the verdict of the jury for the value of 282½ cords of wood, found by the jury to have been delivered to defendant by plaintiff. The contention of defendant is that the allegation in his reply, that on March 11, 1889, plaintiff gave a lien upon this wood to secure the payment of money borrowed by him, is such an admission as will preclude his recovery in this action for the value of such wood. The complaint avers that the wood was delivered along the line of the defendant's railroad prior to the 22d day of April, 1889; but, as the reply alleges that the lien was given on the 11th day of March, we must conclude, as a necessary consequence, that the wood was delivered on or before the date of the lien, so that it must be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that, after wood was delivered along the line of defendant's road, plaintiff either mortgaged or pledged the wood to Bender for money with which to pay his hands. This action is brought to recover the value of the wood, and not damages for a breach of the contract of defendant. The complaint alleges that plaintiff delivered the wood at the place provided in the contract for its delivery. In so doing, he complied with this contract on his part, and was entitled to his pay for the wood at the rate agreed upon. He was not required to allege or prove an acceptance of the wood by the defendant before bringing his action. Nichols v. Morse, 100 Mass. 523; Pacific Iron-Works v. Long Island R. Co., 62 N. Y. 272.

It appears, however, from the record before us that after the wood was delivered by plaintiff at the place provided in the contract, and agreed on by the parties as the place of delivery, defendant refused to accept or pay for it, according to its agreement. Upon the refusal of defendant to pay for the wood, as it agreed to do, plaintiff had the right to elect to treat the wood as the property of the defendant, and sue for the contract price thereof, as he has done here, or otherwise dispose of the wood, and bring an action for damages for breach of the contract, if he was damaged by such breach. But he could not take possession, sell, or incur the wood, and sue for the contract price. If he insists on having from the defendant the price at which he contracted to sell the wood, he cannot, consistently with such a demand, sell or dispose of it to another. In this case he has sued for the value of the wood, and must recover, if at all, upon the theory that the wood belonged to defendant, and the sale was complete. Maclean v. Dunn, 4 Bing. 722; Miller, Sales, § 28; Girard v. Taggart, 5 Serg. & R. 18; Crooks v. Moore, 1 Sandf. 297. If, after he delivered the wood along the railroad track, he saw proper, for any reason, to resume possession of it, or exercise such acts of ownership over it as were inconsistent with a right of property in defendant, he cannot recover in the action the value of the wood. When he mortgaged or pledged this wood to Bender to secure a loan of money, he thereby exercised such acts of ownership over it as preclude the idea of property in defendant. If the wood belonged to defendant, he could not give a lien upon it, for he had no such interest in the wood as could be subjected to a lien. He could not treat the wood as the property of defendant, and at the same time mortgage it to some other person. When he assumed the right to mortgage or pledge the wood to Bender to secure a loan, he must have elected to resume control over the wood, and to look to defendants for damages for breach of its contract. He claims that he was compelled to give this lien because defendant would not comply with its contract. In this action it matters not what reason may have prompted him to make his election,—whether the importunities of his creditors, or the conduct of defendant. The only inquiry is, did he, by his actions, evince an intention to repudiate the sale, and resume control of the wood? The conduct of defendant might possibly be a proper subject of inquiry in an action for damages, but the only question before us is the legal effect of the mortgage or pledge of the wood to Bender. The facts are admitted, and we must apply the law to them. The plaintiff claims in his reply that the lien to Bender was satisfied and discharged before the commencement of this action, but he does not allege that he delivered the wood to defendant after the lien was discharged. He says he delivered the wood prior to April 22, 1889, and the action was not commenced until October 14, 1889, so that the lien may have been satisfied prior to the commencement of the action, and yet after the alleged delivery of the wood; but we think it appears from the pleadings, and it was so assumed on the argument here, that the only delivery claimed to have been made was made prior to the date of the lien.

It was argued that the allegation in the reply is only a departure, and cannot be taken advantage of after verdict; but we are unable to concur with counsel in the theory that such allegation is a departure. A departure in pleadings is defined to be where a party quits or departs from the cause of action or defense which he has first made, and has recourse to another. 1 Chit. Pl. 644. In this case the averment in the reply that gave a lien upon the wood to Bender does not in any way constitute a cause of action against the defendant, but is an affirmative matter, pleaded by plaintiff himself, which is a complete defense to the cause of action set out in his complaint. It follows, therefore, that it was error for the court below to enter judgment against defendant for the value of this wood, and the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, as by law provided.

INTERPLEADER—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

1. When two or more persons severally claim the same thing, debt, or duty from the party liable therefor, such party may maintain a suit in equity to compel such parties to litigate the title thereto between themselves, such party having incurred no independent liability to any of claimants, and being merely in the position of a stakeholder without interest in the matter himself.

2. The title of a receiver on his appointment dates back to the time of granting the order.

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

The object of this suit is to determine the right to certain money in the hands of the plaintiff, and which is claimed by the defendants Ames and Detrick, as attaching creditors of A. Grant, and David McCully, receiver of A. Grant's estate. The complaint shows that about the 13th of December, 1888, A. Grant consigned to the plaintiff 74 bales of hops to be sold on commission; that prior to the 29th day of June, 1889, in an action instituted in the circuit court of Marion county, Or., wherein Lewis Pettyjohn was plaintiff and A. Grant was defendant, a judgment in the sum of $2,841.70 was rendered in favor of said plaintiff and against said defendant, and an execution duly issued thereon; that on the date last aforesaid David McCully was duly appointed receiver by said court of all of the debts, property, equitable interests, rights, and things of said A. Grant in order that said judgment might be paid and satisfied; that on July 5, 1889, said McCully duly notified the plaintiff of his appointment as receiver, and directed him to hold for and turn over to him (said McCully) any and all moneys which plaintiff might then have or might thereafter receive belonging to said A. Grant; that on the 21st day of August, 1889, in an action brought in the circuit court for Multnomah county, Or., wherein J. P. Ames and E. Detrick, partners, were plaintiffs and the said A. Grant was defendant, a writ of attachment was served on this plaintiff, and $757.10, with interest and costs, were attached, and requiring him to retain in his custody said sum of money; that on the 12th day of November, 1889, the plaintiff received from London, England, to which market said hops had been shipped for sale, an account thereof, and after deducting all expenses and his just charges and commissions, the sum of $1,439.44 remained, which, as between the plaintiff and Grant, belongs to said Grant; that on November 30, 1889, a judgment was rendered by the said circuit court of Multnomah county, in favor of Ames & Detrick, and against said A. Grant, for $765.85, with interest and costs, and by said judgment the plaintiff was directed to pay over to Ames & Detrick an amount sufficient to satisfy said judgment; that the plaintiff is ignorant of the respective rights of the defendants, and cannot determine the same without hazard to himself; that he has no claim upon or interest in the said money, and is ready and willing, and hereby offers, to deliver the same to any person the court may direct; and that the suit is brought without collusion. It also appears that the receiver was made a defendant by leave of the court appointing him. Prays that the defendants interplead, and that their rights be determined in said fund. The defendants were severally enjoined pending the litigation. The receiver answered, setting up substantially the same facts alleged in the complaint, and demanding that the money in the plaintiff's hands be paid over to him as such receiver. Ames & Detrick also answered, claiming the amount of their judgment and costs out of said fund by virtue of their garnishment of the plaintiff and the judgment against Grant. The plaintiff, in reply to their answer, repeated in effect the same facts stated in the complaint. The cause being at issue a referee was appointed to take and report the testimony. Upon the final hearing the complaint was dismissed, from which plaintiff has appealed.

Wm. T. Muir, for Pope. Geo. H. Burnett & Geo. H. Durham, for Ames & Detrick. J. J. Shaw, for receiver.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) Enough appears on the pleadings and papers accompanying them to show that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this suit. The plaintiff is threatened with separate liabilities on claims which are substantially one and the same, which entitles such party to maintain the suit. By means of such suit, a plaintiff may compel two or more persons who severally claim the same thing, debt, or duty from the party liable therefor to litigate the title thereto between themselves, the party liable having incurred no independent liability to any of the claimants, and being merely in the position of a stakeholder, without interest in the matter himself. 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 494, tit. "Interpleader," where the authorities are very fully and carefully collected. Ames & Detrick commenced their attachment proceedings long after the appointment of the receiver of Grant's property and assets. So far, then, as the right to the possession of this money is concerned, as between the receiver and Ames & Detrick it is one of priority. Ames & Detrick claim no right to this money, or any portion of it, except by virtue of their attachment and garnishment of the plaintiff. Those proceedings were taken long after McCully was appointed receiver. It is said in Beach on Receivers (section 200) that the courts have now, as a rule, come to the conclusion that the title of a receiver on his appointment dates back to the time of granting the order, even though certain preliminary conditions must first be performed and the receiver remains out of possession pending such performance. The decree of the court below must therefore be reversed, and a decree be entered here that the plaintiff pay and deliver the money in question into the hands of the receiver, and that upon such payment he be exonerated from all claim or liability to either of the defendants on account thereof.

STATE V. WHEELER.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Dec. 16, 1890.)

FORGERY—FICTITIOUS NAME.

The execution of a promissory note in the name of a fictitious person, or under an assumed name, with an intent to defraud, is forgery.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

L. Baker, for appellant. T. A. Stephens, Dist. Atty., for the State.

BEAN, J. The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of forgery, from which judgment he appeals. The indictment charges that on June 28, 1890, the defendant made and forged a promissory note for $85.50, payable to John P. Fidock, or order, due 30 days after date, by then and there signing the name of John Williams to said note, with an intent to defraud and injure J. T. Milner. At the trial in the court below, after the evidence for the state was closed, defendant's counsel moved the court that the jury be instructed to render a verdict of not guilty, upon the ground that the evidence failed to prove the crime charged. The refusal of the court to give the instructions is the only error claimed on this appeal. An examination of this question renders it necessary to briefly state the evidence as given on the trial, which was as follows: On June 28, 1890, the defendant called at the office of J. T. Milner, in Mulkey's block, in the city of Portland, and represented to Mr. Milner that his name was John Williams, and applied for a loan of $85.50, offering to secure the same by a chattel mortgage on a team of horses. He drove the team up in front of the office, and Mr. Milner looked at them, and agreed to make the loan. The note was drawn up by Milner, and the defendant signed the name of John Williams thereto, and Milner paid him the $85.50 in money. When the note became due, the defendant did not call to pay it, and Milner wrote two letters to John Williams, calling on him to pay the note, one of which he directed to Albina. A Mr. John Williams, of Albina, responded to the letter sent him, but denied ever signing the note. That no part of the note has been paid, nor has defendant ever called at Milner's office, where the note was to be paid. That defendant was a stranger to Milner, and he supposed his true name was John Williams, and would not have made the loan had he known otherwise. That defendant's true name is Edward Wheeler, as stated in the indictment, and not John Williams. The inquiry here is whether, under this state of facts, the defendant was properly convicted of the crime of forgery. "Forgery" is defined by Blackstone to be "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another's rights." 4 Bl. Comm. 247. WILLES, J., in Reg. v. Epps, 4 Fost & F. 81, says: "'Forgery' consists in drawing an instrument in such a manner as to represent fraudulently that it is a true and genuine document really in existence as it appears on the face of it, when in fact there is no such genuine document really in existence as it appears on the face of it to be." In State v. Wooderd, 20 Iowa, 541, DILLON, J., says: "The making or alteration of any writing with a fraudulent intent, whereby another may be prejudiced, is forgery." Mr. Bishop says: "'Forgery' is the false making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 523. Section 1808, Hill's Code, provides that "if any person shall, with intent to injure or defraud any one, falsely make, alter, forge, or counterfeit * * * any bill of exchange, promissory note, or evidence of debt, * * * shall be punished in the penitentiary not less than 2 nor more than 20 years." From the definitions of "forgery" as above stated, as well as from the statute, it will be seen that the essential elements of the crime are (1) a false making of some instrument in writing; (2) a fraudulent intent; (3) an instrument apparently capable of effecting a fraud. That the first and third ingredients above stated appear in this case cannot be doubted. The note executed by defendant under the name of John Williams is certainly a false note. It is not what it purports on its face to be; is false, not genuine; fictitious, not a true writing. The falsity of the note consists in its purporting to be the note of some party other than the one actually making the signature. It purports to be a note of one John Williams, while the signature was made by the defendant, and, although the defendant represented that his name was John Williams, if he assumed that name for the purpose of defrauding, and under such a name executed the promissory note in this case with an intent to defraud Milner, such an act would constitute forgery. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 583. The law is well settled that the signing of a fictitious name to an instrument with a fraudulent intent constitutes forgery. 8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 457, and note; People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571; State v. Hahn, 38 La. Ann. 169; Luttrell v. State, 1 S. W. Rep. 886; 2 Whart. Crim. Law, § 1424; 2 Russ. Crimes, 733. As was said in Com. v. Costello, 120 Mass. 370: "The essential element of forgery consists in the intent when making the signature, or procuring it to be made, to pass it off fraudulently as the signature of another party than the one who actually makes it. If this intent thus to personate another exists, the instrument is still a forgery, even if the name affixed is actually the same name with that borne by the party who signs it. So there may be forgery by the use of a fictitious name, as well as by the use of a person's own name, if the intent exists to commit a fraud by deception as to the identity of the person who uses the name."

In Shepherd's Case, 1 Leach, 226, the prisoner purchased some silver-ware of the prosecutor, giving in payment therefor a draft which he indorsed with the name "H. Turner, Esq.," his true name being Shepherd. The prosecutor testified that he gave credit to the prisoner, and not to the draft, the prisoner being a stranger to him. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and on a case reserved on the question whether, as the prosecutor had sworn that he gave credit to the prisoner and not to the draft, it could amount to the crime of forgery, the 12 judges were unanimously of the opinion that the conviction was right; for it was a "false instrument," not drawn by any such person as it purported to be, and the using of the fictitious name was only for the purpose of deceiving. So in Whiley's Case, 2 Leach, 983, stated by Mr. Russell in his work on Crimes, the prisoner was charged with forging a bill of exchange, drawn in the name of Samuel Milward, in payment for some goods by him purchased of the prosecutor. The prisoner's real name was Samuel Whiley, and he was a stranger to the prosecutor, who testified that he took the draft on the credit of the prisoner whom he did not know; that he presumed the prisoner's name was that which he had written, and had no reason to suspect the contrary; but that, if the prisoner had come to him under the name of Samuel Whiley, he should have given him equal credit for the goods, and have taken the draft from him, and paid him the balance, as he had done when he came under the name of Milward. It was left to the jury to say whether the prisoner had assumed the name Milward in the purchase of the goods, and giving the draft with intent to defraud the prosecutor; and the jury, saying they were so satisfied, found the prisoner guilty, and, upon a case reserved, the judges were of the opinion that, the question of fraud being so left to the jury, and found by them, the conviction was right. So where the person accepting the instrument knew the prisoner only by his assumed name, it appearing that it was assumed for the purpose of fraud. Rex v. Francis, Russ. & R. 209. So where the prisoner was unknown to the person in whom the instrument was passed, who had never heard of the name assumed, and would have trusted the prisoner just as readily by his real name. Rex v. Marshall, Id. 75. The authorities agree that forging in a false name, assumed for the purpose of concealment, and with an intent to defraud in the particular instance of the forgery, is sufficient to constitute the offense. But when a party signs a name not his own, but one which he has adopted, using it without the intent to deceive as to the identity of the person signing, it is not a forgery. Rex v. Bontein, Id. 260; Rex v. Peacock, Id. 278. The question of intent is material in determining the guilt of the party charged, and the falsity of the instrument. It is the false making with an intent to defraud at which our statute is aimed. The term "falsely," as applied to making a promissory note, in order to constitute forgery, has reference not to the contract or tenor of the instrument, or the fact stated in the writing, because a note or writing containing a true statement may be forged or counterfeited as well as any other, but it implies that the writing is false, not genuine; fictitious, not a true writing; without regard to the truth or falsehood of the statement it contains. The note must in itself be false, not genuine; a counterfeit, and not the true instrument which it purports to be. State v. Young, 46 N. H. 270. A person may falsely make a note, yet the note be true in point of fact; or he may make a note which is false in fact. It is the former, the falsely making of the note with the intent to defraud, which is the essential ingredient of the crime here charged. The falsely making of a note in the name of a person, as already shown, is forgery; so is the falsely making of a note under an assumed name. The defendant in this case made the note, and signed a fictitious or an assumed name. He therefore falsely made it, although the fact stated in the note may be true. But the false making, when it was passed to Milner as genuine, indicated an intent to defraud, and brought the offense within the statute. This must logically be so, unless there is something in the facts and circumstances which contradict the intent to injure or defraud. In the case of Queen v. Martin, 29 Moak, Eng. R. 154, relied on by defendant, the facts show that the prisoner, in drawing the check, did not do so in the name of, or as representing, any other person, real or fictitious. The check was drawn and uttered as his own, and it was so received by the prosecutor, to whom the prisoner was perfectly well known as an acquaintance of 20 years' standing, and by whom he was seen to sign it. Here, while the prisoner falsely made the check, the circumstances show that it was not falsely made to defraud. The prosecutor relied upon, and gave the credit to, the prisoner, whom he well knew. But when the defendant is an entire stranger to the party to whom the note is passed, as in the case at bar, the credit is the note, for when is there any other element of credit which the party could be supposed to rely upon? Mr. Milner, in dealing with this defendant, and making the loan to him, relied upon the genuineness of the note as one step in the transaction, and a fair and legal inference from all the testimony is that defendant made the note with an intent to defraud, and thereby committed the crime of forgery. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

FRIENDLY V. LEE.

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

1. While books of account kept by a party, or known by him to be correct, may be used by him as memoranda for the purpose of refreshing his memory, this question must be kept distinct from the question under what circumstances books of account, shown to have been correctly kept, are admissible as original evidence.

2. A witness will be permitted to refresh his memory by an examination of memoranda reasonably contemporaneous with the transaction to which they relate, regarding dates, figures, results of calculation, and the like.

3. Where the record discloses that, at the time the witness testified, he had, without even looking at the entry in his book, a distinct recollection of the essential fact stated therein, there was no necessity whatever of reading the entry to the jury, and there was no error in refusing it.

4. A judgment non obstante veredicto is always upon the merits, and is never granted but in a very clear case, as where it is apparent to the court from the defendant's own plea that he can have no merits.

Appeal from circuit court, Benton county; R. S. BEAN, Judge.

This was an action to recover $60. In substance, it arose out of this state of facts: The plaintiff alleges that on the 29th day of May, 1886, he borrowed of the defendant the sum of $300 at the rate of 10 per cent. interest; that on the 28th day of November, 1887, he paid the plaintiff $45 on the same; and that on the 7th day of September, 1889, there was due the sum of $356.22; and that he paid the defendant the said sum of $356.22, and, by mistake, in addition thereto, paid the defendant $60; and that he has demanded the payment of the said sum of $60, which the defendant refused to pay, etc. The defendant, by his answer, after denying the facts as alleged, avers that the said sum of $300 for which the plaintiff gave his promissory note, with interest, etc., was borrowed on the 29th day of May, 1884, and not otherwise. All the other facts are admitted, and the right to recover the sum of $60 sued for depends on whether it was borrowed on the 29th day of May, 1886, as alleged by the plaintiff, or on the 29th day of May, 1884, as claimed by the defendant. It appears by the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff testified, in substance, that he received the said sum of $300 from the defendant on the date as alleged by him, and that it was the only money he had ever borrowed or had of the defendant, and offered in evidence what he called a "cash-book," which had been kept by him, and that the entries therein were made at the time they purport to have been, and that he knew they were correct; and in which book, on page 67 thereof, under date of May 29, 1886, there was an entry in the plaintiff's handwriting of $300 cash received of the defendant, etc. The defendant objected to the introduction of the same, which the court sustained, except in so far that the witness might be allowed to refresh his memory therefrom, to which exception was taken; and this constitutes the main ground relied upon to reverse the judgment.

J. W. Rayburn and John M. Somers, for plaintiff. J. R. Bryson and W. S. McFadden, for defendant.

LORD, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Upon this state of facts the only inquiry is, did the trial court err in refusing to permit the entry on the cash-book to be read to the jury as evidence? The issue was whether or not the plaintiff had received from the defendant the sum of $300 on the 29th day of May, 1886. It was in support of that issue to which his testimony was directed, and the entry was offered as evidence. The record discloses that he had testified that the $300 was received by him from the defendant on that date, and that it was the only money he had ever borrowed or had from the defendant; that, after testifying to these facts, he offered in evidence the page of his cash-book embracing the entry of the sum of money loaned, to show the date it bore was as he had alleged. Upon objection, the trial court, while excluding the entry as evidence, allowed it to be used for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the plaintiff, to enable him to testify to the fact of his own knowledge. The contention for the plaintiff is that the entry was admissible, but the law cited and relied upon to sustain it relates exclusively to the admission of the account-books of merchants and handicraftsmen in proof of the delivery of goods or the performance of work therein charged. Briefly, it may be said, at common law, the shop-books, or books of account, when the entries therein were made by a clerk, were received in evidence to prove the sale and delivery of the goods; but it was necessary to show that such books were kept for the purpose, and the entries to have been made contemporaneous with the delivery of the goods, and made by the person whose duty it was to make them. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 117, and notes. In this country the rule has been extended so as to admit the books when the entries therein have been made by the party himself; but there is not entire uniformity in regard to the admissibility of books of account in different jurisdictions, except that they all concur in requiring that the entries should be made in the regular course of business, and correctly kept, before they should be received in evidence. Id. § 118; Wood's Pr. Ev. §§ 139-145.

While, however, books of account kept by a party, or known by him to be correct, may be used by him as memoranda, for the purpose of refreshing his memory, this question must be kept distinct from the question under what circumstances books of account, shown to have been correctly kept, are admissible as original evidence. In the case of shop-books, or books of accounts, the entries made therein are admitted to prove the sale and delivery of the goods, or the payment of money, or the performance of work, as the case may be. In the case at bar, no such purpose was contemplated. The entry in the cash-book was not offered to prove the payment of the sum borrowed, for that had already been made, but to prove the date when the money was received, so as to ascertain whether there had not been two years' interest paid more than the transaction authorized. As evidence ipso facto, the entry was excluded, but, as a memorandum made contemporaneous with the transaction, the witness was permitted to refresh his memory by an examination of it, and, when his memory was thus refreshed, to testify to the fact of the date of his own knowledge. In Best on Evidence, note to section 224, it is said that a witness will be permitted to refresh his memory by an examination of memoranda reasonably contemporaneous with the transactions to which they relate, regarding dates, figures, results of calculation, and the like, whether such memoranda be made by the party himself or by any other person. The admissibility, then, of the entry in the cash-book, to show the date of the transaction, is not to be determined by the legal theory upon which book-accounts, shown to be correct, are admissible as original evidence, but whether, upon the facts, the memorandum made at the time of the transaction in the cash-book was admissible in evidence in connection with the testimony of the plaintiff. That a witness may refer to a memorandum made by him to refresh his memory is a familiar principle. Our Code provides that "a witness is allowed to refresh his memory respecting a fact, by any thing written by himself, or under his direction, at the time when the fact occurred, or immediately thereafter, or at any other time when the fact was fresh in his memory, and he knew that the same was correctly stated in the writing. But in either case the writing must be produced, and may be inspected by the adverse party, who may, if he choose, cross-examine the witness upon it, and read it to the jury. So, also, a witness may testify from such writing, though he retain no recollection of the particular facts, but such evidence shall be received with caution." Hill, Code, § 836. Lord ELLENBOROUGH said that "it is not the memorandum which is evidence, but the recollection of the witness." Henry v. Lee, 2 Chit. 124. And in Com. v. Jeffs, 132 Mass. 6, ENDICOTT, J., said: "We are not aware of any case where it has been held that the memorandum could be put in evidence simply because it refreshed the memory of the witness. Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 64. In that case, and in many of the cases cited therein, it is stated that the memorandum per se cannot be used in evidence." In Field v. Thompson, 119 Mass. 151, it was held that the memorandum was not competent, and that it could not be put in evidence in confirmation of the recollection of the witness. Rap. Wit. §§ 280, 284. Be that as it may, the memorandum itself is not admissible in evidence, except in cases where the witness, at the testifying, has no recollection of what took place further than he accurately reduced the whole transaction to writing. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 437; Wood, Pr. Ev. § 134. As indispensable to the admission of such testimony, there must be proof that the witness who made the memorandum had no recollection of the matters stated therein, independent of the written paper. When he has such recollection, the evidence is inadmissible. In Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 593, the court laid down the rule as to the use of memoranda as follows: "(1) A witness may, for the purpose of refreshing his memory, use any memorandum, whether made by himself or another, written or printed, and, when the memory has been refreshed, he must testify to the facts of his own knowledge, the memorandum itself not being evidence. (2) When a witness has so far forgotten the facts that he cannot recall them, and he testifies that he once knew them and made a memorandum of them at the time or soon after they transpired, which he intended to make correctly, and which he believes to be correct, such memorandum in his own handwriting may be received as evidence of the facts therein contained, although the witness has no present recollection of them." The rule was thus stated by CLOPTON, J., in Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 243: "If the witness, after examining the memorandum, cannot state the facts from independent recollection, but can testify that he knew the contents of the memorandum at or about the time it was made, and knew them to be true, the memorandum and the testimony of the witness are admissible. In other words, the entries or memoranda of transactions made by a witness are admissible only when the memory of the witness is at fault." Thomp. Trials, § 402, subd. 4, and note of authorities.

Now, the record of this case discloses that the plaintiff was able to testify directly to the date when he borrowed the money from the defendant of his own personal knowledge, clearly indicating that he did not need the aid of the entry in the cash-book to refresh his recollection of the transaction. His memory of the matter had not become more or less obscure, requiring the aid of the entry to refresh it so as to enable him to testify from his own personal recollection. He had already done that without its aid, and the only purpose the entry could serve was to confirm his statements. He testified that the $300 was received on the date alleged by him, and that it was the only money that he had ever borrowed or had of the defendant. There was but the single transaction, and his memory was not at fault either in respect to the amount or the date when he borrowed it. These facts plainly show that he did not desire to use the entry for this purpose, but as original evidence of entries made by himself to corroborate his own testimony. In Weaver v. Bromley, 65 Mich. 214, 31 N. W. Rep. 839, the court say: "The memorandum should not have been admitted in evidence. The witness had a clear recollection of the date upon which he received the notice, and did not desire or need the memorandum to refresh his recollection, and it was not used or offered for that purpose. It was introduced and received as original evidence in corroboration of his own statement. It was evidence made by himself in corroboration of himself. It was no more admissible than would have been the oral statement to the same effect made on that day to a third party." The reason for the exclusion of such entries, except when the witness is unable to recollect such facts, is thus stated in Bank v. Madden, 114 N. Y. 285, 21 N. E. Rep. 408: "The rule which renders such entries admissible rests upon the principle of necessity for the reception of secondary evidence, and is not applicable where the witness has a distinct recollection of the essential facts to which they relate. The primary common-law proof is then furnished, and the necessity for evidence of the lesser degree does not arise. And this right, so qualified, to introduce such secondary evidence, is the better rule, in view of the opportunities which might otherwise exist, to superadd a written memorandum to the evidence of a witness, which it cannot be said might sometimes be improperly made available to strengthen his testimony with the court or jury; and such may be within the reasonable apprehension until the moral infirmity of human nature becomes exceptionally less than it yet has." And finally, to conclude in the language of Mr. Justice HARLAN in Railroad Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 102, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118, "the present case does not require us to enter upon an examination of the numerous authorities upon this general subject, for it does not appear here but that, at the time the witness testified, he had, without even looking at his written statement, a clear, distinct recollection of essential fact stated in it. If he had such present recollection, there was no necessity whatever of reading that paper to the jury, and there was no error."

The next objection is to the refusal of the trial court to grant a motion for the sum alleged upon the ground that the answer set up no valid defense. But this is not wholly true, for the defense set up is valid as far as it goes, and shows that the plaintiff has not overpaid him the sum alleged, but only the sum of three dollars and five cents. It is true that a judgment non obstante veredicto is always upon the merits, and is never granted but in a very clear case, as where it is apparent to the court from the defendant's own plea that he can have no merits. 2 Tidd's Pr. 922. It is also true that nothing short of an intentional confession will furnish a ground for such judgment, as it can never be rendered on the confession implied upon a pleading from not answering traversable matter; but here the defendant, by his own answer, directly admits that he has been overpaid the sum of three dollars and five cents, and, as a consequence, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover that sum. The judgment therefore must be reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff for that amount.

DESCRIPTION IN DEED—EVIDENCE TO EXPLAIN.

Where the description in a deed is not clear and intelligible, the situation of the parties, and the circumstances surrounding the transaction, may be considered in connection with its provisions to ascertain the intention, and give it practical effect.

J. K. Weatherford, for appellant. J. C. Powell, for respondents.

LORD, J. This is a suit in equity, brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, for an injunction requiring the defendants to remove all the obstructions placed by them, or either of them, upon a certain tract of land therein described, and that they and each of them be perpetually enjoined from interfering with, or placing obstructions upon, said land. The complaint, in substance, alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land, describing it, and that he used it for a road-way for himself and the public going to and from his farm, and that he is entitled to the whole thereof; that the defendants have erected a warehouse thereon for the storage of grain, and are threatening to store therein large quantities of grain, and other obstructions, by building platforms, etc.; and that they threaten to further obstruct by piling large quantities of wood thereon, etc. The answer of the defendant Leverich denies specifically all the allegations, and alleges as a separate defense that he is the owner of the strip of land as described, and that the plaintiff is the owner of a right of way for a road over the strip of land, and that he has no other right or title to said strip of land whatever, etc. The reply puts in issue these facts, and, after the issues were thus joined, the case was referred to Hon. D. R. N. Blackburn, as referee, to take the evidence, and report his findings of fact and conclusions of law to the court. The referee made the following findings: "That the plaintiff is the owner of a right of way beginning at the south-west corner of the donation land claim of John McCoy and wife, T. 10 S., R. 4 west, in Linn county, Oregon, and extending down the Willamette river, along the bank thereof, to the north-west corner of the same, or so far as the land of F. D. Leverich extends down said river; (2) that said right of way is only forty feet wide; (3) that the wood-dock, wood-yard, and pig-pen of said defendant Leverich are not on said right of way, and do not interfere with the travel thereon; (4) that the warehouse of the said P. W. Haley is in said right of way, and does obstruct the travel on the same." And, as conclusions of law, finds "that plaintiff's bill should be dismissed as to defendant Leverich, and that said Leverich recover his costs and disbursements; (2) that, as to the defendant P. W. Haley, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought in his complaint,—a mandatory injunction for the removal of said warehouse from said right of way, etc., judgment for his costs, and disbursements to be taxed." The plaintiff, by his counsel, moved to set aside the report as to the defendant Leverich, and the defendant Leverich, by his counsel, moved to confirm the report, and the court, after being duly advised, ordered that the report of the referee, as to said Leverich, be confirmed.

The plaintiff's claim of title is deraigned, through a deed from Leverich and wife to Henry Stumberg, and from Henry Stumberg and wife to the plaintiff. Those deeds describe the tract in dispute as follows: "A strip of land forty feet wide along the bank of the Willamette river, beginning at the south-west corner of the donation land claim of John McCoy and wife in T. 10 S., R. 4 W., of Willamette meridian, etc., and extending down said river to the north-west corner of said claim, or as far as the land of F. D. Leverich extends down said river; to have and to hold for the purpose of a road or right of way unto the said E. Wills, his heirs and assigns, forever." This 40-foot strip of land is described as a tract of land 40 feet wide, along the bank of the river; but the east and west lines are not designated, so that it is uncertain where the west line of the strip is, unless it be placed on top of the bank of the river, which the evidence indicates is the high-water mark. The way to get at what the parties intended by this deed is "to place ourselves," as Mr. Justice SANDERSON said, "in the seats which were occupied by the parties at the time the instrument was executed, then, taking it by the four corners, read it." Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 487. This rule requires a consideration of all the provisions of the deed, as well as the situation of the parties, in order to ascertain their intention, and give it practical effect. The evidence indicates that the land now occupied and owned by the plaintiff and the defendant Leverich was once owned in common by the defendant Leverich and Stumberg, and that they agreed to divide the same, and that a surveyor was employed to divide the land equally as to the number of acres, but that, after the land was surveyed and platted, the south half was considered more valuable than the north half, so that it was agreed that the defendant Leverich should take the south half, and Stumberg the north half, and that the defendant pay Stumberg $125, and give him a deed for a road or a right of way over the south half, along the bank of the Willamette river, and that pursuant to this arrangement, deeds were made, one of which is the deed in evidence from the defendant and wife to Stumberg for a road or a right of way along the bank of said river; that afterwards Stumberg sold the north half to the plaintiff, and thereafter made the deed in evidence to the plaintiff for the strip of land in controversy, for the purposes specified; that, soon after Stumberg and the defendant had effected their deal as to the lands held in common by them, the defendant began improving his river front, and erected a wood-dock and steam-boat landing. It appears also at the time the plaintiff obtained his deed from Stumberg for the north half of said land, and at the time, and long before, he obtained his deed from him for the strip of land in controversy, for the purposes of a road or right of way, that the defendant had made the improvement referred to, and was using the same for the purpose of selling and delivering wood, and shipping grain, and other farm products, by boats on the Willamette river. The evidence, too, discloses that he used such right of way before he obtained the deed from Stumberg to the strip, and that he used the warehouse built by the defendant for the purposes specified in common with others. Regarding the situation of the parties in the light of surrounding circumstances, it is plain that there was not any intention, other than for the purposes of a right of way, to convey the strip of land in dispute in fee, either to Stumberg, or by Stumberg to the plaintiff. The whole arrangement, all the acts of the parties at the time and subsequent, in dealing and using such strip of land, is only consistent with the purpose. It shows moreover that their mutual convenience, the business in which the defendant was engaged, and the necessity of preserving access to the river as well as the purposes to be subserved by each, was well understood, and that no more land, or for any other purpose than a right of way, was intended to be conveyed, or that the plaintiff could have understood otherwise. His own explanations and statements are only consistent with this view. More, if the strip of land be located along the bank, as the plaintiff claims, it is so steep and declivitous as to render the construction of a road nearly impossible without great expense and labor, and would, in effect, render the deed inoperative; and what is more, it would locate the road not where it is, and understood to be, but where, under the circumstances, it would seem improbable that it was ever intended to be located. But, looking at the deed in view of the situation of these parties, and in the light of the surrounding circumstances and the subject-matter in regard to which the description applies, the intention is plain. It locates the west line on top of the bank, and then goes east for the other line 40 feet, and establishes the right of way where it now is, and has been used. It makes the terms used in the description, which of themselves are not clear, intelligible, and consistent with the rest of the deed. And, where such uncertainty exists in a description, it is competent to show the practical construction which the parties gave to the description of the strip of land in question by their acts, and their treatment of the property, in order to show what was the true line intended to be established by them; so that, if we consider the provisions of the deed in connection with the circumstances of the transaction, and the situation of the parties, and the subject-matter to which they are to be applied, it gives a definite sense and meaning to the language used in the deed, makes it consistent and operative for the purpose specified, and indicates plainly what the parties intended and meant. In this view, it results that the decree must be affirmed.

CONKLING v. PACIFIC IMP. CO. (No. 13,872.)

RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DIVERSION OF WATER—IN-JUNCTION.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1923, which makes a certificate of purchase of lands, issued under the laws of the United States, primary evidence of title in the holder, a receipt for the purchase money, issued by the receiver of a United States land-office to an occupant of public lands bordering on a stream, is sufficient prima facie evidence of title in the latter to enable him to maintain an action to enjoin an upper riparian proprietor from unlawfully diverting the waters of the stream; and his complaint, which alleges the issuance to him of the receiver's receipt, is not demurrable for its failure to allege that the land is subject to pre-emption, or that plaintiff is a qualified pre-emptor.

2. A grant of the right to divert the waters of a stream, made by a pre-emptor of public lands bordering thereon, is rendered worthless by the latter's abandonment of his claim before procuring a receiver's receipt for the land.

3. The fact that the grantor of the water-right was induced to abandon his claim by the payment of money from plaintiff, and that the latter thereupon entered on the land, does not make his entry fraudulent or illegal as against the grantees of the water-right.

4. The fact that the amended complaint prayed only for an injunction against defendant's threatened diversion of the water, and that at the time of its filing defendant had already begun to do so, will not prevent the issuance of an injunction against the continued wrongful diversion.

5. Where the diversion of the water is wrongful, it is not necessary for plaintiff to prove damages to entitle him to an injunction.

6. Where defendant has a right to divert the water to the full capacity of a  $1\frac{1}{2}$ -inch pipe, he is not injured by an injunction restraining him from using a 6-inch pipe if the  $1\frac{1}{2}$ -inch pipe takes all the water of the stream.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

A. B. Hotchkiss, for appellant. W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by the respondent against the appellant to enjoin the latter from diverting water from a certain natural stream in the county of Santa Barbara. The defendant owned two tracts of land on the stream. Between these two tracts the plaintiff was in possession of a tract of land, claiming the same as a pre-emptor from the government, and for which he held a receiver's receipt. The court below found for the plaintiff, and enjoined the defendant from diverting and using the water as prayed for in the complaint. No motion for a new trial was made, but the bill of exceptions was filed within 60 days, and specifications are made and errors of law assigned therein. Counsel for appellant makes numerous points in his brief, which we will attempt to notice in their order.

The first point made is that the court below erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint. The objection made to the complaint is that it does not show that the plaintiff was, at the time the action was brought, or at the time the water was diverted from the stream, the owner of the land, or that the land was subject to pre-emption, or that he was a qualified pre-emptor. The allegations of the complaint, so far as it affects this question, are as follows: "That the plaintiff is and was on the 1st day of October, 1888, the owner of that certain tract of land situate in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California, to-wit:

* * * And he now is, and has been since the month of May, 1887, in the actual possession and occupancy of said land; that, in the month of May, said land was public land of the United States open to settlement, and plaintiff, who was twenty-one years old, and a citizen of the United States, did, in said month, settle upon said land, with the intention of pre-empting the same, and acquiring title thereto, and on the 19th day of May, 1887, he filed his declaratory statement in the United States land-office of the district in which said land is situated, claiming said land under the pre-emption laws, and, on the 14th day of September, 1888, he paid for said land, and received from the receiver of the said land-office his receipt for said payment." These averments are not sufficient to show a compliance with the law relating to pre-emption settlements upon and purchase of government lands. Rev. St. §§ 2259, 2264; Quinn v. Kenyon, 38 Cal. 501; Page v. Hobbs, 27 Cal. 486. But it is contended by the respondent that no allegation of facts necessary to show that the lands were subject to pre-emption, or that the respondent was a qualified pre-emptor, and took the steps necessary to acquire the title from the government, is necessary in a case of this kind; that it was enough to allege that he was the holder of the receiver's receipt, and in possession thereunder. In this contention we must hold with the respondent. This is not a case involving title to the land in which each of the parties is claiming through the government. The appellant makes no claim of title to the land, nor is it shown to be in privity with the paramount source of title, or in the position, for any reason, to question the legality of the respondent's holding, except by an affirmative showing against the prima facie case made by the receipt. In such a case, it is sufficient for the occupant of the land to allege and prove the receiver's receipt, which is prima facie evidence, in a case of this kind, that he is rightfully in possession. Code Civil Proc. § 1925; Figg v. Handley, 52 Cal. 244; Conlan v. Quinby, 51 Cal. 413. And being so in possession as a pre-emptor, and having complied with the requirements of the statute, which is shown, as we have said, by the receiver's receipt, he had become a riparian owner upon the stream, and, as such, entitled to protect himself against any unlawful diversion of the waters therefrom. Pom. Rip. Rights, §§ 35, 36. There are other objections urged to the complaint, but none of them are well taken. The demurrer to the amended complaint was properly overruled.

A demurrer was sustained to the second defense set up in the defendant's answer, and this is claimed to have been an error. It is alleged in this defense that one Bush entered upon the lands claimed by the plaintiff in this action as a pre-emptor, and filed his declaratory statement in the land-office, and that, while so in possession

<sup>1</sup> Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1925, provides that a certificate of purchase of lands, issued in pursuance of any law of the United States, is primary evidence that the holder of such certificate is the owner of the land described therein.

sion of the lands, said Bush granted to one Underhill the right to construct and maintain a pipe-line over said lands, together with the right to use and divert the waters flowing in said creek; that Underhill conveyed this right to the defendant; that defendant had entered into the occupation of said lands for its said business of water supply, had laid its pipes, at great cost and expense, in such manner as that plaintiff must have had notice of the fact; that plaintiff made his so-called "settlement" with full notice of defendant's claims, rights, appropriations, and expenditures; that Bush relinquished to the United States his claim as a pre-emptor by filing the declaration to that effect, and the lands thereby reverted to the United States, subject to the defendant's occupation for the purposes aforesaid, and were not thereafter subject to any further rights of pre-emption. It is further alleged that the plaintiff entered upon the lands not in good faith as a pre-emptor, but for the purpose of obtaining a technical advantage of defendant, and thereby compelling it to buy his claim, and secretly, and without notice to the defendant, procured the officers of the land department to issue to him a receipt for payment for said lands; that no patent had issued to the plaintiff, and the defendant had protested against the issuance of any such patent; and that the expenditures made by the plaintiff in improving the land were made in bad faith. We are unable to see anything in this pleading which can amount to a defense to the plaintiff's cause of action. It is earnestly contended by the counsel for appellant that the plaintiff obtained no rights in the water flowing through the land by entering upon the land, making payment therefor, and procuring the receiver's receipt, and yet, in support of this answer, he contends that Bush obtained such a right by merely entering upon the land and filing his declaratory statement, without making payment, or receiving a receipt; that by his deed his right passed to Underhill, and from Underhill to the defendant; and that the abandonment of his right of pre-emption by Bush not only did not defeat the defendant's right to divert the water obtained through him, but actually confirmed it, and shut off all other persons from entering upon and acquiring title to the land. The statement of such a proposition is sufficient to refute it. Bush had no right in the water to convey; but, if he had, it was lost by his subsequent abandonment of his claim, and the right, in the hands of the defendant, was no better than if it had remained in Bush. The allegations tending to show that the entry of the plaintiff was made to defraud and take advantage of the defendant add nothing to the pleading. The defendant had no rights in the land, or the water, as appurtenant to the land, and could not, therefore, be defrauded by the plaintiff's entry. There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to this defense. There was no error in refusing to strike out the amended complaint on the defendant's motion.

The appellant contends that the court

below erred in certain rulings upon the evidence. The ground of this contention seems to be that the entry of the respondent upon the land as a pre-emptor was fraudulent and invalid, because it appeared that he had bought the claim of Bush to pre-empt the land, and Bush had abandoned his claim, and the plaintiff had thereupon entered thereon. But the answer to this is that the plaintiff is not claiming under the entry of Bush, but under his own entry, after that of Bush had been abandoned. The fact that Bush had been induced to abandon his claim by the payment of money did not prevent the plaintiff from entering upon and acquiring title to the land. Bush having abandoned his claim in the manner provided by law, the land was open to entry by the plaintiff or any one else, and the entry was not fraudulent or illegal because of Bush's priority and abandonment of his claim. The same contention is made the ground of objection to the introduction of the receiver's receipt, and for the same reasons the objection was properly overruled.

It is insisted by the appellant that the findings of the court do not support the judgment, and are not sustained by the evidence. Both of the parties to this action were riparian owners on the stream, the waters of which are in controversy, and each also claimed to be prior appropriators of such waters, or a part of them. The court below found that the plaintiff was the owner of the land claimed by him; that the same was public land; that he settled upon the same as a pre-emptor, filed his declaratory statement as such, made proof and payment on September 14, 1886, obtained a receiver's duplicate receipt, has ever since occupied and cultivated the lands, and made improvements thereon to the value of $15,000; that the land lies on both sides of the natural stream known as the "Loma Abaja Creek," and, at the time the plaintiff obtained his receipt, the defendant had appropriated and was diverting a portion of the waters of said creek by means of a 1½-inch pipe, which was not of sufficient capacity to divert all of the waters of the creek, and a part thereof ran down to plaintiff's land; that, when plaintiff settled upon the land, he commenced to use the waters of the creek for domestic and other purposes, and, on the 5th day of August, 1867, he appropriated a portion of the waters of the creek, and diverted the same by means of a 2½-inch pipe, and used the same for irrigation and other purposes, and has so used the same continuously since that time; that the defendant intends to divert all of the waters of said creek from its natural channel by means of a 6-inch pipe at a point thereon above plaintiff's land to a point below the same, and deprive the plaintiff of the use thereof, and that such diversion would render plaintiff's land, and the improvements thereon, of little or no value, and will be of great and irreparable damage to him; and that neither the defendant nor its grantors or predecessors have ever occupied any part of the lands claimed by the plaintiff for any purpose. As to the de-defendant's right to divert and use the water of the stream, the court found as follows: "That, on the 13th day of August, 1887, A. S. Cooper posted a written notice at a point on said creek above plaintiff's land, claiming the water flowing in said creek to the extent of fifteen inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, which notice was within ten days duly recorded in the office of the recorder of the county of Santa Barbara. That, after the posting and recording of said notice, said Cooper conveyed all of his rights and interests in the waters of said creek to defendant. But said Cooper did not actually divert or use said water for any purpose, and his appropriation was made for the purpose of speculation only, and he did not within sixty days after the posting of his notice commence the excavation or construction of any works in which he intended to divert the water. The defendant, after Cooper's sale to it, which was more than sixty days after he posted his notice, did commence the excavation and construction of works in which he intended to divert the water. That the plaintiff did not post any notice of his intention to appropriate any of the waters of said creek, but he had actually appropriated and diverted the water as set forth in the third finding, and was using it for domestic purposes and irrigation at and before the time when said Cooper posted his appropriation notice. That, on the 13th day of March, 1885, Alexander B. Todd posted a written notice at a point on said creek above plaintiff's land, claiming the water flowing in said creek to the extent of twelve inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, which notice was duly recorded; and he stated in said notice that he intended to divert said water by means of one ten and one-half inch iron pipe, and one one and one-half inch iron pipe, and said Todd did divert water from said creek through a one and one-half inch iron pipe, which pipe is the one mentioned in the second finding. That the defendant is the successor in interest of said Todd. But no actual appropriation or diversion of any water has been made under the said Todd notice, except as to the said one and one-half inch pipe, and no steps have been taken to divert any water under said notice other than as to said pipe, and neither said Todd nor his successors in interest began or prosecuted with diligence the excavation or construction of the works in which it was intended to divert any water from said creek under said notice, except as to said one and one-half inch pipe. And the plaintiff had actually appropriated, diverted, and used the waters of the Loma Abaja creek, as set forth in the third finding, before the defendant, or its grantors, or predecessors in interest, had commenced the excavation or construction of any works in which it was intended to divert any water from said creek, other than through said one and one-half inch pipe. That the defendant is the owner of sections five and six, T. 4 N., R. 27 W., S. B. M., but the said land is below the land of plaintiff's land, and said Loma Abaja creek flows through plaintiff's land before reaching the said land of defendant." As a conclusion of law from these findings, the court found: "That the plaintiff is entitled to have the said creek flow in its natural channel down to his said land, less the portion thereof diverted by means of a one and one-half inch iron pipe, and that he is entitled to the relief prayed for in his complaint, and it is ordered that judgment be entered accordingly." The court thereupon entered judgment enjoining the defendant from diverting any of the waters of the stream, except that which might be diverted by means of the 1½-inch pipe. These findings were clearly sufficient to sustain the judgment, and after a careful examination of the record we are satisfied that the findings are supported by the evidence.

It is earnestly contended by the counsel for the appellant that the evidence fails to show that at the time the amended complaint was filed the defendant was threatened to divert the waters of the stream; but that, on the contrary, the diversion by the 6-inch pipe was complete, and for that reason injunction could not properly issue. But, conceding that the 6-inch pipe had been put in, and the diversion of the water had taken place at the time that the amended complaint was filed, or at the time the action was commenced, which was the material question, and conceding that the diversion had actually taken place, the act of carrying the water away from its natural channel, if wrongful, was a continuous act against which an injunction might issue. Moore v. Water-Works, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. Rep. 816. The continued diversion of the water was the material thing to be enjoined, and not the putting in of the pipe.

It is further insisted that the evidence fails to show that the plaintiff had been or would be damaged by the diversion of the water. We think otherwise; but, if it appeared that the diversion was wrongful, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove damages to entitle him to an injunction. Moore v. Water-Works, supra, 150.

Again, it is claimed that the plaintiff conceded the defendant's prior right to divert the waters of the stream to the capacity of its 1½-inch pipe, but averred that such pipe was not sufficient to divert all of the waters of the stream; that this averment was denied, and was not supported by the evidence. We think the evidence does show that the 1½-inch pipe would not carry all of the waters of the stream. If it would, it was at least a little remarkable that the defendant should go to the expense of putting in another and much larger pipe to divert water that was not there; and, besides, this claim is hardly consistent with the contention above noticed, that the defendant was, at the time the amended complaint was filed, actually carrying off water with this 6-inch pipe. But this, it seems to us, is not very material. The defendant was not enjoined from diverting the water to the full capacity of the 1½-inch pipe. If this left no other water to divert, the defendant was not injured by the injunction, and has no reason to complain, except it might be as to the costs.

It is contended further that the laches and acquiescence of the plaintiff, in allowing the defendant to proceed with its improvements, was sufficient to defeat his right to an injunction. But we see nothing in the evidence to support this position.

It is further insisted that the rights of the appellant could not be forfeited by a proceeding of this kind. But this is not an attempt to forfeit any right the appellant had, but to show that it never had any rights. There are other objections to the findings that need not be particularly noticed. There is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

FORD et al. v. CUNNINGHAM et al. (No. 12,044.)

Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1890.)

CONTENTS OF LETTER—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

1. One of the plaintiffs having stated that he had no personal knowledge that certain communications addressed to defendants were mailed except that copies thereof appeared in plaintiffs' copy-book, and that it was a general custom of their firm to place letters in a box in the store from which they were taken to the post-office, there was no foundation laid for the introduction of secondary evidence as to the contents.

2. If secondary evidence were admissible, the press copies would be the best evidence.

3. One of the defendants having identified their ledger showing their account with plaintiffs, and having stated that it showed the true state of the account between them, and that the items had been entered by him at the time of the several transactions, and it being admitted by plaintiffs that the entries were original entries, it was error to exclude it though it did not contain the item sued for by plaintiffs.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCANN, Judge.

J. M. Lesser, Spalsbury & Burke, and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for appellants. A. S. Kittridge, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The only question litigated in the court below was whether the barley was sold by the plaintiffs to the defendant Cunningham, or to the firm of Cunningham & Co., of which he was a member. The appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, but we think there was sufficient evidence on behalf of the defendants to create a substantial conflict, and under the well-established rule we should not interfere with the findings of fact.

The plaintiffs, to establish their case against the copartnership, relied mainly on documentary evidence, some of which they claimed was in possession of the defendants, who were asked at the trial to produce the same. Mr. Morey, one of the plaintiffs, was permitted by the court to state the contents of certain bills and letters which he claimed had been addressed and sent to Cunningham & Co. Objection was made by the defendants to the introduction of oral testimony as to the contents of the bills and letters, and the objection was overruled. We think the court erred in its ruling. The witness stated that he had no personal knowledge that the communications addressed to Cunningham & Co. were mailed, except that copies thereof appeared in the plaintiffs' copy-book, and that it was a general custom of his firm to place letters in a box in the store, from which they were taken to the post-office. No foundation, therefore, was laid for the introduction of the evidence. Assuming that secondary evidence could under such circumstances be introduced, the press copies were the best evidence next to the originals themselves. The ruling was on a material matter, because the defendants testified that they never received the communications referred to. Brallsford v. Williams, 74 Amer. Dec. 562.

Mr. Middleton, one of the defendants, was called as a witness, and identified the ledger of the copartnership, showing the account of Ford & Co. with Cunningham & Co. from September 1, 1884, to the date of trial. It was admitted by the plaintiffs that the entries therein were original entries, but they objected to the introduction of the same as evidence on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. The objection was sustained by the court, to which ruling the defendants excepted. There was no item of barley in the account offered. The ruling, we think, was error. The witness had stated that the ledger showed the true state of account between plaintiffs and defendants, and that the items had been entered by him at the time of the several transactions therein mentioned. Landis v. Turner, 14 Cal. 573. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

KAHN v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 11,765.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—MANDAMUS.

1. Act Cal. April 1, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 911,) passed to establish a street in San Francisco, provided (section 5) that, on petition to the mayor by the owners of a majority in frontage of the property described in such act, "as said owners are or shall be named in the last preceding annual assessment roll for the state, city, and county taxes," for the opening of said street, the board constituted by the act to carry it into effect should proceed. Held, that the signatures to the petition of persons other than those to whom the property was assessed on the last preceding assessment roll could not be counted in order to make up the owners of a majority of the frontage.

2. Nor could the signatures of executors, administrators, and agents be counted, in the absence of evidence of their authority to sign the petition.

3. Nor could the signature of a homestead and railroad corporation, made by its president and secretary, be counted, in the absence of evidence that such officers were authorized to affix the signature, or that that duty appertained to their offices.

4. On application, by a holder of bonds issued for improvements made under the act, for mandamus to compel the city to levy a tax for the payment of the bonds, the facts that, on presentation of the petition to the mayor, he certified that it was signed by the requisite property owners, and that the county court affirmed the report of the board of the proceedings taken by it under the petition, do not esop the city to deny the sufficiency of the petition.

PER CURIAM. The questions arising herein (which is a motion for a new trial by Kahn) have been fully considered and passed on in this case, the opinion in which will be found in 79 Cal. 392, 21 Pac. Rep. 849. Conceding that the signature of the North San Francisco Homestead & Railroad Association, by its president and secretary, was authorized by the proper corporate authority, the petition would still fail of having the majority required. We see no reason to disturb the rulings formerly made in this case. The motion for a new trial is denied.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—GIFTS—WHO MAY SET ASIDE.

1. The transfer of a debt by a creditor to a third person, to whom the debtor afterwards makes a part payment, and executes a note for the balance, constitutes the transferee the "successor in interest" of the creditor, within the meaning of Civil Code Cal. § 8439, which renders all conveyances by a debtor, made with the intent of defrauding any creditor, void as against all creditors and their "successors in interest."

2. A gift of land by a father to his son is not void as against creditors of the father, unless the latter had not, at the time of the gift, sufficient property subject to execution to satisfy his debts.

3. The return of an execution nulla bona five years after the making of the gift is not sufficient to establish the father's insolvency when the gift was made.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

F. J. Castlehun, for appellant. H. H. Lowenthal, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This was a suit by a judgment creditor to have declared fraudulent and void certain transfers of real property by the defendant Adam Bootz to his wife and children. The trial court gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals.

The court found that there was no fraudulent intent, and that the grantor was solvent and able to pay his debts at the time the deeds were made. Whether this finding was sustained by the evidence or not is the only question necessary to examine.

It was admitted at the trial that the deeds were deeds of gift; and the evidence shows, without conflict, that at the time of their execution the donor was indebted to one Severin in the sum of $1,000. Subsequently Severin became in need of money, and borrowed $1,000 from the plaintiff, and it was agreed between the parties that the indebtedness of the donor to Severin should be transferred to the plaintiff, and that due from Severin to the plaintiff

should be released. This was done, but, instead of the old note being transferred to the plaintiff, the donor made a payment to her of $200, and gave a new note for the balance, viz., $800. The form of the indebtedness was changed, and the amount was reduced, but, in substance, it was a continuation of the old debt; and, in our opinion, the plaintiff was "the successor in interest" of an existing creditor within the meaning of section 3439 of the Civil Code. The question of intent was one of fact, (Civil Code, §§ 1227, 3442,) and the burden of proving the fraudulent intent rested upon the plaintiff. The right of a creditor to go upon property conveyed by his debtor to a third party rests upon two foundations, viz., that the conveyance was fraudulent, and that the grantor had no other property at the time suit is brought, subject to execution, out of which his debt can be made. Proof that the debtor made the conveyance without consideration, that he was then indebted, and that he had no other property at the time of the conveyance, subject to execution, to satisfy such indebtedness, would be sufficient prima facie to establish the fact that the conveyance was fraudulent as against creditors. If the debtor had other property at the time of the conveyance, sufficient to satisfy his debts, the fraud would not be made out unless there was other evidence. If the debtor has other property at the time suit is brought, sufficient to satisfy his debts, his creditors are not injured, no matter what the original intention in making the conveyance may have been; and the creditor, not being injured, has no cause of action, and no right to subject property in the hands of a third party to the payment of his debt. It would seem to be unnecessary to cite authorities to sustain so plain a proposition, but we refer to Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 632, 22 Pac. Rep. 404, in which this court said: "Where a creditor attacks a transfer of property made by his debtor on the ground that such transfer was made to defraud, hinder, or delay creditors, facts must be alleged showing that the conveyance was made in such manner and under such circumstances as to have that effect. Therefore, it must appear that, at the time the conveyance was made, the debtor had no other property subject to execution out of which his debts could be satisfied. Evans v. Hamilton, 56 Ind. 34; Deutsch v. Korsmeyer, 59 Ind. 373; Pfeifer v. Snyder, 72 Ind. 78. This allegation is necessary to show that the conveyance was in fact fraudulent as against the creditors. If the debtor has other property, subject to execution, sufficient to satisfy his indebtedness, the conveyance cannot amount to a fraud on his creditors; and, where the attempt is made to set aside a conveyance on such grounds, it must appear from the complaint that, at the time the action is commenced, the debtor had no other property sufficient to satisfy his debts. Braker v. Kelsey, 72 Ind. 51; Sherman v. Hogland, 54 Ind. 578. This is for the reason that the conveyance, although made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, is valid as between the parties, and cannot be set aside, unless it appears to be necessary for the protection of the creditor, and no such necessity exists if, at the time he commences his action, there is other property of the debtor out of which his debt can be made."

The complaint in the case at bar contained these necessary allegations, and was sufficient. But there was no evidence even tending to show that, at the time the conveyances were made, the grantor was not possessed of other property amply sufficient to satisfy his debts. The declarations of the grantor, relied upon by the appellant as establishing the fact, do not relate to the time of the conveyance. An execution was issued and returned nulla bona, but this was several years after the conveyances were made; and, while this was sufficient prima facie to prove his insolvency at that time, it could not be held to establish the fact that he had no property nearly five years before. Judgment and order affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Respondent's petition for a rehearing is denied. A re-examination of the record has not only confirmed us in the opinion that our decision was correct as to the ground upon which the judgment and order appealed from were reversed, but has satisfied us that we erred in sustaining the ruling of the superior court last noticed in the opinion of Commissioner FOOTE. Mrs. Mandeville's testimony, in regard to statements of Speegle, to the effect that plaintiff was his confederate in the proposed larceny of Polk's cattle, was clearly incompetent as hearsay, and not within the rule of People v. Collins, 64 Cal. 295. The decision in that case was merely that, after competent evidence of a conspiracy to commit a crime, the declaration of one conspirator accompanying an act done in furtherance of the common design, while the conspiracy is ripe, is competent evidence against his confederate. This is no doubt correct, but it is not the law that a conspiracy between A. and B. can be proved as to either by the declarations of the other, as was allowed in this case, and our decision sustaining the ruling of the superior court on this point should not become the law of this case, or a precedent for others.

APPEAL—SATISFACTION OF JUDGMENT.

Where one has taken payment in full satisfaction of a judgment, he cannot thereafter appeal from the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Correy, Judge.

Galpin & Zeigler, for appellants. Pillsbury & Blanding and Page & Eells, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal herein on two grounds, viz.: (1) The judgment was satisfied by the appellants before the appeal was taken. (2) Notice of appeal was not served on Gibbs, one of the distributees. The decree of distribution was entered March 24, 1890, and the notice of appeal was served May 12, 1890. On the 11th day of April, 1890, there were filed in the court below two receipts, signed by the appellants, in which they respectively acknowledged that they had received from the administrator certain sums of money and personal property in full of the distributive shares of the said estate allotted to them in and by the decree of distribution therein entered March 14, 1890. When a judgment has been satisfied, it has passed beyond review, for the satisfaction thereof is the last act and end of the proceeding. Morton v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 496, 4 Pac. Rep. 489; People v. Burns, 78 Cal. 645, 21 Pac. Rep. 540. Judgm.* § 466; Moore v. Floyd, 4 Or. 260; Cassell v. Fagin, 11 Mo. 208. We are unable to say from the record that the rights of Gibbs would not be affected by a reversal of the decree, and, in view of what has been said upon the first ground of the motion, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the question whether it was necessary that he should be served with a notice of appeal. The motion to dismiss is granted.

SCOTT v. GLENN. (No. 13,973.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—ACTION TO RECOVER PRICE PAID.

Plaintiff sued to recover $600, had and received for his benefit. It appeared that the money was paid by himself and others to defendant and another by virtue of the following paper: "Received of * * * $600, one third of purchase price of lots, * * * leaving a balance due on said purchase, which by the terms of this sale is to be paid in two equal payments. * * * If paid as above stated," the vendees "will be entitled to a deed of the above-described lots, and otherwise this agreement becomes void, and all payments made hereon shall be forfeited." Defendant signed his name and that of his co-vendor, but the latter afterwards ratified it. The vendors had good title and tendered a deed. Defendant's co-vendor assigned his right to defendant, and the co-vendees, their rights to plaintiff. Held, that there was no right of recovery.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment against him for $600, and from an order denying a new trial. The complaint merely avers that on April 4, 1888, defendant was indebted to plaintiff and certain other named persons in the sum of $600, for money had and received for the use and benefit of said persons; that the others assigned said indebtedness to plaintiff; and that no part of the same has been paid. The answer specifically denies all the averments of the complaint. There is also a cross-complaint in which defendant avers that on said April 4, 1888, he and one Meux, being the owners of certain described lots of land, contracted in writing with plaintiff and certain other persons to sell them the said lands for $1,800, $600 in cash, and the balance in two equal payments, in 6 and 12 months; that the $600 sued for was the first cash payment on said contract; that plaintiff and said other persons went into possession of the land under said contract; that, when the other payments became due, defendant and said Meux demanded payment, and tendered a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of said land, but that plaintiff and said other persons refused to pay or to accept the deed; and that said Meux assigned all his right to defendant. The prayer of the cross-complaint is that he recover judgment against plaintiff and said other parties for said deferred payments, and for the enforcement of a lien on said land. The answer of the plaintiff, Scott, and others to the cross-complaint first denies, in terms, that there was any such contract in writing, but it admits that there was such a verbal contract, that the $600 was paid thereon, and that "then and there" the said Glenn and Meux executed, in writing, a receipt and memorandum of said contract in words and figures as follows: "Received of Scott, Cutten, [and others named] six hundred dollars, one-third of purchase price of lots Nos. * * * leaving a balance due on said purchase, which, by the terms of this sale, is to be paid in two equal payments, together with interest, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, on the whole of said unpaid purchase price, at the maturity of each installment, till paid, in like coin, within six and twelve months from date hereof. If paid as above stated, the above-named Scott, Cutten, * * * will be entitled to a deed of the above-described lots; otherwise, this agreement becomes void, and all payments made hereon shall be forfeited. [Signed] J. T. MEUX & G. R. G. GLENN." The answer denies that they went into possession. It does not contain any sufficient denial of the tender of a deed as averred in the cross-complaint. Neither does it aver that Glenn and Meux had no title, or could not make a valid conveyance of the lots; the only averment on that subject being that "at no time have the said Meux and Glenn shown to defendants, or either of them, that they, the said Meux and Glenn, had good title to said lots." In an amendment to the answer they aver that Meux did not actually sign the above memorandum, but that Glenn signed his own name and also that of Meux without written authority from the latter to do so. The only findings of fact are (1) "that all the allegations and averments of the plaintiff's complaint are true, and the allegations and denials of the defendant's answer are untrue;" and (2) that the contract mentioned in the cross-complaint "if any such was made," was not reduced to writing and signed by the defendants to said cross-complaint, or by either of them, and that they did not take possession of the land.

Waiving the question as to what right the defendant may have for affirmative relief, we cannot see how the first finding is justified by the evidence, or upon what theory the judgment in favor of plaintiff for the $600 can be maintained. The evidence shows that the money was paid in accordance with the written instrument set forth in full in the answer to the cross-complaint. Indeed, the only evidence introduced by plaintiff at the trial was that instrument, and proof by a witness that the $600 was paid "under and by virtue of that paper." He then rested, and defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was denied. Meux then testified for defendant that, while he did not sign his name to the instrument, it was signed by his agent, and that he ratified it, and joined afterwards in executing and tendering a deed in compliance with it. Defendant's evidence also showed that Meux and Glenn owned the land and could have given a perfect title; that plaintiff and his assignors made no objection to the title, or to the contract, when the deferred payments became due, but merely asked further time in which to pay, and were granted such time, until finally they concluded to repudiate the entire contract. How can it be said, therefore, that "all the allegations and averment of the plaintiff's complaint are true,"—that is, that "on the 4th day of April, 1888, said defendant was indebted to" plaintiff and his assignors in the sum of $600, gold coin of the United States, for money had and received by said defendant upon said 4th of April, 1888, for the use and benefit and on account of said plaintiff and his assignors? The plaintiff introduces in evidence a certain written instrument, which he is shown to have received and accepted, and proves that the money sued for was paid "under and by virtue of that paper." But that instrument shows that plaintiff paid the money upon the express understanding and condition that it was not to be returned to him; that it was money "had and received by defendant for the use and benefit of himself," and not for use and benefit of plaintiff or his assignors. There was no necessity for the vendees to sign the written memorandum. Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458. Moreover, they did sign it by indorsing on it an assignment to plaintiff. The court does not find whether or not Meux signed the contract or was a party to it; but the evidence clearly shows that he ratified it as soon as his co-vendor informed him of it, and soon afterwards, when he came to Fresno, "again ratified the sale between the parties, and talked with the purchasers about it." Again, when the deferred payments became due, he asked the vendees for the money, and they, making no objection of any kind, simply asked for some delay until they could make arrangements to pay. They proposed at one time to give a mortgage, and then concluded not to do so. And finally Meux united with Glenn in executing and tendering a deed. This was a complete ratification; and he would have been estopped from making a defense for himself, which plaintiff seeks to suggest for him. Moreover, so far as plaintiff's alleged cause of action for the $600 paid by him is concerned, he is endeavoring to undermine an executed contract; while the principle which he invokes applies to actions for the enforcement of executory contracts. We see no grounds upon which the judgment in his favor can rest. The nonsuit should have been granted. It is not necessary to discuss the defendant's claim for affirmative relief for the findings on that subject are clearly insufficient. The judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WINTER et al. v. McMILLAN. (No. 12,340.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1890.)

NOTICE OF APPEAL—QUIETING TITLE—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

1. An appeal from a judgment by several parties, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial by one of the parties, may be taken by one notice.

2. In an action to quiet title, there is no error in excluding plaintiff's evidence that his grantor had declared a homestead on the property, though defendant claims title through an execution sale under a judgment against said grantor.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 442, providing that, whenever defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint, there was no error in allowing defendant, in an action to quiet title, to file a cross-complaint alleging that the property was conveyed to plaintiff merely to secure him against liability on a bond, but that no liability was incurred by plaintiff; that the grantor was still in possession, and claimed some interest; and that defendant had title through an execution sale on a judgment against said grantor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

R. Percy Wright, for appellants. W. R. Tyler, (D. H. Whittemore, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought against the defendant, McMillan, to quiet the title of the plaintiffs Winter and Wright to a lot of land in San Francisco. The defendant answered, denying that the plaintiffs were the owners of or had any interest in the land, and at the same time filed a cross-complaint, which alleges, in substance, that plaintiffs never had any interest in the property, except the naked legal title which was conveyed to them by Louis and Louise Helbing, on June 3, 1881, without consideration, and with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said grantors; that G. Henninger and wife recovered judgment against the said Louis Helbing for the sum of $3,500, and costs, November 11, 1881, in an action for damages, commenced April 30, 1881; that, thereafter, the property in controversy was sold to defendant on execution issued on said judgment, and in due time the sheriff executed and delivered to him a deed therefor; that the deed of the Helbings to plaintiffs was given to secure the latter against any damages they might sustain by reason of their becoming sureties on a penal bond given by said Louis Helbing, but no liability was incurred by plaintiffs on said bond; that the title still stands on the records in the name of the plaintiffs, but the said Helbings have continued to hold, and are now in possession of, the land, claiming some interest therein; that the controversy as to the title to the land cannot be settled without having the said Helbings before the court; that defendant is the owner of the property, and entitled to the possession of the same. The prayer of the cross-complaint is that the Helbings may be brought in by summons, and required to show what right, if any, they have to the property, and for a judgment that neither plaintiffs nor the Helbings have any right, title, or interest in or to the land in controversy. By order of the court, a summons was issued and served on the Helbings, but it seems that they made no appearance. The plaintiffs filed a demurrer, which was overruled. They then filed an answer denying all the allegations of the cross-complaint, and alleging that Louis Helbing had never had any right, title, or interest in the property, except such as he derived from a claim of homestead, which interest was exempt from execution and forced sale. The court found that plaintiffs were not the owners of or entitled to the possession of the property; that the Helbings were the owners of the property on June 3, 1881, when they deeded the same to plaintiffs simply to secure them against any liability as sureties, and that no liability had been incurred on the bond; that defendant purchased the property at execution sale, as alleged by him, and is the owner thereof. Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. Thereupon the Helbings united with the plaintiffs in a notice of appeal from the judgment, which notice included also a notice of appeal by the plaintiffs from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appellants could not properly unite in two separate and distinct appeals in one notice, and in one undertaking. An appeal from a judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, may be taken by one notice. The notice states who are appellants, and what they respectively appeal from. This is sufficient. The clerk certifies that "sufficient undertakings on appeal in due form were properly filed." There is nothing to contradict the fact stated. The motion to dismiss is denied.

It does not clearly appear what is the basis of plaintiffs' claim of title. They did not trace it back to any paramount source. The burden of showing title in themselves rested upon the plaintiffs, and they failed to make out a case. They showed that on November 10, 1879, Beta Gade gave Louis Helbing a power of attorney authorizing him to sell her real estate, and that on June 15, 1880, A. Hensler and his wife, Mary, made a quitclaim deed of the property to Beta, who was a sister of Mrs. Helbing. What connection, if any, Mary had with the title does not appear, except that she had employed Helbing to put buildings on the land in February, 1878, and the only evidence that Beta ever owned or had possession of the property is that "she walked over it," and "looked at it." Both Beta and Mary were in San Francisco at the time of the trial in the court below, but neither was called as a witness. On June 28, 1880, Louis Helbing, acting as attorney in fact for Beta Gade, for a nominal consideration sold and conveyed the property to himself and wife. On June 3, 1881, Beta and her husband made and delivered to plaintiff a deed of the property, which was absolute in form, and on the same day Helbing and wife executed to plaintiffs a similar instrument. A few days later, plaintiffs and the Helbings exchanged documents, acknowledging that plaintiffs held the property in trust for two purposes, viz., "to secure them against any loss which they might sustain by reason of their having become sureties on the bond above referred to, and to secure to plaintiff Wright payment for professional services which he had rendered, and should thereafter render, in certain proceedings. Plaintiff Wright did not prove what, if any, fees were due to him for services rendered. One of the bonds has been exonerated, and it does not appear that any liability has accrued on the other. The basis of the defendant's claim of title is quite as uncertain as the plaintiffs.' The judgment under which he purchased the property at execution sale, on June 9, 1884, was entered November 11, 1881. Under that purchase, he took whatever right, title, and interest the Helbings had in the property at the date of the judgment. Helbing's deed of July 28, 1880, to himself and wife, is void. The power of attorney did not authorize him to give away the property, or to convey it to himself for a nominal consideration. His act was a fraud on the principal, and the conveyance is a nullity. Section 2306, Civil Code; Dupont v. Wertheman, 10 Cal. 368; Randall v. Duff, 79 Cal. 115, 19 Pac. Rep. 532, and 21 Pac. Rep. 610. It is true the evidence tends to show that Helbing was the real owner of the property, and that the conveyances were made to mislead somebody, probably creditors. He received but a few hundred dollars for two three-story houses. Soon after the houses were built, the Helbings went into possession of the property, and have ever since occupied the same. The plaintiffs promised to reconvey to the Helbings, not to Beta. The Helbings then filed a homestead declaration on the property. They were heavily in debt. There are many circumstances connected with the transaction, tending to show an attempt on the part of all parties to conceal the identity of the real owner. But the defendant himself offered a lease from Beta Gade to Mary Hensler, dated March 1, 1878, by the terms of which the premises were leased to the latter for a term of five years. He also offered in evidence the power of attorney from Beta Gade to Helbing, and the deed executed by the latter to himself and wife, insisting that the latter was not void. The defendant could not thus affirm title in Beta Gade, in support of his own title, and deny it in answer to plaintiffs' claim of title under the same source. He could not do so consistently at least. If Beta was the owner of the property, the title passed to the plaintiffs herein by her deed of June 3, 1881, several months prior to the entry of the judgment against the Helbings. But, as stated before, it is impossible to tell from the evidence offered by the respective parties what is the basis of the claim of either. The most that plaintiffs can claim, under the evidence introduced by them, is a lien for the value of services rendered by the plaintiff Wright, and for any liability which may have accrued on the bond which has not been exonerated. If Helbing was the beneficial owner at the time defendant purchased at execution sale, the latter took all his right, title, and interest, and is entitled to have the same adjudged to him. To do this it will be necessary for the defendant to amend his cross-complaint, so as to state the facts more fully,—as fully as they are required in a bill in equity. Kreichbaum v. Melton, 49 Cal. 50; Brodrick v. Brodrick, 56 Cal. 563.

Plaintiffs offered to prove that Mrs. Helbing had declared a homestead on the property June 29, 1880, but the evidence was excluded. We do not think the court erred in its ruling. The fact that the Helbings claimed a homestead could not aid the plaintiffs as against the defendant. The Helbings had, by their failure to answer defendant's cross-complaint, waived, as against the defendant, any claim under the homestead declaration, and their conveyance to the plaintiffs did not give to the latter any homestead right in the property.

Appellants contend that the demurrer to the cross-complaint ought to have been sustained; that a cross-complaint is improper in actions of this kind. In support of this contention, they cite Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 8. All that case decides is that where the relief demanded by defendant can be had upon the denials and averments of his answer, a cross-complaint is unnecessary. But there may be cases in which full relief cannot be given the defendant upon answer, and, as in ejectment, a cross-complaint in such cases is recognized as a proper pleading, so that the whole controversy may be settled in one action; so, here, we see no objection to a cross-complaint upon the allegations of which, supported by proof, the defendant may take from plaintiff that which he would recover in equity, viz., the legal title. Section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates, he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time, or by permission of the court subsequently, a cross-complaint. The cross-complaint must be served upon the parties affected thereby, and such parties may demur or answer thereto as to the original complaint." Here, the affirmative relief which the defendant is seeking certainly affects the property to which the action relates, and we think that the cross-complaint was a proper pleading. The plaintiffs claim the whole title. They could not maintain the action by showing simply a lien without possession, or right of possession. But, if the court denied their prayer because they showed at most only a lien, the validity of the lien could be determined in another action. Why not allow the defendant, upon proper averments in his cross-complaint, to test in this action the validity of the lien claimed by plaintiffs? In other states, it is held that cross-complaints in these actions are proper pleadings. Ludlow v. Ludlow, 109 Ind. 199, 9 N. E. Rep. 769, and cases cited; Venable v. Dutch, 37 Kan. 515, 15 Pac. Rep. 520; Allen v. Tritch, 5 Colo. 228; Greenwalt v. Duncan, 16 Fed. Rep. 612. But it is claimed that, if it be conceded that a cross-complaint is a proper pleading in actions of this nature, new parties cannot be brought in by it. Whether this could be done under the old chancery practice is a question upon which the authorities are not agreed; but our Code system is much broader and more liberal in this regard. The defendant is not, under our practice, confined in his cross-complaint to matters charged in the complaint. Thus in ejectment, as stated before, he may plead matters purely equitable, and secure equitable relief. Besides this, our statute provides that, "when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had, without the presence of other parties, the court must order them brought in." Code Civil Proc. § 389. A complete determination of this controversy, if the allegations of the defendant and the findings of the court are correct, could not be had without making the Helbings parties. The plaintiffs appeared to be, and claimed to be, the owners in fee. The Helbings were in possession. The defendant was entitled to the possession if the Helbings owned the property when the judgment was entered. A trial between the plaintiffs and defendant would have settled only half of the controversy, and it would have become the duty of the court, we think, when the facts appeared in evidence, to order the Helbings brought in as parties to the action. O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 443, 16 Pac. Rep. 236. In other states it is held that in a proper case third parties may be brought in to answer the defendant's cross-complaint. Allen v. Tritch, supra; Bunce v. Bunce, 59 Iowa, 534, 13 N. W. Rep. 705. Appellants rely upon the case of Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 618, 11 Pac. Rep. 456. In that case there was no necessity for a cross-complaint. The claim was for damages, purely a counter-claim, in which case, of course, the demand "must be one existing in favor of defendant, and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action." Code Civil Proc. § 438. In this case a cross-complaint is proper to determine the question as to the validity of plaintiffs' lien. If the obligations of the bond have ceased, and no money is due Wright for professional services, the defendant is entitled to have those facts determined, and to receive whatever affirmative relief he may prove himself, inequity, entitled to. If the Helbings claim a homestead upon the property, it is proper that they should be given an opportunity to present the same, so that the rights of all parties interested, or claiming an interest, may be settled in one suit. The record shows that the summons issued on the cross-complaint was duly served on the Helbings, but is silent as to whether any appearance was made by them. We presume, of course, that no answer was filed; but, if they failed to appear and demur or answer within the time allowed by law, their default therefore ought to have been entered, and a memorandum of such default indorsed on the cross-complaint. Id. § 670. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, with directions to the court below to permit the parties to amend their pleadings in any respect consistent with the nature of the action.

BOWMAN v. MOORE. (No. 13,251.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE — CHANGE OF BENEFICIARY.

1. A provision in a certificate of membership in a mutual benefit association, empowering the member to change the beneficiary by "writing filed with the association," is substantially complied with by the member's written request, filed with the association, to substitute his executors, named in a will of a designated date, for the beneficiary named in the certificate, and an indorsement by the secretary on the certificate making the change.

2. The fact that the executors were not named in the request does not render the substitution invalid, as they can be identified by the will to which the member referred in his request for the change.

3. The fact that the substitution indorsed on the certificate was made by the secretary of the association, in compliance with the written request of the member, does not render the substitution invalid, as the member had the right to employ an agent to make the change if he so desired.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; JOHN REYNOLDS, Judge.

D. W. Herrington, for appellant. J. H. Campbell, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Joseph Bowman became on the 13th day of June, 1885, a member of the California Life & Accident Association, a corporation and mutual benefit association, and there was issued to him a certificate of membership therein, numbered 893. This certificate purported to be an insurance on his life for $5,000, payable after his death to the plaintiff, Jennie Bowman, his wife, "unless," as provided in the certificate, "said member shall, in writing filed with this association, substitute some other beneficiary, in which case said amount shall be paid to said substituted beneficiary." On June 4, 1886, Joseph Bowman executed his last will, naming therein the defendants as executors thereof. In this will he inserted the following provision: "Thirdly. I direct that my executors hereinafter named shall, as soon after my death as possible, collect the amount due on a certain policy, issued by the California Life and Accident Association, said policy numbered 893, made payable to Jennie Bowman, bearing date June 13, (thirteenth,) 1885, said policy to be transferred for the purposes hereinafter expressed, viz., in full payment of all my debts owing at the time of my death, or in part payment of the same if my debts exceed the amount of said policy, to-wit, $5,000." After the execution of his will, Joseph Bowman filed with the secretary of the association this writing: "Gilroy, June 4, 1886. Secretary Cala. Life and Acc't Ass'n, San Francisco—Dear Sir: Enclosed herewith I hand you my cert. of insurance in your company. Please do favor to change the beneficiary from the name now embraced in the said certificate, to the executors named in my will, which bears even date herewith, viz., June 4, 1886, and for the purposes therein expressed. Thus oblige, JOSEPH BOWMAN. Return policy to Geo. T. Dunlap, Gilroy, Cal." Indorsed on this direction on file in said secretary's office are the following words and figures: "Change made June 9, 1886," and upon the certificate of membership, partly in print and partly in writing, is indorsed the following: "The beneficiary under this certificate of membership, pursuant to the rules of this association, is hereby changed from Jennie Bowman, wife of the person named in the within certificate, to the executors named in his will, which bears date of June 4, 1886, or their legal representatives, said change being made at the written request of Joseph Bowman, dated Gilroy, June 4, 1886. W. H. PERRIS, Secretary. San Francisco, June 9, 1886." Joseph Bowman died at the county of Santa Clara, on the 29th of August, 1886, leaving the plaintiff his widow. After Bowman's death his will was duly admitted to probate, and the defendants, S. T. Moore and Theodore Bowman, were regularly appointed and qualified as executors thereof, and since the 9th of October, 1886, they have administered on the estate of their testator. In due time the money due on the certificate, to the amount of $2,000, was paid by the association on the joint receipt of the plaintiff and defendants, the defendants signing the receipt as executors. The joint receipt was demanded by the association before it would pay. This money passed into the hands of defendants, who claimed the same as the substituted beneficiary in virtue of the written direction of a change of beneficiary made by their testator, Joseph Bowman. This payment was indorsed on the certificate No. 893. Subsequently the plaintiff notified in writing the executors of Joseph Bowman that she would not accept the terms of the will of her deceased husband, and demanded of them the payment to her of the $2,000 above mentioned, claiming to be the beneficiary of the policy on which the money was paid to them. This demand was refused, and plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover the money paid them. The court rendered judgment in favor of defendants. Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The above are the facts found by the court below, on which this appeal is to be determined. The contention is here made on behalf of plaintiff that the judgment is not sustained by the findings of fact, and that judgment should be entered in her favor. It is argued that the provision made in certificate No. 893 for "Jennie Bowman, wife," is a trust, subject to be defeated under the power reserved in these words, "unless said member [Joseph Bowman] shall, in writing filed with said association, substitute some other beneficiary, in which case said amount shall be paid to said substituted beneficiary." Let it be conceded that, by the provisions contained in the certificate or policy, a trust was created for the benefit of the wife, still the trust, as is conceded, can be defeated by substituting another beneficiary. Jennie Bowman's right was contingent. If the change was regularly done, the right of the first-named beneficiary is at an end. Was the substitution here made in accordance with the provisions of the certificate? That is the question to be determined. Joseph Bowman was authorized, by the terms of the certificate as above stated, to substitute another beneficiary by writing filed with the association. This, in our judgment, he did do. The writing to that effect was communicated to and filed with the association. The intention to substitute is so clear on the face of the paper that we see no room for construction. That must be considered as done which it was the intention of the assured to do. The form in which the substitution is made is immaterial. It would be a strained construction to hold that the assured did not intend to substitute another beneficiary instead of the one first named. The request to the secretary was to make the substitution desired by the assured appear on the books of the association. Nor was the consent of the wife (plaintiff in this action) necessary to the making of the substitution. It was a part of the contract, as entered into in the beginning, that the assured of his own free unrestrained will might at any time make the substitution he desired. The wife, though named as beneficiary, could not in any way control the will of the assured. Whatever rights she had under the certificate, she could not in any way restrain or control her husband, the assured, in making the subsequent substitution. Nor do we see any reason why the assured could not name his executors as beneficiaries. This is not an attempt to devise by will the proceeds of the policy. This, it may be conceded, he could not do. But designating in the requisite mode his executors, as beneficiaries, was within his power. The beneficiary is but the recipient of the policy or its proceeds, and why the assured could not make his executors, or administrators, or his children, or his daughters, beneficiaries, without naming them, we cannot perceive. No one is injured by it. There is no rule or policy of law forbidding it. It is not contrary to good morals. The association is not called on to pay until after the death of the assured. Then the persons named as executors would become known. At any rate the association could not be called on to pay the amount due on the policy until the executors made themselves known to it.

Further we do not see why the assured could not make the secretary of the association the medium through which the writing might be made changing and substituting the beneficiary. All that was done was done in the life-time of the member. The change was to be made in writing, and filed with the association. It was not requisite that the writing should be actually made by the assured member, in his own proper handwriting. It could be made in the handwriting of another, provided it was done by his authority, and for him. This was done through the agency of the secretary. We see no reason why this is not a compliance with the member's contract made in the beginning with the association. In substance and in fact the change was made in writing, and filed as required. The views above expressed are in accordance with sound legal principles. The contentions on behalf of plaintiff are not so sustained. To uphold them would be to put form above substance, and unsubstantial technicalities above substantial legal rules. We find no error in the record. Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The findings of the court founded on conflicting testimony will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Albert M. Stephens, for appellant.
Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. There is a clean-cut conflict in the evidence. The plaintiff testified that defendant left him, in 1885, without cause and against his wishes, and had ever since, without reason, refused to return and live with him. There was sufficient corroboration. Letters introduced in evidence, and the testimony of friends and members of the family, tended to show that plaintiff was happy with his wife, and treated her kindly; and his father testified that defendant told him, in 1885, she would not live with the plaintiff any longer. That she has not in fact lived with him is undisputed. The court heard the conflicting statements of the parties, weighed the evidence, and we are not at liberty to set our judgment against this conclusion, even though our conviction should be that the defendant's evidence preponderates. The court did not err in its ruling as to the admissibility of certain evidence. Judgment and order affirmed.

PERKINS v. COOPER et al. (No. 13,179.)

FILING OF APPEAL—BOND—WAIVER.

1. Under the direct provisions of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 940, an appeal is "ineffectual for any purpose" where, within five days after service of notice of appeal, an undertaking is not filed or waived.

2. Filing of an undertaking must be waived within the time for filing, otherwise it will be ineffectual.

Reversing 24 Pac. Rep. 377.

On rehearing. For former report, see 24 Pac. Rep. 377.

PER CURIAM. Attention was called to the fact so briefly, and in such an incidental way, at the original hearing, that it escaped our notice, but, upon rehearing, it is made manifest to us that there is nothing before us in this cause which we have jurisdiction to hear and determine. A money judgment was rendered in the cause October 31, 1888. Notice of appeal was served and filed December 26th of the same year. No undertaking on appeal was ever filed or waived. The appeal was therefore "ineffectual for any purpose." Code Civil Proc. § 940; Holcomb v. Sawyer, 51 Cal. 417; Boyd v. Burrell, 60 Cal. 281; Biagi v. Howes, 63 Cal. 384; Brown v. Green, 65 Cal. 222, 3 Pac. Rep. 811; Stratton v. Graham, 68 Cal. 168, 8 Pac. Rep. 710; Little v. Jacks, 68 Cal. 344, 345, 8 Pac. Rep. 856, 9 Pac. Rep. 264, and 11 Pac. Rep. 128; Duffy v. Greenebaum, 72 Cal. 159, 12 Pac. Rep. 74, and 13 Pac. Rep. 323; In re Skerrett, 80 Cal. 63, 22 Pac. Rep. 85; Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 245, 22 Pac. Rep. 657. The appeal being ineffectual for any purpose, there has been and is no case here for our determination.

Attached to the transcript which has been filed herein there is a stipulation, entitled in this court, agreeing to the correctness of the transcript, and stating that a good and sufficient undertaking on appeal has been duly executed and filed. It is both proved and conceded that this statement is untrue, and the attorney for respondent says that he signed it without actual knowledge of the fact, and relying upon the statement of the counsel on the other side that such an undertaking had been filed, coupled with the fact that he knew the counsel to be perfectly familiar with the requirements of the statute and a careful practitioner, and also that the parties were amply able to file the undertaking. There is possibly some doubt as to just what was said on the subject when that stipulation was signed, but there is no doubt about the fact that the statement contained in it on the subject of undertaking was untrue. From that fact it follows (1) that there was then no case in this court in which counsel could bind a client by such a stipulation; (2) that, if the language of the stipulation could possibly be construed as a waiver of undertaking, (which we very much doubt,) it could only operate as a waiver as of and from the date of the stipulation, March 28, 1889, and there was at that date no appeal pending in which to waive an undertaking, and no cause pending in this court in which to make the stipulation. In Re Skerrett, 80 Cal. 63, 22 Pac. Rep. 85, it was held that in order to entitle certain parties to appeal without filing an undertaking, under section 946, Code Civil Proc., the order dispensing with the undertaking must be made within the time prescribed by law for filing the undertaking. So, if the filing of an undertaking is to be waived, it must be done within the time for filing; otherwise the appeal is lost, and the party has acquired a right of which he cannot be deprived by that attempt to appeal. The order heretofore entered in this cause must be set aside, and the attempted appeal dismissed. So ordered.

VORWERK v. NOLTE. (No. 13,470.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACT—FAILURE TO CONVEY.

Civil Code Cal. § 1651, provides that, where a contract is partly written and partly printed, the written parts shall control the printed part, and, if the two are absolutely repugnant, the latter must be disregarded. Defendant sold land to plaintiff, and in a contract to convey, partly written and partly printed, it was written that the money paid was to be returned in case he failed to execute and deliver a deed "after one year from date." The printed part declared that time should be of the essence of the contract. Held that, since this stipulation is generally used to prevent the tying up of the vendor's property while awaiting payment, it was here repugnant to the written part, and plaintiff could not recover the money paid when a good deed was tendered nine days after the end of the year. Reversing 24 Pac. Rep. 840.

On rehearing. For former report, see 24 Pac. Rep. 840.

Civil Code Cal. § 1651, provides that "where a contract is partly written and partly printed, or where part of it is written or printed under the special direction of the parties, and with a special view to their intention, and the remainder is copied from a form originally prepared, without special reference to the particular parties and the particular contract in question, the written parts control the printed parts, and the parts which are purely original control those which are copied from a form; and, if the two are absolutely repugnant, the latter must be so far disregarded."

J. W. Mitchell, (Chapman & Hendrick, of counsel,) for appellant. J. D. Bicknell and R. H. F. Variel, for respondent

Fox, J. Upon rehearing and reargument of this case a fact is conceded, which was before sufficiently apparent to be suspected, but not sufficiently so, from the record as printed here, to justify action upon it as a fact proved, viz.: That the original contract between the parties was partly written and partly printed; that in preparing it the parties had used a form printed in blank, in common use in the preparation of contracts for the sale of real property, where deferred payments were to be made; and that the words "time is of the essence of this contract," as found therein, was a portion of the printed, and not of the written, matter. If, therefore, there is any doubt about how the contract is to be construed, the rule prescribed in section 1651, Civil Code, is to be applied in the construction thereof. Applying this rule, and it appearing not only that the contract was partly written and partly printed, but that the printed part was prepared without special reference to these particular parties or this particular contract, the question is whether these words so found in the printed part are repugnant to the general scope and purpose of the contract, as the same appears from the original or written parts thereof. Of this we think there can be no doubt. It is a matter of common understanding that when these words—"time is of the essence of this contract"—are used, it is with reference to future payments; that their purpose is to protect the vendor against delays in payment of the purchase price, and the tying up of his estate beyond the fixed period, without the payment of the agreed compensation therefor; and that they have no place in the contract after the full price is paid, and when nothing remains to be done but to make the conveyance. Even where there are future payments to be made, if the time of payment is not fixed, time is not of the essence of the contract. Day v. Cohn, 65 Cal. 508, 4 Pac. Rep. 511. It is evident that, in the blank used in this case, the words were inserted and used solely with reference to the duties of the vendee, the party of the second part, for immediately after them, and in the same connection, we find the following: "In event of a failure to comply with the time hereof by the said party of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law and equity to convey said property," etc. Then in another part of the instrument, the written part thereof, it is provided that the vendor, the party of the first part, shall have one year in which to make the conveyance, and it is alleged and found that this was done to enable him first to secure the cancellation of an existing mortgage, which was not then mature. By the subsequent writing, made on the same day, it was provided that, if the vendor failed to execute and deliver a deed "after one year from the date hereof," he should return the purchase price, with 3 per cent. per month interest thereon.

Meantime the vendee went into immediate possession, and received the rents of the premises. The year expired June 24th. On the 29th the purchaser demanded his deed, and three days later, which defendant testifies was as soon as he could have it prepared, he tendered the deed, duly executed. No objection was made to it that it was not properly executed, or did not convey good title. The vendee was still in possession, and had collected the rents up to a time even beyond that of the date of the tender. We think the deed was tendered in time, and that the defendant was not liable to an action for the return of the purchase money, with the 36 per cent. interest money thereon, or any part thereof. The order heretofore made in this court in this cause is vacated and set aside, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EXEMPTIONS—INSOLVENCY—JEWELER'S SAFE.

On a question whether a safe used by a jeweler and watch-repairer should be set off to him in insolvency proceedings as exempt under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 690, subd. 4, exempting from execution "the tools or implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to carry on his trade," he and another practical watch-maker and jeweler testified that such a safe was necessary to the profitable conduct of his business, and that customers would not leave their watches to be repaired unless one were used. Held, that the safe was properly set off to him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Blackstock & Shepherd and George A. Rankin, for appellants. Barnes & Selby, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The respondent, L. M. McManus, was engaged in the business of a jeweler and watch-repairer, and while so engaged was adjudged to be an insolvent debtor. He owned and used in his business a "jeweler's safe," which the court, against the objections of certain creditors, set apart to him as property exempt from execution. The objecting creditors and the assignee of the estate appeal from the order, and contend that it was not authorized by law, and should, therefore, be reversed. At the hearing the respondent was called as a witness and testified in substance that he is a jeweler and watch-repairer, and is engaged in that trade or business as a means of support for himself and family; and that without the use of said safe, said business cannot be prosecuted by him to any profitable end; that it is a necessary and useful article in conducting said business; that without the use of said safe his customers would not leave their jewelry and watches with him to be repaired." Another witness was also called, and testified "that he is a practical watch-maker and jeweler; that a safe similar to the one mentioned is an article without which the business of jeweler and watch-maker and watch-repairer cannot be prosecuted to any profitable end, and that such a safe is a necessary and useful article in carrying on the business of a jeweler and watch-repairer; that without the use of such a safe very few customers will leave their jewelry or watches with the artisan to be repaired." This was all the testimony offered, and upon it the court made its findings and order as follows: "That the said safe is an article without the aid of which the business of petitioner, as jeweler and watch-maker, cannot be prosecuted to any profitable end, and that said safe is necessary to and in actual use by the petitioner in prosecuting his said business. Wherefore it is hereby ordered that the said safe be set apart, and that the same is hereby set apart, for the use of said insolvent debtor, and that the same shall not be subject to be applied to the payment of his debts." Section 60 of the insolvent act makes it the duty of the court having jurisdiction of insolvency proceedings to exempt and set apart for the use and benefit of the insolvent such real and personal property as is by law exempt from execution; and section 690, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "the tools or implements of a mechanic or artisan necessary to carry on his trade" shall be exempt from execution.

Statutes exempting personal property from forced sale are remedial in character, and are evidently intended to protect the debtor, and enable him to follow his vocation, and thus earn a support for himself and family. The general rule now is that such statutes are to be liberally construed, so as to effectuate the humane purpose designed by the law-makers, and our Code of Civil Procedure declares that all of its provisions are to be so construed, "with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." It is difficult to define accurately the word "implements," and the courts, so far as we are advised, have never attempted to define it. Webster gives as the meaning of the word, "whatever may supply a want; especially an instrument or utensil as supplying a requisite to an end, as the implements of trade, of husbandry, or of war;" and "utensil" he defines as "that which is used; an instrument; an implement; especially an instrument or vessel used in a kitchen, or in domestic and farming business." By the courts, these words are accorded a broad signification, and under them many things have been exempted which are not tools. Thus, in the state of Kansas, under a statute exempting "the necessary tools and instruments of any mechanic, miner, or other person, used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business," it has been held that an insurance agent and abstractor of titles could claim as exempt an iron safe and set of abstracts, which were used and kept by him for the purpose of carrying on his business. Davidson v. Sechrist, 28 Kan. 324. And the same rule has been applied to a printing-press, type, and other articles used in publishing a newspaper. Bliss v. Vedder, 34 Kan. 59, 7 Pac. Rep. 599. In Illinois, it has been held that a piano, used by a music-teacher, and upon which she relied for support, was, within the law exempting "furniture, tools, or implements necessary to carry on his or her trade or business." Amend v. Murphy, 69 Ill. 337. In Massachusetts, a clock, stove, screen, pitcher, and table-cover, used and necessary to carry on the business of a milliner, have been held to be included in "tools, implements, and fixtures." Woods v. Keyes, 14 Allen, 236. So, also, a sewing-machine. Rayner v. Whicher, 6 Allen, 294. In Vermont, a barber's chair has been held exempt as a tool. Allen v. Thompson, 45 Vt. 472. In this state it has been held that an expensive threshing outfit was not exempt, under the statute exempting "the farming utensils or implements of husbandry of the judgment debtor;" but this was upon the ground that the outfit was principally used in threshing grain raised by other persons for hire. In re Baldwin, 71 Cal. 74, 12 Pac. Rep. 44. Other cases bearing upon the question might be cited, but we think it sufficient to refer to Freeman on Executions, (2d Ed.) §§ 226, 226a, and to 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 135, in both of which works the authorities are very fully collated and reviewed. In view of the testimony submitted in this case, and the authorities above cited, we see no error in the ruling of the court below, and we therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

GUERNSEY V. WEST COAST LUMBER CO.
(No. 13,643.)

BREACH OF CONTRACT—WAIVER.

Defendant contracted to buy all the lumber manufactured by plaintiff during a certain season; the lumber to be of the sizes usually required for market, to be designated by plaintiff, subject to the right of defendant to give orders for any sizes usually cut. Held, in an action for breach of the contract that defendant could not set up as a reason for refusing to receive more lumber, any objection to the size of lumber theretofore accepted and paid for by him without reserving the right to object to it subsequently, and which he retained without any offer to return it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

C. J. Perkins, for appellant. T. J. Fording, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action for damages for the breach of a contract to buy lumber. The contract provided that the defendant should buy all the lumber "of good merchantable quality" which should be manufactured by the plaintiff during the year 1888, at his mill in San Bernardino county, and contained the following clause: "Said lumber shall be of such sizes as are usually required for the market, and shall be designated by Guernsey, regard being had to a due variety of sizes so as to meet the general requirements of the market, except that the company may give orders for any required sizes usually cut." Under this contract the plaintiff delivered lumber to the defendant until the middle of August, and, with certain unimportant exceptions, the defendant received and paid for the lumber so delivered. About that time the employes of the defendant informed its general manager that some of the lumber which was being delivered was not thick enough, and he instructed them "to have it remedied." No order for any particular size was given to the plaintiff, but he was informed that the lumber he was sending was too thin. He promised to attend to the matter, and his men continued to deliver lumber to the defendant, and the latter to receive and pay for it, until September 20th, when the plaintiff was notified that no more lumber would be received. The plaintiff thereupon sold the remaining lumber to other parties and brought this action to recover the difference in price. The trial court found that the defendant's refusal to receive further lumber was without excuse, and gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

We think that since the defendant accepted and paid for the lumber delivered up to September 20th without reserving the right to object to it subsequently, and does not offer to return it, but still retains it, any ground of objection to it which may have existed could not be a reason for refusing to accept subsequent lumber which was in accordance with the contract. The ultimate question upon which the case must turn, therefore, is whether the subsequent lumber was in accordance with the contract. As we have seen, the contract provided that the lumber was to be of good merchantable quality, and of such sizes as were usually required for the market, which sizes were to be designated by the plaintiff, subject to the right of the defendant to give orders for any sizes usually cut. Most of the evidence taken at the trial related to the question whether the lumber delivered by the plaintiff was "merchantable" within the meaning of the contract. But this seems to have been understood by everybody as having reference not to the quality but to the size of the lumber. Thus the local manager of the company testified as follows: "This Guernsey lumber was different from any other lumber that I have handled as merchantable lumber only as to thickness. I objected on account of its being thin. It wasn't good merchantable lumber by reason of its being thin." All the witnesses use the term in this sense, and there is no pretense that there was any other ground of objection. The question litigated, therefore, related to the size of the lumber usually required in the market. The position of the plaintiff was that lumber seven-eighths of an inch thick was sufficient, and there was evidence in support of this view. The position of the defendant was that it was necessary that the lumber should be what was known as inch lumber. The evidence shows, however, that there was not much exactness in the use of these terms. Owing to the character of the timber of the locality, and to the usual method of manufacturers, there was considerable difference in the size of the boards sawed at the same time from the same log. In this regard one witness testified as follows: "There is never a load that comes into the market that were you to put your rule to it every board would show the same thickness. There never was a log on this mountain yet, all the boards cut from which were of the same thickness." Another witness said: "My experience has been that lumber which is cut as inch lumber very seldom comes an inch thick. It would be probably a sixteenth less, and when it dries out it would be more than a sixteenth less. In fact if you take dry lumber it is sometimes three quarters of an inch or a little more." In most loads there would be a few very thin boards which it was customary to reject when delivered at the yard, and this course was pursued in this case. Understanding the terms in the above sense we think that, even if the standard of the defendant be adopted as the true one, the preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that, after the complaint made in August, the plaintiff complied with his contract. In sawing inch lumber the usual way was to "move the set works an inch and a third." After the complaint mentioned the plaintiff's works were so moved. In relation to this the plaintiff says: "I changed my head blocks, and after that the lumber came out a full inch." The lumberman to whom the plaintiff sold his lumber after the defendant refused to receive it testified as follows in relation to it: "I consider this lumber to have been fully as good as any that I ever handled; in fact better than some I have been handling in the last two years, that is, the average of it,—better timber. I mean by this both the quality of the lumber and its manufactured condition. It was cut well and it was good timber." Another person from the same yard testified as follows: "What we received from Mr. Guernsey compared in thickness with the rest. If anything his lumber was a little thicker than the other lumber that we received. I have applied the rule to measure the lumber. I can't say exactly just what it measured, but it was about as near an inch as any lumber we have received." Another lumberman who had seen the lumber testified that the plaintiff's lumber compared favorably with that manufactured in the locality, and said: "I call it good inch lumber." One of the plaintiff's employees, who handled the lumber at the mill, testified as follows: "The lumber that was cut in September was full inch. I saw nothing below an inch but what was thrown across the track. No thin lumber that I know of came down at all." And the teamster who hauled the lumber to the defendant's yard testified that the last load, delivered before September 20th, "was good average thickness. It was inch lumber." It was also in evidence that the price of lumber had fallen below the contract price at the time of the refusal to go on with the contract, and that the defendant had engaged in a kind of work for which "they had to have extra thick lumber." We think that the evidence is amply sufficient to sustain the decision, and we therefore advise that the order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

ALEXANDER v. JACKSON et al. (No. 13,489.)

EJECTMENT—HOMESTEAD—LAND BOUGHT ON CONTRACT—SATISFACTION OF JUDGMENT—APPEAL.

1. A married man bought certain lots, terms part cash, balance on time, deed to be given on payment of balance, lots to be forfeited on failure to meet payments. He then built a house on the lots, and moved into it with his family. The payments on the lots and the house were made with the community property. The wife executed and filed a declaration of homestead on the lots. Before final payments on the lots had been made, the husband assigned the contract and sold the house to plaintiff, who had knowledge of the homestead declaration, and who paid the balance of the purchase money and received a deed of the lots. Prior to the assignment to plaintiff, the wife offered to pay the vendor the amount due on the lots on condition that he would convey them to her or to her and her husband jointly. Held that, as at the time the declaration of homestead was filed the title was in the vendor, the wife acquired no rights in the property.

2. Where in ejectment there is coupled with a judgment for defendant an order that a certain sum be paid plaintiff, the leaving of this sum by defendant with plaintiff's attorney, which he refuses to accept, is not a satisfaction of the judgment so as to prevent an appeal by plaintiff.

BEATTY, C. J., and FOX and MCFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

Wright & Huxen, for appellant. L. J. Maddux, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. This is an action of ejectment for lots 27 and 28 in block 86 in the town of Modesto, in which judgment passed for defendant Mary Jackson. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll. There is a motion to dismiss the appeal, which will be hereafter considered. The complaint is in the form usual in the action of ejectment. The allegations of the complaint are denied by defendant Mary Jackson, except as to possession when suit was brought. In her answer she sets up a defense that in April, 1869, she and W. A. Jackson intermarried in this state, and have since been husband and wife; that some time in 1881 her husband entered into a contract in writing with Charles Crocker for the purchase of the lots of land above mentioned; that about September, 1884, her husband, W. A. Jackson, erected on these lots a residence of about the value of $1,500; that the money paid for the lots in suit and the house was the joint earnings of herself and husband, since their marriage; that defendant and her husband and children have, since it was built, made this house their home; that on the 12th day of August, 1885, defendant duly executed and filed in the proper office a declaration of homestead on these lots; that by virtue of the contract entered into between Crocker and her husband, the latter was to pay Crocker the sum of $75 for each lot in installments, with interest, etc.; that on the 26th of October, 1885, there was not to exceed $35 due Crocker on the purchase price of these lots, on the payment of which her husband was entitled to a deed from Crocker; that he (her husband) had abundant means to pay the purchase price; that he fraudulently refused to do so to prevent the conveyance of these lots to him, and that he might fraudulently prevent her from acquiring a homestead in the property; that in October, 1887, her husband made a pretended assignment of the contract of purchase to the plaintiff, and on the same day pretended to enter into a contract by which he was to sell and transfer to the plaintiff the house above mentioned; that this contract and assignment were entered into by the plaintiff and her husband for the purpose of cheating and defrauding her of her homestead; that at the time plaintiff accepted the assignment and contract he well knew that the purpose of the same was to cheat and defraud her of her homestead right; that in October, 1887, plaintiff presented the assignment to Crocker, and obtained a deed for the property; that this deed is the only title by which plaintiff claims the ownership of the property in controversy, and that it is void. It appears from the decision that the court found that W. A. Jackson, in 1884, purchased from Crocker, who then owned them, the lots in suit. The contract for the purchase of lot 28 was executed on the 28th of April, 1884, and that for lot 27 on the 7th of August, 1884. Other lots, including lot 29, were embraced in the contract of April, 1884. The contracts are similar in their terms. The purchase price of each lot was $75. Twenty-five dollars on each lot was paid when the contract was executed. The remaining $100 ($50 for each lot, 27 and 28) was to be afterwards paid in two equal installments. The installments were to bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. In each contract it is stipulated that if the purchase price is paid as set forth in it, with cost of conveyances, then W. A. Jackson will be entitled to a deed for the lots, otherwise the contract is null and void, and the amounts paid forfeited. If forfeited Jackson thereafter to be the tenant of Crocker, liable to be dispossessed upon three days' notice, and to be liable to pay a rent of $15 per month for any term he may remain in possession after forfeiture. A payment was made on the 26th of October, 1885, for which a receipt was given by Crocker, in which the same provisions were inserted as to forfeiture on failure to pay, tenancy, liability to dispossession and the payment of rent, but at $5 per month for possession after forfeiture. After the purchase, W. A. Jackson and Mary Jackson entered into possession of the lots, and have ever since been in possession. In September, 1884, W. A. Jackson erected a dwelling-house and other improvements on lots 27, 28, and 29, at a cost of about $1,300. The marriage of defendants is found as set forth in the answer, and stated above. Upon the completion of these buildings, defendants and their children entered into the dwelling-house and have ever since made it their home. The execution of the declaration of homestead is found as above stated from the answer. On or about the 6th of October, 1887, plaintiff and W. A. Jackson entered into an agreement for the purchase and sale of the dwelling-house and improvements, by which plaintiff was to pay W. A. Jackson therefor the sum of $1,500 less such sum as plaintiff should be compelled to pay Crocker for the lots 27, 28, and 29. W. A. Jackson at the same time made and delivered to plaintiff a writing by which the former surrendered and relinquished to the latter all claims to receive a conveyance for the lots just mentioned, and authorized the plaintiff to take and demand a conveyance there or in his own name. At the same time, plaintiff paid to his vendor the sum of $100 as part payment for the improvements on the lots. On the 15th of October, 1887, plaintiff paid to Crocker the balance due on these lots, and Crocker then executed to him a conveyance thereof. The balance due on the lots described in complaint (27 and 28) was $35.35 principal, and $5.86 interest. Plaintiff on the 3d of November, 1887, paid to Jackson the further sum of $335.20, and executed to him his promissory notes in writing for $1,000, and also executed to him a mortgage on the three lots to secure their payment. It is also found that the money, notes, and mortgage were the full purchase money of these lots, and that Jackson thereafter sold, assigned, and delivered the notes to one T. W. Drullard as security for money borrowed of him, of which notes and the mortgage Drullard is now the holder as security for this money. On the 6th of October, 1887, and long prior thereto, plaintiff had full actual knowledge of the declaration of homestead above stated, and that Mary Jackson claimed and occupied the premises as a homestead. The plaintiff, immediately after the 3d of November, 1887, demanded possession of the lots sued for of Mary Jackson, which she refused to deliver, and threatened him with violence if he attempted to take or have possession of them. All the charges of fraud on the part of W. A. Jackson and of the plaintiff are negatived by the findings. It is further found that Mary Jackson offered to pay Crocker the balance due him on the lots sued for in December, 1886, upon the condition that Crocker would convey them to her, or to her and her husband jointly; that she had full notice and knowledge of the right and title of the plaintiff to the premises ever since the 3d of November, 1887; that Mary Jackson and her husband have each had, since the date last mentioned, (she of her separate property,) sufficient means to pay the balance of the purchase money due on the lots in litigation, and that Mary Jackson is entitled to the judgment of the court. Judgment was accordingly entered in her favor, and it was by the judgment further ordered that "defendant Mary Jackson pay to the plaintiff the sum of forty-seven and twenty-one one-hundredths dollars, balance of the purchase price paid on the lots mentioned, with the interest on the same at seven per cent. per annum from date hereof."

We cannot see that Mary Jackson derived any right by her execution and filing of the declaration of homestead. Conceding that her husband had some equitable interest in the premises, still whatever he had he was competent to sell and transfer it. This is so, though the payments made by her husband were the earnings of the joint labors of herself and husband. Whatever interest was thus acquired was community property, of which the law invests the husband with the like absolute power of disposition (other than testamentary) as he has of his separate property. Civil Code, § 172. The husband sold and transferred his interest in the land involved herein to the plaintiff, as he had a right to do. The vendor (Jackson) did not have the legal title to the property, but only the right to get it from his vendor, Crocker, on payment of the purchase money. The sale and assignment to the plaintiff transferred to him the right to have the legal title conveyed to him on payment of the unpaid balance of the purchase money. The purchase was fair in all respects. The court below expressly found that there was no fraud in any of these transactions between W. A. Jackson and plaintiff in regard to the rights of Mary Jackson. The question of fraud may then be laid out of the case. As the case is presented in the record, the law imposed no obligation on the husband to the wife to complete the purchase and procure a deed so as to make possible the acquisition of a homestead by her. Granting that in foro conscientie there was an obligation binding the husband to pay the balance, and procure from Crocker a conveyance, such obligation was of the class styled "imperfect," for the breach of which no redress can be had in a court of justice. The husband had lawful right to refuse to complete his purchase, (Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 14; Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. 55, 21 Pac. Rep. 429.) and the wife cannot be heard to complain of it. When the declaration of homestead was executed and filed by Mary Jackson, the legal title was in Crocker, and he could not have been compelled to convey the land at the time of the transfer of the contract by Jackson to the plaintiff. The whole purchase money had not then been paid, and Crocker was entitled to hold onto the legal title, until he was paid the sum agreed on. Surely Mary Jackson could not, by executing and filing a declaration of homestead, affect Crocker's right to the land or the right of the plaintiff to whom Crocker might, under the facts of this case, have lawfully conveyed and did lawfully convey it. A right cannot be acquired by filing a declaration of homestead on the land of another. This point, if ever open to contention, is no longer debatable in this state. See Snodgrass v. Parks, supra. Crocker conveyed the legal title to the plaintiff. The filing of the homestead declaration invested Mary Jackson with no title to the land in suit, and did not detract from or affect in any way the potency of this title acquired by plaintiff by Crocker's conveyance to him.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is made on the ground that the judgment had been satisfied. The court gave judgment in favor of Mary Jackson, thus holding that she was entitled to the possession of the lots in controversy, and that plaintiff was not, and then ordered and adjudged that she pay to plaintiff a sum of money "because of the purchase money paid on the lots involved." This was done without any appropriate pleadings. She did not offer to pay any money, nor did she set forth in her answer any state of facts calling for any such judgment. The matter set up in the answer was pleaded merely as a defense to the action, which turned on the issue of right to the possession of the land sued for. There was no pleading on her part in which a demand was made for relief on payment of any sum of money. The portion of the judgment referred to (quoted above) was entirely outside of any issue joined in the cause before the court. It was entirely foreign to anything set forth in either complaint or answer. There was nothing in the case on which to base it. It is suspended as it were in mid air, without support of any kind or description, and is entirely irregular and erroneous. The record shows this state of facts in regard to this alleged satisfaction: that Mary Jackson's counsel on the 31st of August, 1888, after the appeal was taken, left on the desk of one of the attorneys for plaintiff the sum of $45.86, thus tendering it to plaintiff as payment of the sum adjudged by the court to be paid to plaintiff by defendant; that the counsel for plaintiff refused to accept it, and still holds it for defendant. There is no ground for holding such a tender or payment a satisfaction of the judgment. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the judgment is reversed with directions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings for the plaintiff, with a judgment for rents and profits at the rate of $15 per month from the 31st of October, 1887, to the date of the judgment. So ordered.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

Fox, J. I concur in the order reversing the judgment of the court below on the ground that said judgment as entered is not supported, either by the pleadings or the findings. But I am not prepared to say that the defendant Mary Jackson has not a homestead interest in the premises which she is entitled to have protected, under proper pleadings.

PEOPLE v. DOUGLASS. (No. 20,695.)

ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPON—RECORD—INFORMATION—PRIOR CONVICTION—JUDGMENT.

1. Defendant, accused by information of assault with a deadly weapon, and of a prior conviction for manslaughter, pleaded not guilty of the former, and guilty of the latter. The minutes of the trial stated that after the jury were sworn "the information is read, and the plea of not guilty stated to the jury by the clerk." Held, that this means that only the charge to which defendant pleaded not guilty was read.

2. Where the record shows that an information charged an assault upon Daniel Aueson, and that the evidence proved an assault on Daniel Aueson, but it also appears that the court told the jury that he was accused of assaulting Daniel Aueson, it will be presumed that the court read the information aright, and that in copying for printing the clerk had mistaken the letter "u" for the letter "n."

3. A person who, when a train is about to start, passes from a railroad depot across the steps of a sleeper, and goes forward on the opposite side, and gets upon the platform of a mail-car situated several cars from the passenger coaches, and two cars from the nearest sleeper, will not be presumed to be a passenger, but, on the contrary, a brakeman is justified in taking him to be a trespasser.

4. Pen. Code Cal. § 666, provides that if the subsequent offense of which a person, who was formerly convicted of a felony, is convicted, is such that upon a first conviction he could be punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison for less than 5 years, then, on such subsequent conviction, he can be punished by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years. Held that, since one first convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon may be imprisoned 2 years, he may, when it appears that he was formerly convicted of a felony, be imprisoned not exceeding 10 years.

5. A judgment which states the crime of which defendant was convicted, and the sentence of the court, is sufficiently definite and certain.

John Aherns and P. Reddy, for appellant. W. Ed. Tupper and S. J. Hinds, for the People.

THORNTON, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. This appeal is by him from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Several points are presented and argued on behalf of appellant, which we will proceed to consider. The defendant was accused by the information of assault with a deadly weapon, and of a prior conviction of a felony, viz., manslaughter. On his arraignment he pleaded guilty to the prior conviction of manslaughter, and not guilty as to the charge of assault with a deadly weapon. When the jury had been impaneled and sworn, it is stated in the minutes of the trial that "the information is read, and the plea of not guilty stated to the jury by the clerk." It is urged on behalf of defendant that it was error to read the information to the jury. The counsel for defendant construes the statement above quoted as a statement that the whole information was read, including both charges made in it, to one of which, as above stated, defendant had pleaded guilty. We do not so construe the statement taken from the minutes of the trial. We understand it as a statement that the charge in the information as to the assault only was read. It would be entirely unnecessary to read that portion of it in which the prior conviction, to which he had pleaded guilty, was set forth. At any rate it does not clearly appear that the whole information was read. If it was read, it was done in the presence of defendant and his counsel, and no objection was made to it. Further, the record shows distinctly that the charge as to the assault only was submitted to and passed on by the jury.

The verdict is in accordance with law (Pen. Code, § 1151,) and is free from uncertainty. See People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 557. The same is true of the judgment. See In re Ring, 28 Cal. 248. The judgment as entered states the crime of which the defendant had been convicted, and the sentence of the court. This is all that is required by law. There is no uncertainty in these statements.

It is argued that there is a fatal variance between the information and the proof, inasmuch as the information sets forth that the assault was made on Daniel Aueson, and the proof is that it was made on Daniel Aueson. The court in its charge told the jury that the defendant is accused of the crime of an assault on Daniel Aueson. The only accusation in this case is that set forth in the information. The direction of the court to the jury is as to what is contained in the information. Whether the question as to what is contained in the information is one of law or fact, it is to be determined by the court below; and when the court below has determined it, unless it clearly appears to be error, this court will not disturb it. Many persons in writing the letter "u" sometimes form it very like the letter "n," and e converso, so that one letter is frequently mistaken for the other. We have no doubt such is the case here,—that in giving shape to "u" it was formed in such a manner as to resemble the letter "n." The only evidence that we have that "n" was the letter instead of "u," is that of the clerk who copies it to be printed as "n." But the court below differed from the clerk as to this, and between the two it is the duty of this court to follow the judgment of the court below. The foregoing considerations induce us to conclude that it is not clear that the court below fell into an error in this matter, but, on the contrary, that the court below read the information aright, and that in this regard there is no error in the record. We have considered the points in regard to the directions given by the court below, and the refusal by the court of the requests to direct the jury made by defendant, and find no error in them.

There is no presumption of law or fact that a person found anywhere on the passenger train of a railway is a passenger. Such a presumption is opposed to all principle. If a person is found in or on a passenger-car, on a train for carrying passengers, such a fact will justify the conclusion prima facie that he is a passenger; but if seen to go on the platform of a mail-car, or of some other car not run for the accommodation or use of passengers, no such conclusion as that he was a passenger could be legitimately drawn. The rule seems to be laid down with a significant limitation in Railway Co. v. Thompson, 9 N. E. Rep. 357, cited and relied on by defendant. The rule as there stated is that "a person on a train used for carrying passengers is, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, presumed to be a passenger, and rightfully there." By the language here used, the presumption is allowable "in the absence of countervailing circumstances," which is equivalent to saying that the "presumption," admitting it to exist, "belongs to the class of disputable presumptions, and may be rebutted." The rebutting evidence is spoken of in the opinion as countervailing circumstances, which are nothing more than rebutting circumstances. The circumstances which rebut the presumption that defendant was a passenger are abundant. Evidence was introduced which tended to show that the defendant was not a passenger on the train. A witness testified that he was a brakeman on the night passenger train No. 18, on the morning of the 20th of April, 1889, when the shooting occurred of which defendant is accused. On the morning of that day, before daylight, when it was dark, the train being stopped at Madera, in Fresno county, the witness saw two men (one of whom was defendant) coming up from the rear end of the depot to where he stood. These men crossed the platform of a sleeper, and went up on the opposite side of the train from the depot. They went up towards the engine. He saw them attempt to get on the train behind the mail-car, between the mail-car and the express-car, and he hallooed to them not to get on, to keep off, but they paid no attention to his hallooing. Witness went to where they were, the defendant standing on the platform of the mail-car, and the other on the platform of the express-car. He drove one off the train; the other (defendant) refused to go, and, in the effort to get him off, the witness was shot by the defendant. The platforms of the cars on which the two men got were several cars distant from the regular passenger-car, and two cars from the nearest sleeper. These men did not go to the passenger-car at all, nor did they speak to any one connected with the management of the train to procure a passage, or pay fare, and, when the witness (brakeman) ordered them off the train, they did not say, or pretend in any way or manner, that they were passengers on the train. Evidence of these circumstances was before the jury. The court in its instructions left it to the jury to find whether they were passengers or intruders or trespassers on the train. The objection on behalf of the defendant is that there was no evidence on which this question could be left to the jury. In this the learned counsel for defendant is mistaken. The evidence is detailed above, and, in our view, was sufficient, and the court committed no error in submitting the point to the jury whether the defendant was a trespasser or a passenger on the train.

Another point made is that the court erred in telling the jury that the defendant, a trespasser on the train, was not justified in using his pistol and shooting, if the train was running at a rate of speed when he (the defendant) could with safety get off it or descend from it. We cannot concur in this view. If wrongly on the train, no law would justify him in shooting, when he could with safety get off it, and avoid the shooting. It was his duty to get off when told to do so. If he did not, he could not urge it as a defense rendering the shooting justifiable, if he could have gotten away from the train with safety to himself. This is too plain to require argument to establish it. The statement of the proposition is a refutation of it. We are of opinion that the court fairly put the case to the jury in its directions, and refused no request which it was not proper in law to refuse.

The point as to the term of punishment is not well taken. By the provisions of subdivision 2, § 686, Pen. Code, if the subsequent offense of which a person is convicted is such that upon a first conviction he could be punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison for any term less than 5 years, then, on such subsequent conviction, he can be punished by imprisonment in the state-prison not exceeding 10 years. Here defendant, if he had been first convicted for the offense for which he was subsequently convicted, could have been punished by imprisonment in the state-prison for 2 years, i. e. a term less than 5 years. For the subsequent conviction, then, he could have been sentenced to the state-prison for a term not exceeding 10 years. The sentence was for 8 years, 2 years short of the time for which he could have been sentenced. After an examination of all the points made and discussed, we are of opinion that there is no error disclosed by the record, and that the judgment and order should be and are affirmed.

REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A finding of fact by the court upon conflicting evidence will not be reviewed upon appeal.

W. B. Tyler, for appellant. Henry H. Reid, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. In this case, the whole question is as to an issue of fact which was determined by the court below in favor of plaintiff. Whether the money sued for was a gift or not, part of it to the defendant and a part of it to his daughter, depends on evidence in the cause. The evidence was on all material points conflicting. The court below decided that the money was not a gift, and rendered judgment for plaintiff. It is no use to review the evidence, but as it was conflicting on the issue above mentioned, according to the long-established rule of this court, the decision of the court below will not be disturbed. Judgment and order affirmed.

DRINKHOUSE v. SPRING VALLEY WATERWORKS. (No. 12,823.)

RES ADJUDICATA.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1246, providing that in actions to condemn land any person claiming any interest in the land, though not named in the proceedings, may appear, plead, and defend his interest "in like manner as if named in the complaint," where one takes a written lease of land with notice of the pendency of an action to condemn it, and then fails to appear and defend his interest, he is estopped by the judgment in that proceeding from claiming anything under his lease.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. F. HEAD, Judge.

Ben Morgan, for appellant. Wm. F. Herrin and C. N. Fox, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was commenced on July 29, 1887, to enjoin the defendant from building a dam across San Mateo creek. Plaintiff alleged that on January 1, 1887, Mary Drinkhouse, the owner of the premises, leased them to him for the period of one year, with the privilege of five years from the expiration thereof; that he went into possession, and on the 19th day of April, 1887, a written lease was entered into, by the terms of which he was to have the possession and use of the property for the term of five years from said 19th day of April; that defendant was constructing a dam below said premises, which, when completed, would throw water back upon them and permanently deprive him of the use thereof. The court found that the verbal lease, made as alleged by plaintiff, was by mutual consent canceled on April 19, 1887, and the written lease entered into as alleged, but that no change was made in the possession or use of the property; that said Mary Drinkhouse is the mother of plaintiff, and continued to occupy and use the premises, and he continued to live with her as he had theretofore done from his birth; that on February 28, 1887, and while said Mary Drinkhouse was the owner of a tract of land including the premises described in the complaint, defendant herein commenced an action against her and J. A. Drinkhouse, her husband, for the condemnation of said tract of land to public use, and duly filed in the recorder's office a notice of the pendency thereof, and that a decree in its favor was entered July 27, 1888; that during the trial of said action plaintiff herein was present as a witness, and acting on behalf of the defendants therein, but never until after the entry of the decree therein made any claim to any interest in the property.

We think that the evidence supports these findings, and that the conclusions of law drawn by the court below are warranted by the facts found. The plaintiff lived in San Francisco with his parents, and testified that he lived "six days of the week in San Francisco, and one day in San Mateo;" that he never fitted up the place as a lodging-house, but put in a few tables, chairs, and blankets; that he had no servants or employes there, and that the foreman who had been in the employ of his mother continued to live in the building. He admits that when he entered into the written lease he knew that a suit was pending in which the water company was seeking to condemn the land. His verbal lease for one year was canceled six weeks before the condemnation suit was commenced. He knew that such a suit was pending,—was in fact an active participant on behalf of his parents against the claim of the company. Under section 1246, Code Civil Proc., the plaintiff herein was authorized, though not named as a party to the condemnation proceedings, to appear, plead, and defend his interest as a lessee, if any such he held, "in like manner as if named in the complaint," and, having failed to do so, although he had notice of the proceeding,—assuming that he was a lessee in good faith, which the court evidently did not believe,—he is now estopped by the judgment in that proceeding from claiming anything by virtue of his written lease entered into subsequent to the filing of the lis pendens. Roach v. Water Co., 74 Cal. 263, 15 Pac. Rep. 776; Civil Code, § 3529; Miller v. White, 80 Ill. 580; Wells, Res. Adj. § 32. The court did not err in its ruling against the objections of plaintiff to the admission of the judgment roll and lis pendens. The court found on all the material issues. Some of the material allegations of the complaint were not denied. It was not necessary, therefore, to find in relation to them. Judgment and order affirmed.

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—PLEADING—REPUGNANCE—AMBIGUITY—UNCERTAINTY.

1. In an action to foreclose a mortgage, where the notes and mortgage set out in the complaint show that they were made to plaintiff as "trustees of the estate of W., deceased," an averment in the complaint that plaintiff sues as "trustee for the heirs at law of W." is immaterial and redundant, and must be disregarded.

2. In such action, therefore, a judgment in favor of plaintiff as "trustee of the estate of W., deceased," is supported by the pleadings.

3. An averment in the complaint as to attorney's fees is not ambiguous and uncertain on the ground that it cannot be determined whether fees are demanded for foreclosure of the mortgage as to two of the notes only, or as to all three, where it appears that, when the action was commenced, but two of them were due, and hence that the recovery must be confined to those two.

4. A demurrer to a complaint on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty cannot be sustained if the complaint be either ambiguous or uncertain, but is not both.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge. W. J. McIntyre and H. Goodcell, Jr., for appellant. E. B. Stanton, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage. The demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, upon defendants' failure to answer, judgment was rendered against them. From that judgment they bring this appeal, and claim—First, that the demurrer should have been sustained upon the grounds that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, that it is ambiguous and uncertain; and, second, that the judgment is not sustained by the pleadings.

1. It is urged that the facts are insufficient for the reason that the plaintiff sues as trustee for seven designated persons, described as "heirs at law of B. F. White, deceased," and there is no allegation that he is a trustee for any purpose for any of the beneficiaries, or that the notes in suit were made in his name for their benefit, and therefore the persons named as beneficiaries are the real parties in interest, and not the plaintiff. The complaint alleges that the three notes set out in it were made and delivered to the plaintiff by the defendants, together with the mortgage in suit, to secure their payment, and that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the notes and mortgage as trustee for the beneficiaries, "all the heirs at law of B. F. White, deceased;" while the notes themselves show that they were made to the plaintiff, "as trustee of the estate of B. F. White, deceased." These two allegations are said to be inconsistent with each other, because the identity of the plaintiff as trustee for seven particular persons, described as heirs at law of B. F. White, deceased, is different from that of trustee of the estate of the same decedent. But this inconsistency is more apparent than real. It is true that in the latter capacity, if he were trustee of the whole estate, he would not only represent the heirs, but the legatees, devisees, and creditors, if any, as well; while, in the first-mentioned capacity, he would simply represent the persons named as beneficiaries. This makes it appear that the first is more extensive in scope than the second, and that it is not repugnant to the latter. The notes sued on are, however, the principal contract, to which the mortgage is but an incident, and, as it clearly appears from the notes themselves that they were made to the plaintiff for the benefit of "the estate of B. F. White," deceased, he must be regarded as a trustee for that estate. These facts are material and controlling, in view of which the averment of ownership of the notes and mortgage, as trustee of the heirs of said decedent, becomes immaterial and redundant matter, and as such must be disregarded. By taking the notes and mortgage in his own name for the benefit of the estate of the decedent above named, he became the trustee of an express trust, and as such may maintain this suit, without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. Code Civil Proc. § 369; Bliss, Code Pl. § 262; Shouler, Ex'rs, § 292; Pom. Rem. § 175. This is one of the exceptions to the rule declared in section 367 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. The complaint is therefore not objectionable upon the first ground of demurrer.

2. On the grounds of ambiguity and uncertainty, the first point made is that the averment respecting the attorney's fee is uncertain because it cannot be determined from the complaint whether the amount demanded is reasonable or not, because it does not appear whether the amount is demanded for the foreclosure of the mortgage as to two or all three of the notes. Of the three notes set up in the complaint, two were due when the action was commenced, and, as these two were the only ones that could be recovered upon, it seems clear enough to us that the amount demanded as an attorney's fee related to the foreclosure of the mortgage as to those two; hence it cannot be said that the complaint is, in that respect, either ambiguous or uncertain. But, even if it were uncertain, such an averment is unnecessary; for, as was said in Carrier v. Minturn, 5 Cal. 435, "the counsel fees stipulated to be paid were not the cause of action, but, like the costs, a mere incident to it, and may be fixed by the chancellor at his discretion, not exceeding the amount stipulated." This rule has not since been departed from. Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. Rep. 514; Rapp v. Gold Co., 74 Cal. 532, 16 Pac. Rep. 325. See, also, Association v. Clark, 84 Cal. 201, 23 Pac. Rep. 1081. What has been said regarding the objection urged upon the general ground of demurrer disposes of the remaining objections as to the uncertainty and ambiguity of the complaint, as they are based upon the averment of trusteeship for the heirs of B. F. White, deceased, and the fact that the notes show they were made to the plaintiff as trustee for the estate of B. F. White, deceased. Again, if the complaint were either ambiguous or uncertain, but not both, the demurrer being in the conjunctive as to these two grounds, it could not be sustained. Kraner v. Halsey, 82 Cal. 209, 22 Pac. Rep. 1137.

3. It is claimed that the judgment is not sustained by the pleadings because of the averment to the effect that the plaintiff is the trustee of the persons named as heirs of the decedent, and the judgment is in favor of the plaintiff as trustee for the estate of the same decedent. But as the averment mentioned is, as above shown, immaterial, and as the notes and mortgage were made and delivered to the plaintiff "as trustee of the estate of B. F. White, deceased," the judgment is in accordance with and supported by the complaint. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

GRAY v. SABIN. (No. 11,740.)

VACATING JUDGMENT—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL.

By consent, a cause was set for trial November 25th, but on that day plaintiff's counsel was at L., and, a continuance being refused, the case was set for November 30th. On that and the following day the court was engaged in another trial. The next day a clerk of plaintiff's counsel stated that he had returned and had gone to M. to try a case, but the court, on defendant's demand, ordered the case to proceed. No evidence was offered by plaintiff, and verdict and judgment were rendered against him. Afterwards the judgment was vacated on an affidavit of merits, and affidavit of counsel that he had engaged to attend the trial at M. several months before, and on his return from L. he was informed that this case could not be reached for several days; that the court was accustomed to continue cases for the convenience of counsel engaged in other courts. There were counter-affidavits denying this custom, and showing that plaintiff's counsel had before agreed to dismiss the case. On a subsequent motion to set aside the order vacating the judgment, it appeared that plaintiff's counsel had attended the trial at M. as a witness, and voluntarily, without a subpoena. Held, that there was no sufficient ground for vacating the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Robert Ash, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause came regularly on for trial, having been set by consent of all parties on November 25, 1885. Counsel for plaintiff was absent. His clerk stated that he was unavoidably detained in Los Angeles, and asked for a continuance. The defendant objected to a continuance, but, as there was another cause on trial, and as the next day was Thanksgiving day, the court put the case over until Monday, November 30th. On the latter day, and the day following, the cause was called for trial, and the defendant answered, "Ready." On December 2d, other business having been disposed of, the court ordered the case to proceed. The clerk again appeared on behalf of the attorney for plaintiff, and stated that said attorney was in Modesto trying a case, although he had returned from Los Angeles to San Francisco since November 25th. Defendant objecting to a continuance, the court ordered the trial to proceed. A jury was impaneled, and, no evidence having been offered on behalf of the plaintiff, a verdict was rendered for the defendant. On December 10, 1885, the plaintiff served notice of motion to vacate judgment on the ground that it was taken against him through his mistake and excusable neglect. In support of his motion he presented an affidavit of merits, which also alleged that he expected his attorney to be present at the trial; that he was too poor to employ other counsel to take his place; and that he believed his attorney was actually engaged in another court in the trial of a cause. His counsel made affidavit that, although he had returned to San Francisco on November 29th, he had several months prior engaged to be in Modesto to attend the trial of a cause there, set for November 23d, and afterwards continued to November 30th; that he was informed on his return to San Francisco, November 30th, this cause could not be reached for several days on account of other business before the court, and that it was a custom of this court to continue causes for the convenience of counsel engaged in other courts. Counter-affidavits were filed on behalf of the defendant, alleging that there was no custom under which causes were continued for the convenience of counsel engaged in the courts of outside counties; that counsel for plaintiff had long before agreed to dismiss this cause. J. L. Boone, a partner of the attorney for plaintiff, who was absent in Modesto at the time of the trial, corroborated the defendant in his statement as to the promise of a dismissal. A clerk in the office of the attorneys for defendant stated that he had informed the attorney for plaintiff as to the day of the trial, and said attorney stated that he would not be present, that he was going to Los Angeles, and asked for a continuance, which the clerk said he had no authority to grant. The court granted the motion of the plaintiff and set aside the judgment. Thereafter the defendant moved the court to set aside its order vacating the judgment, on the ground that it had been deceived in matters of fact by the affidavits filed on the application to vacate the judgment, which motion was denied, and defendant has appealed. It was made to appear—indeed, the fact was not disputed—that the attorney of the plaintiff attended a trial at Modesto, not in the capacity of an attorney, but as a witness; that he was not subpoenaed, but attended voluntarily; that he left Modesto before the trial of the said cause was completed, having been permitted to give his testimony out of the regular order, so that he might return to San Francisco. We think that, under the showing made on the first application, the motion to set aside the judgment ought to have been denied; and, certainly, on the showing made to vacate the order the defendant was entitled to have it set aside, and to have the judgment stand on the verdict of the jury. If such excuses as were offered in this case were held sufficient to set aside judgments, there would be no end to delays and annoying expedients. The orders appealed from are reversed.

DEED—RESERVATION—EJECTMENT—RES ADJUDICATA—ADVERSE POSSESSION—ESTOPPEL.

1. The owners of land conveyed a part of it to plaintiff, with a reservation to them and their assigns of "the exclusive right to all oils, petroleum, asphaltum, and other kindred mineral substances," and the right to do whatever was necessary to obtain and transport such minerals, including the erection of proper machinery, and the laying of pipes. The rest of the original tract was conveyed in parcels to other persons, with the same reservation, and finally the reserved rights and interests in the whole were granted to defendants. Held, that defendants have no right to the possession of plaintiff's land further than is necessary to the exercise of the rights reserved in that tract alone.

2. Where, in ejectment, it is shown that defendants have taken possession of a part of plaintiff's land, to enable them to exercise the rights reserved in the rest of the original tract by their grantors, and that they are not seeking the minerals in question on plaintiff's land, and that none exist there, plaintiff is entitled to recover the possession of the land occupied by them.

3. A judgment in a former action determining that a lease to plaintiff, granted before he obtained his deed, of the right to take such minerals in the entire tract had expired, and enjoining him from interference with defendants' right to take such minerals, they having purchased it from his grantors, is no bar to such action of ejectment.

4. Plaintiff's recovery cannot be defeated on the ground of defendants' adverse possession, where the evidence shows that before the statute had run the structures by which defendants held possession were carried away by flood, and rebuilt in a different place on plaintiff's land; for, as defendants were trespassers, their possession was adverse only to the extent of the land actually occupied by them.

5. Plaintiff's deed to defendants of all structures erected by him on the land, for the purpose of exploring for, obtaining, and transporting such mineral, will not estop him to claim title to, and the right of possession of, the land on which such structures stand.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Noble Hamilton and Joseph A. Joyce, for appellant. Charles Fernald and John J. Boyce, for respondent.

WORKS J. This is an action of ejectment. The common grantors of the plaintiff and defendant were the owners of a large tract of land, including the land in controversy in this action. They subdivided the land, and sold it in several tracts. One of these tracts, being the one now in litigation, was conveyed to the plaintiff. The deed conveying the land contained this reservation or exception: "Excepting and reserving to the parties of the first part, and their servants, agents, and assigns, the exclusive right to all oils, petroleum, asphaltum, and other kindred mineral substances, and the right to erect machinery, sink wells, bore, tunnel, dig for, work on, and remove the same from the said premises, together with the right of way over and through any and all parts of said premises, for the purpose of going to and coming from said works, and transporting machinery, tools, implements, and supplies for said works, and of transporting said substances to a market, and the right to lay pipes to conduct oil, and the right to dispose of said substances, and of transferring to their grantees thereof the same rights as are herein reserved to the parties of the first part; but not to destroy or injure any crops growing upon, or any improvements on, said premises, such as buildings, trees, vines, roads, inclosures, without making just compensation for such injury or destruction, reserving, also, to the parties of the first part the right of way for a road or roads over and across said premises, for the use of tenants or vendees of adjoining and other lands of said rancho." A like reservation or exception was contained in conveyances of other parts of this larger tract to other parties. Subsequently, said grantors conveyed to the defendant in this action the estate or interest in the whole tract reserved or excepted by these conveyances. The complaint is in the ordinary form. The answer, in one defense, sets up these conveyances; that the defendant was entitled to all of the rights reserved or excepted by said conveyances, and alleged further. "That prior to the commencement of this action, and on or about the 2d day of July, 1883, this defendant entered into the possession of its estate in said lands, as hereinabove particularly described, and then at once began, in good faith, to exercise open and notorious acts of ownership over the same, under claim of right and title thereto, and then, at great expense, began the exploration for, and the development of, said oil interests, and the erection of costly machinery, derricks, rigs, buildings, storage-tanks, and pipe-lines upon said premises, and defendant has thence, hitherto, continued, in good faith, the progress thereof, and the development of said territory for said oils; that the respective estates of the plaintiff and the defendant in the premises described in said amended complaint are of such a kind and character that the possession of the surface of the soil thereof has been held and enjoyed by each separately, to the extent and for the benefit of their said several, respective, separate estates, freeholds, and property therein, and not otherwise, ever since plaintiff and defendant acquired their said several, respective, separate interests and estates in said real property; and that this defendant is now the owner, seised and possessed in fee-simple absolute, and in the actual occupation and possession of the said estate and interest in said real property described in the amended complaint of plaintiff herein, as particularly, and specifically, and at large set forth and described in this answer." The answer also pleaded the statute of limitations, a former adjudication, and an estoppel by deed, which will be further noticed hereafter.

The court below found the interests in the land in the plaintiff and defendant, as above stated, and, among other things, found "that the plaintiff in this action has been, since said 23d day of November, 1882, continuously, to the present time, in the possession and enjoyment of the estate so conveyed to him by the said Carpenter and Steinbach, but has not held, occupied, or enjoyed any part or portion of the excepted estate, reservations, rights, or privileges excepted and reserved by his deed of that date, and the defendant has never ousted or ejected plaintiff from any portion of his said estate, and the defendant does not now withhold the possession thereof from the plaintiff. That thereafter, and in the month of May, 1883, this defendant entered upon said land and premises, as hereinabove, and in said amended complaint, described, and took possession and the actual occupation of all of its separate estate therein, and exercised and enjoyed the entire and exclusive use of, in, and to said excepted estate and reservations, rights, and privileges, and that said defendant has continuously, from said date to the present time, so exclusively occupied, used, enjoyed, and controlled said excepted estate, and said reservations, rights, and privileges. That the entry of the defendant in this action upon said described tract of land was under and by virtue of said instrument in writing, made by the said Steinbach and Carpenter to the said Whaley, by which the said excepted estate and interest in said tract of land, and the reservations, rights, and privileges in, over, and upon the same were sold and conveyed to the said Whaley, and under and by virtue of the transfer, sale, assignment, and conveyance thereof by the said Whaley to the said defendant. And the said defendant never did at any time enter upon the separate estate of the plaintiff in said premises, nor in any manner oust or eject the plaintiff therefrom; but said entry was made, and said occupation and possession taken and acquired, by defendant, and held and enjoyed solely and exclusively for the rightful occupation and enjoyment of said excepted estate, and said reservations, rights, and privileges. That the said several respective estates, interests, rights, and privileges of the plaintiff and the defendant in, over, and upon the particular tract of land hereinabove, and in said amended complaint, described are separate, distinct, entire, and complete in themselves, and that the possession of the plaintiff and the defendant of the surface of the soil of said tract is for the benefit, advantage, use, and enjoyment of the respective and separate estates resting and being in each. And that said respective and separate estates are of such a kind and character that the possession of the surface of the soil of said tract of land can be held and enjoyed by each separately, to the extent and for the benefit of each of said several, respective, separate estates, freeholds, and property, for the respective uses, and purposes, and rights of each resting and being in plaintiff and defendant; and that the possession has been so held and enjoyed by the respective parties hereto ever since the acquisition by each of their respective interests and estates in said real property. That the defendant, in the month of May, 1883, entered upon said land and premises hereinabove, and in the amended complaint of plaintiff, and in the answer thereto of defendant herein described, and took possession and actual occupation of its estate therein, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as it now occupies and enjoys the same; and that, continuously from said date, its possession has been by an actual, open, and notorious occupation, under claim of right and title to said estate, founded upon said various written agreements and conveyances, made by the said Steinbach and Carpenter, to it and to its predecessor, the said Whaley, and it has held, occupied, and enjoyed said possession as the owner of said excepted estate, reservations, rights, and privileges, as its own absolute property, and in hostility to the plaintiff's title, and to the whole world. That said possession and occupation have been continuous, open, notorious, and uninterrupted from said month of May, 1883, to the present time, and said defendant has paid, during said time, all state, county, and municipal taxes levied and assessed upon the same." The court also found in favor of the defendant on the defenses of former adjudication, the statute of limitations, and estoppel by deed, and, that no question might arise as to the findings covering the issues, there was also a general finding that all of the allegations of the defendant's answer were true. Upon these findings, the court concluded as follows: "(1) That defendant, the Mission Transfer Company, a corporation in this state, was, at the time of the commencement of this action, and now is, the sole owner in fee-simple of the excepted estate, with the reservations, rights, and privileges set forth in the answer of the defendant herein, and in the deed of Steinbach and Carpenter to plaintiff, A. C. Dietz, dated November 23, 1882, excepted and reserved, and subsequently conveyed by Steinbach and Carpenter to the defendant herein, with the right to perpetually use said premises in the manner, and to the extent, in said deed, and hereinabove in these findings set forth; (2) that plaintiff has no right, title, or interest, or any estate whatever in or to, such excepted estate, or the reservations contained in said deed, and that no estate therein passed to plaintiff by said deed of November 23, 1882, or otherwise; (3) that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against defendant in this action, by reason of defendant's occupation of the tract of land and premises described in the amended complaint and answer herein, and in these findings; (4) that defendant is entitled to his costs and disbursements in this action." It must be evident, at a glance, that some of these findings are entirely inconsistent with each other, and that the findings and conclusions of law have left the case in utter confusion. The court below, as appears from its conclusions of law, seems to have been laboring under the impression that the plaintiff was attempting to recover the interest or rights reserved or excepted by the original grantors, and subsequently conveyed to the defendant. The findings and conclusions seem to be based upon this theory, and, so treating the case, the decision was against the plaintiff. Viewing the case in this light, no doubt the conclusion reached by the court was right. But such was not the question presented, and the conclusions of law are almost entirely aside from the real question in the case. It was not a question whether the plaintiff or defendant, or either of them, owned the interests claimed by them respectively, but which of them was entitled to the possession of the property, conceding their titles or interests to be as claimed by each.

Counsel on both sides discuss in their briefs, at great length, whether the clause in the deeds above referred to, and set out, was a reservation, or an exception; but we think it is entirely immaterial to this controversy whether it was one or the other. The same may be said of the controversy in the briefs, as to whether the interest of the defendant was a corporeal hereditament, or estate in the land, or a mere incorporeal hereditament or easement. As we construe the deed to the plaintiff, it conveyed to him the fee-simple title to the land, subject to the right of the grantors and the defendants, as their successors in interest, to enter upon the land, and occupy it for the purposes mentioned in the deed. For those purposes, and none other, the defendant was entitled to the possession of the land, or so much thereof as was necessary for such purposes, and for such a length of time as it was necessary for it to occupy it for such purposes, and no longer. It makes no difference, therefore, whether its interest in the land constituted a title to a part of the land itself or not. If it did, it was only entitled to go upon the land for the purpose of severing its part of the land from that of the plaintiff, and removing it therefrom. It had no right to enter upon and hold its part of the land, where situated, to the exclusion of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was entitled, under his deed, to the possession of the surface of the land. The defendant was entitled to take possession of and occupy the plaintiff's land, for the purpose of extracting therefrom the mineral substances contained therein, if any, to explore and excavate the lands, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it contained such substances or not, and, if found, to erect the necessary buildings and machinery, put down pipes, and to make and use such roads as were necessary to remove the oils or other substances from the land. The deed also gives the defendant the right of way for a road, or roads, over and across the premises, for the use of tenants or vendees of adjoining and other lands. This clause in the deed has no connection with the defendant's interest in the land, which is only a right to enter upon this and other tracts of land for a temporary purpose, but applies to tenants and vendees of the other tracts, to whom the original grantors or their grantees might sell or lease the property. Therefore, this last clause in the reservation, or exception, need not be further noticed.

It will be observed that the defendant alleged in its answer, and the court found, that it went into possession of the land, and began, in good faith, to exercise notorious acts of ownership over the same, and at great expense began the exploration for, and development of, said oil interests, and the erection of costly machinery, derricks, rigs, buildings, storage-tanks, and pipe-lines upon said premises, and that it has continued in good faith the progress thereof, and the development of said territory for said oils. This allegation in the answer is defective, in not alleging directly that the entry of the defendant, and other acts done, were for the purpose of developing and extracting oil from this land. It seems, however, to have been treated as such an allegation at the trial, and found upon as such by the court. It is insisted by the appellant that the finding of the court that the defendant was in possession for the purpose of developing or extracting oil from the land in controversy is not sustained by the evidence, and that the evidence shows, beyond any controversy, that the buildings placed upon the plaintiff's lands, and the pipes put down, and roads made and used thereon, were placed thereon and used for the sole purpose of extracting and removing oil from other and different lands, and that the evidence shows that no attempt had ever been made by the defendant to explore the plaintiff's land for oil, or other substances mentioned in the reservation or exception, and that, in fact, the evidence shows that no such substances existed in or upon this land. We have examined the evidence carefully, and find the appellant to be right in this contention. The evidence not only fails to show that the respondent's possession was taken for the purpose of developing and extracting oils or other substances from the appellant's land; but the respondent's own testimony shows affirmatively and conclusively that it took possession, and constructed buildings, and other structures, and put down pipes on the plaintiff's land solely for the purpose of developing, extracting, and removing oils from other and different lands, and that it had made no effort to develop oil on the plaintiff's land. Not only so, but the evidence failed to show that the land contained any oil, or other substances, included in the defendant's right in the land, and tended strongly to show that it did not contain any such substances. It was contended by the respondent that it had the right, under the exceptions and reservations in the several deeds made to the plaintiff and others, to occupy and use all of the land for the purpose of developing and extracting oil from any part of it. But there is nothing in the plaintiff's deed giving any such right. On the contrary, the reservation or exception contained in the deed, so far as it gives the right to enter upon and occupy the land, is confined in plain and unambiguous terms to the development and removal of oil, and other substances, from the land described in the deed. To hold that the defendant could enter upon, occupy, and use the land for its convenience in extracting and removing oils from another and different tract of land, would be to vary the terms of the deed in a material respect, and make for the parties a new and different contract. This the courts have no power to do. What we have said is applicable to the right to put down pipes to convey the oil. This provision, although not limited in express terms to oil taken from the land, must be construed in connection with the other rights granted, and be limited in the same way. For these reasons, the finding of the court that the defendant was rightfully in possession of the land, occupying its own estate therein, and other findings based upon this theory of the defendant's rights, are not sustained by the evidence, and the conclusions of law founded upon these findings rest upon an erroneous view of the law.

The respondent attempts to justify the decision of the court below on the ground that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by a former judgment. But we are quite clear that the questions adjudicated and determined in the former action, and the one now before us, are not the same. It appears from the pleadings in the former action that the appellant had, prior to the execution of the deed to him, leased from the owners of the entire tract above mentioned the right to take oil and other substances from the same, and the lease gave him the option to purchase the perpetual right to take such oil, and other substances mentioned, from the whole tract, on certain conditions, and bound him to give up possession at a certain time, in case such perpetual right was sold to other parties; that the appellant had failed to buy said right; that it had been sold to the respondent who had made improvements, and expended large sums of money in making the improvements necessary for developing the oils and other substances taken from said lands; that the appellant had refused to surrender the possession of the property, and was claiming the right to still extract oils from the land, and refused to permit the respondent to enter upon the same for the purpose of exploring for, developing, and extracting the oils and other substances from the land. The judgment of the court in that case was against the appellant, that his lease or license had expired; that the respondent was entitled to the possession of the land for the purposes before mentioned, and enjoined the appellant from asserting or exercising any rights under said lease or license, and also enjoined him from preventing the respondent from entering upon the land for the purposes mentioned. It will be observed that the case relied upon as a bar to this action presented an entirely different question from the one now before us. There the question was as to the right of the appellant to hold possession of the whole tract of land, and extract oil from it under a lease. Here there is no question as to the right of the appellant to hold the land under a lease, or to extract oil from it, nor is such a right on the part of the respondent involved in this case. Here, the appellant asserts the right to the possession as owner of the soil of a part of the tract, and not the right to extract oil from it. He does not dispute the right of the respondent to enter upon and occupy the land for the purpose of exploring for, developing, and extracting from his land, oils or other substances mentioned in his deed. His claim is that the respondent is in possession of the land for other and different purposes, and is therefore a mere trespasser. This claim is fully substantiated by the evidence, and it is not covered by the former judgment.

Again, it is contended by the respondent that the appellant's cause of action was barred by its adverse possession. But this position is effectually answered by the findings of the court below. It is directly found by the court that the plaintiff was never ousted of his possession, but that he and the defendant were both in possession, and were both entitled to the possession. It is true that the court found generally that the answer of the defendant, which included the defense of the statute of limitations, was true, but the other finding referred to is inconsistent with and contradictory of this. Besides, both the evidence and the findings show that the defendant made no claim of title to the land as against the plaintiff, and that it never paid any taxes upon it. It merely asserted the right to occupy a part of the land, temporarily, in conjunction with the plaintiff, and not adverse to his claim of ownership, and paid taxes for a part of the time, not on the land, but upon the structures it had placed upon it. A holding without disputing the plaintiff's rights, and without asserting any claim opposed to his rights, could not be adverse to him. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 595; Oneto v. Restano, 78 Cal. 377, 20 Pac. Rep. 743. Besides, the evidence fails to show that the possession of the defendant was continuous. Its occupation was of a part of the land by certain structures erected upon it. The evidence shows that before the statute had run its full time these structures were washed away by high water. It is not shown when they were replaced. But it is shown that, when the structures were rebuilt, they were put up on a different part of the plaintiff's land. As the defendant was a mere trespasser, it could only obtain title to the land actually occupied by it, and as its possession was changed, and neither part of the land was in actual possession by it for the requisite time, there was no bar as to either tract.

As to the claim that the plaintiff is estopped by deed to deny the defendant's right to possession, we find that there is nothing in the deed inconsistent with the plaintiff's claim in the action. The deed was by the appellant and one Hill, and granted, bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred to the respondent all of their right, title, and interest in and to "all the buildings, tanks, derricks, pipes, pipe-lines, fixtures, and all other personal property whatsoever that now is, or are, or ever hereafter has or have been, on or upon any portion of the rancho, known as the 'Ex-Mission of San Buena-ventura,' in the county of Ventura, state of California." This was nothing more than a transfer of an interest in personal property. But counsel for respondent seem to think that, because, at the time the transfer was made, a part of the property was on the lands of the appellant, now in controversy, the appellant is in some way estopped to claim title and possession to his land. But, as we have said, we see nothing in the deed which should estop the appellant from asserting and maintaining his present claim. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

EQUITY—PLEADING—RESULTING TRUSTS—FRAUD—RESCISSIION.

1. In a suit to declare a resulting trust in plaintiffs' favor arising out of fraud in the procurement of a conveyance of land, the complaint alleged that the title was vested in defendant by a conveyance from one who held the legal title as trustee and agent for plaintiffs, in which conveyance plaintiffs joined; that the consideration for the deed, which was absolute on its face, was $26,000, but that defendant agreed to pay $5,000 more thereafter, and to hold the land in trust, and at a future time sell it for a price satisfactory to both parties, under plaintiffs' supervision and control, and to divide the profits with them. It was alleged, however, the plaintiffs' agent and trustee told them that such was defendant's agreement, and it was not alleged that defendant ever made such agreement with plaintiffs, or that he authorized their said agent to do so. Held, that the complaint does not show facts sufficient to establish a trust on the ground of fraud.

2. Even had such trust been established by the allegations of the complaint, it could not be enforced in this suit where the complaint fails to allege that an opportunity had ever occurred to sell for a satisfactory price, or that plaintiffs had ever exercised their supervision and control with a view to effect a sale.

3. Such complaint shows no cause of action entitling plaintiffs to a decree that they are owners of the land, and that defendant's interest therein is that of a mortgagee, subject to their right to redeem, as it fails to show any obligation assumed by plaintiffs which the mortgage was given to secure.

4. Nor is it sufficient as a complaint for the rescission of the sale on the ground of fraud, as the only fraud alleged is not shown to be that of defendant, but of plaintiffs' agent.

5. Though the complaint alleges the intention and understanding of plaintiffs in the transaction, and the findings of the court are that such was in fact their intention and understanding, this does not entitle them to any relief, where it was not communicated to defendant, and his intention and understanding was different.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

D. M. Delmas, (T. M. Osment, W. F. Herrin, and H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for appellant. E. W. McKinstry, John J. Roche, Jas. J. Waymire, and Graves, Turner & Graves, (Haggin & Van Ness, of counsel,) for respondents.

Fox, J. 1. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the appellant for the relief demanded, or for the relief granted, or for any relief permissible under the allegations or within the prayer of the complaint. So far as the allegations of the complaint tend to show a cause of action against the appellant, it is in the form and nature of a bill in equity to declare and enforce a resulting trust, one claimed to have resulted by reason of fraud in the securing of a conveyance of real estate, but in the nature of an express trust, the object and purpose of which is definite and fixed, and one under which the rights of all the parties are alleged to have been made fixed and absolute by contract. The prayer is not either to declare or enforce the alleged trust, but to disregard it, and for a decree adjudging, in legal effect, that the appellant's title to the land is in the nature of a mortgage, and granting plaintiffs the right to redeem, and for such further conjunctive, not for such alternative, relief, as may be agreeable to equity. The relief granted disregards the allegations of the complaint, and follows the prayer.

(a) The complaint fails to show a case of resulting trust. It shows that the conveyance or instrument under which the title became vested in appellant is a deed absolute upon its face, for which appellant paid at the time a money consideration, amounting to nearly $26,000; that it was made, executed, and delivered by the holder of the legal title, who held it as trustee and agent of plaintiffs, and who, in executing it, was acting in pursuance of his trust, and within the scope of both his apparent and his actual authority as agent, and also by the plaintiffs themselves, the owners of the equitable title, and sole beneficiaries under the trust. They thereby attested, certified, and affirmed to the appellant the authority and power of their agent and trustee, and by the joint act of themselves and their trustee united and vested both the legal and the equitable title in the appellant. That trust was extinguished, and the entire estate in the lands became vested in the appellant. Welton v. Palmer, 39 Cal. 458. Was a new trust created? That is a question to be determined from the allegations of this complaint. When a deed is absolute in form, the intention appearing on its face ought to prevail, unless a different intention is made to appear so clearly as to leave no doubt upon the subject. Henley v. Hotelling, 41 Cal. 26, 27. This deed is attempted to be avoided by an effort to show that it was obtained by fraud, and under an express promise that the grantee would advance a further sum of $5,000, which he has not done, and would then hold the lands in trust, and at some future time, under the supervision and control of plaintiffs, would sell the same, and after deducting from the proceeds of the sale the sum of $25,906.77, the sum which he actually did pay, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, would pay to them one-half the remainder, less the said sum of $5,000, retaining the balance for his own use and benefit. But the complaint fails to show that the appellant and alleged trustee made any such promise or agreement, or accepted the deed under such or any trust. It shows that their own agent and trustee told the plaintiffs that such was the bargain, and that they acted on the faith of what he said, and trusting upon his honesty and fidelity in the premises; but it does not show that the grantee in the deed made any promise or agreement whatever, either of trust or for future advances, or that he had any knowledge of what their agent told them in the premises. The grantors in such a deed cannot avoid it on the ground that a third person practiced a fraud upon them, of which the grantee was ignorant, and more particularly so if, as in this case, that third person was their own agent. Deputy v. Stapleford, 19 Cal. 302; Insurance Co. v. McCormick, 45 Cal. 583; Stewart v. Whitlock, 58 Cal. 2; De Arnaz v. Escandon, 59 Cal. 486. If a fraud was committed upon the plaintiffs, it was committed, as shown by this complaint, by their own agent, and not by this appellant, and they (the plaintiffs) must suffer the consequences. Salter v. Baker, 54 Cal. 143. If deceived by their own agent, and loss results, it is theirs. Overacre v. Blake, 82 Cal. 77, 22 Pac. Rep. 979. "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer." Civil Code, § 3543. If there was fraud or wrong, it was the fraud or wrong of the agent of plaintiffs, and not of the defendant, (appellant here,) and the latter cannot be held responsible for it in the absence of any knowledge on his part that it was being committed. Overacre v. Blake, supra. Even if it be true, as alleged in the complaint, that the law firm of which Robinson, the trustee and agent of plaintiffs, was a member, were attorneys of appellant, it does not follow that he is chargeable with knowledge of the deceit practiced by Robinson upon his principals, if any, for he was not dealing with Robinson as an attorney at law, but as the holder of a title which he was buying, and who had full power to sell; and that he had such power was affirmed by the plaintiffs themselves. It is not claimed or pretended that Robinson was authorized by McLean to make any such representations as it is said he did make to plaintiffs; so that, even if Robinson was acting as attorney at law for McLean, and in that sense his agent, the latter can be chargeable with constructive notice only of such acts as were done within the scope of his apparent authority. There is nothing in the employment of a law firm which would give to one who was not acting as a lawyer in a given transaction of purchase and sale, but as the trustee, personal representative, and agent of another, even apparent authority to represent to his principal that the purchaser in that transaction was doing, or had promised to do, other or different from that which appeared upon the face of the papers as demanded by him to be done; and statements made by him in pais which would tend to show a transaction other or different from that shown by the papers would not be binding upon the purchaser. Wilson v. Railroad Co., 53 Cal. 736. The complaint, therefore, fails to show facts constituting a trust.

(b) If there is such a trust as declared upon, the complaint fails to show a present right of action to declare or enforce it, or that there ever can be a right of action to extinguish it in the manner prayed in the complaint, and attempted in the decree. If there is a trust such as declared, it is one which has vested the whole title, legal and equitable, in the appellant. Civil Code, § 863; Ward v. Waterman, 24 Pac. Rep. 930, (No. 12,662, filed September 5, 1890.) In the trust property, the plaintiffs have reserved no right whatever, present or future. No provision is made by which the property, or any part thereof, is ever to be returned to the plaintiffs. The only manner of executing the trust is to convert the property into money. When so converted, the plaintiffs will be interested in the net proceeds only, after first deducting the whole amount invested by appellant therein, with interest, and then only to the extent of one-half, the remaining half being still the property of appellant. The relief prayed, and the relief granted, would be in direct violation of the terms of the trust itself, as it is alleged to have been agreed upon by the parties. This trust, if enforced at all, must be enforced according to its terms. Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 93, 28 Cal. 316; Cowing v. Rogers, 34 Cal. 653; Sandloss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 489; Pujol v. McKinlay, 42 Cal. 559. Equity will furnish alternative relief where, and when only, the terms of the trust cannot be specifically enforced, as in the case of Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 426, 22 Pac. Rep. 180. In this case there is no attempt to show that the trust cannot be executed according to its terms. To disregard those terms, and grant the relief prayed, and attempted to be given, would be to deprive the appellant, who is himself a beneficiary under the alleged trust, of all the benefits thereby guaranteed to him, and to work a forfeiture of all his beneficial interest in the estate. This would not be equity but oppression, and a court of equity cannot lend itself to such a proceeding. Nor does the complaint show the plaintiffs entitled to any present relief under the alleged trust. The power and duty of the appellant was to sell, not to reconvey at any time or upon any terms. He was bound to sell only when he could realize a price satisfactory to both parties, and had power to sell only with the consent and under the supervision and control of plaintiffs. There is no averment that an opportunity has ever occurred when a satisfactory price could be realized, or that the plaintiffs have ever consented to sale, or that they have ever made an effort to effect a sale under their supervision or control. As to the $5,000 further advances, there is no allegation bringing home to appellant a promise to make such advance, or that he has ever been asked to make it, and the fact that it remains unpaid furnishes no ground of action in equity, whatever it might do at law.

(c) The complaint fails to show a cause of action for decree in the nature of declaring plaintiffs to be the owners, and the right of appellant that of a mortgagee with right in plaintiffs to redeem, as prayed and decreed. There is not and never has been a relation of debtor and creditor between these parties. There is no obligation of any character resting upon these plaintiffs, secured or to be secured by mortgage. Without such an obligation, there can be no mortgage. Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 28; Farmer v.

Grose, 42 Cal. 169; Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352. There is no pretense that the plaintiffs have ever promised to pay anything, or assumed any obligation whatever.

(d) It is claimed in argument that the action is for rescission, on the ground of fraud. That is not the relief demanded or granted, and the allegations of the complaint are insufficient to entitle plaintiffs to that relief. Rescission can be had in those cases only which are mentioned in section 1689, Civil Code, and in the manner prescribed in section 1691 of said Code. The fraud must be that of the party against whom the rescission is had, not that of him who seeks rescission, or of his agent or personal representative. As already shown, whatever of fraud or deceit is shown by this complaint was the fraud of the agent of plaintiffs. And, even if it be true that there was a failure to pay a part of the purchase price, that would not entitle the vendor to rescind the contract, and recover back the land. Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 134, 20 Pac. Rep. 382.

It follows from these conclusions that the demurrer to the complaints should have been sustained on the ground that it did not state sufficient facts, and it further follows that the complaint does not support the judgment.

2. It is also claimed by appellant that the plaintiffs' cause of action, if any they ever had, is barred by the statute of limitations. As we have held that no cause of action is stated, this point is, perhaps, at the present time unimportant. But, as it is possible that an attempt may be made to state a cause of action, we deem it best, without dwelling upon the point, to say that, in our judgment, the ruling of the court below upon this point was correct. The action was commenced within eight months after the date of the conveyance under which appellant claims. Three complaints have been filed, all based upon the same transaction, all praying for substantially the same relief, differing slightly in stating the terms of the alleged trust, the last one differing from the others mainly in being more specific in charging fraud, and stating the acts constituting the alleged fraud. But we do not think that it presents another and different cause of action, although it presents it in a somewhat different form.

3. The facts as found differ materially from those alleged in the complaint, only in this: The court expressly finds that McLean never did make to Robinson, or authorize Robinson to make to plaintiffs, the representations alleged in the complaint, or the promise to pay other or more than he did, or that he would take or hold the land in trust for any purpose whatever, or that he promised or intended to deal with the land in any other way than as an absolute purchase, but that each and every of such representations was made by Robinson to plaintiffs without the knowledge, consent, approval, or sanction of said McLean; that McLean was willing and anxious to purchase the lands absolutely, and pay the price therefor which he did pay, but was not willing, and never did intend, to deal with them in any other way, or to pay any greater price therefor, and that he intended, when he made the purchase, to hold and claim the lands absolutely; further, that Robinson has not now, and never has had, any interest in the said lands, by virtue of any contract between himself and McLean. Some of the other findings are not responsive to the issues in the cause, and as to them they must be disregarded. Counsel for respondents discuss with much force the inferences to be drawn from the finding of the court as to the relations existing between McLean and the law firm of Robinson, Olney & Byrne. That argument might with propriety be addressed to the court below, but it is too late to ask this court to draw inferences in direct conflict with the positive finding, the substance of which is given above. The court below had before it the evidence, such as it was, of the relations of those parties, and found on it, and still found positively and affirmatively, as a fact, that McLean never made any representations or promises as charged, and never authorized the making of any such representations or promises, or knew that such were made; and also found that the man who did make them was the agent and trustee of plaintiffs, and acting for them and on their behalf. It does say, in the third finding, that Robinson acted for and on behalf of McLean, as his agent, "as herein-after stated," but it does not "hereinafter," or anywhere, find or state any particular in which Robinson acted for or on behalf of McLean, or as his agent, and this simple expression in the third finding cannot be held to defeat the positive findings found in 15 and 16, the substance of which is above stated. There is nothing in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. Rep. 689, or Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 26, 18 Pac. Rep. 791, cited by respondents, to conflict with this view. For the reasons which we have given in point 1, if the findings had been in full accord with the allegations of the complaint, they would have been insufficient to support the judgment. With findings 15 and 16 so at variance with the allegations of the complaint, and so directly in favor of the appellant as they are, there seems to be nothing left for the judgment to stand upon. It is urged that the allegations of the complaint are in accordance with the intention and understanding of the plaintiffs at the time that they executed the deed, and that the findings accord with the complaint in that regard. Concede that to be true; it is still found that such was not the intention or understanding of the defendant McLean, against whom this judgment is rendered, and whose deed is here attempted to be set at naught. The mere intention of the plaintiffs, uncommunicated and unknown to the defendant, cannot control the plain letter of his deed, executed with all the formalities required by law. Stewart v. Whitlock, 58 Cal. 2. The court found, as alleged in the complaint, that the land was worth at the time of the conveyance the sum of $45,000, and it is urged that the inadequacy of consideration is itself evidence of fraud, for which the conveyance should be annulled, and the relief granted. This point is not well taken. Where a sale is made by a trustee, as was done in this case, and the approbation of the cestui que trust is manifested by his joining in the execution and acknowledgment of the deed, he cannot thereafter complain that there was no consideration for the conveyance. Welton v. Palmer, 39 Cal. 456. If he cannot complain that there was no consideration, much less can he do so for inadequacy of consideration. Want or insufficiency of consideration will not establish fraud per se. Gillan v. Metcalf, 7 Cal. 138; Horn v. Water Co., 13 Cal. 62; Thornton v. Hook, 36 Cal. 229, 230; Welton v. Palmer, supra; Goad v. Moulton, 67 Cal. 536, 8 Pac. Rep. 63. The plaintiffs have failed to allege, and the court has failed to find, facts constituting a fraud against which equity can relieve. Eliminating the allegations of fraud, plaintiffs have alleged, or attempted to allege, a contract which the court finds was never made. The court cannot make or enforce any other contract than the one declared upon. Congdon v. Chapman, 63 Cal. 359.

4. It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings. The conclusion we have reached on points 1 and 3 have rendered it unnecessary to consider this question. But we have looked into the evidence, and find that it fully justifies findings 15 and 16, above referred to, except that we see nothing to justify the sentence to the effect that, for the purpose of avoiding any notice of Robinson's trust and the equities of plaintiffs in the lands, defendant McLean refused to have any meeting or interview with plaintiffs, or either of them. And we find nothing in the evidence or in the findings to justify the conclusion "that the plaintiffs are the owners of the lands described in the complaint, and that the defendant McLean holds the legal title thereto in trust for the plaintiffs." The relief granted is not warranted by anything in the case, except the prayer of the complaint, and the prayer will not warrant any relief except such as is warranted by the allegations of the complaint, supported by the evidence and the findings. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment, on the ground that the relief granted by the decree goes beyond the allegations of the complaint. According to those allegations, the whole title was vested in the appellant. The respondents reserved no right in the real estate, present or future. Appellant was to sell the property, and, after repayment of the moneys expended and advanced by him, the profits arising from the proceeds were to be divided. There is nothing to show that the trust alleged cannot be enforced, the property sold, and the net proceeds divided. The property may have greatly appreciated in value since it was conveyed to appellant. If so, he is entitled to the benefit of a sale, which, under this decree, he would not receive.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from so much of the judgment rendered in the above-entitled cause, and considered in No. 13,991, this day decided, (ante, 427,) as requires the plaintiffs, as a condition of redeeming, to pay interest upon the amount determined in and by the said judgment to be due to said McLean. The terms of the contract and trust declared upon in the complaint cannot be complied with, without the payment of such interest, except it be by a sale of the land with the approval and consent of plaintiffs, for an amount which shall be found insufficient to pay both principal and interest. But as the entire judgment is reversed and set aside, by the decision in said case, No. 13,991, filed this day, there is nothing left to be determined upon this appeal, and the same is dismissed.

REAL-ESTATE BROKERS—COMMISSIONS.

1. In an action by real-estate brokers for commissions, it appeared that defendant placed with them for sale certain lands to be sold at $45 per acre net without the crops, or $47.50 per acre net with the crops, the brokers to have as commission any sum they could get above these figures. A written contract of sale, without reservation of crops, was made for a gross sum equal to $48.50 per acre, but the court found that the actual contract was a sale at $45 per acre without the crops, and it was so reported to defendant. The money was tendered, and a deed presented for execution, which, however, contained no reservation of the crops. Defendant made no objection on this account, and it was apparently taken for granted by all that the crops would not pass; but he absolutely refused to execute the deed, or pay the commission. Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover $3.50 per acre as commissions.

2. Whether plaintiff's exceeded their authority in making a contract of sale, instead of merely securing a purchaser, was immaterial in an action to recover their commission.

3. That the contract of sale called for a conveyance "free of all incumbrances" did not require a deed of general warranty against incumbrances, and, if it did, defendant cannot object on that ground, when the deed presented to him was only an ordinary grant deed, and he then made no objection either to the form of the contract or the deed.

4. The fact that the contract bound the purchaser to the payment of the price only by forfeiting a cash payment of $500 is immaterial, when it appears that a tender of the whole price was made.

5. The fact that cash was tendered obviates any objection on the ground that the contract of sale did not require cash payment.

6. The fact that cash was tendered prevents any defense on the ground that plaintiffs were not entitled to commissions until the price was paid.

7. The fact that the land belonged to defendant's wife is immaterial, since he gave it in for sale as his own, and plaintiffs were ignorant that it was not his.

insurance agents. They claim that the defendant employed them to sell for him certain real estate, on certain terms and conditions, which they fulfilled; but that, notwithstanding defendant's agreement to pay their commissions for making the sale which he authorized, he has refused to pay them, and, to recover what is due them, they have brought this suit. They recovered a judgment for the sum of $2,103.50, with interest thereon from the 5th day of May, 1887, and costs, from which, and an order refusing a new trial, this appeal is taken by the defendant. The contract, or agreement, under which the plaintiffs undertook to sell the land for the defendant, is as follows: "This writing, made this 15th day of April, A. D. 1887, witnesseth: That I, W. H. Soule, of the county of Yolo, in the state of California, have this day placed with Geo. D. Fiske & Co., for sale, the following property, of which I am the owner in fee, situate in section —, township —, range —, (see plat,) county of Yolo, and state of California, to-wit: Consisting of about 600 acres of land, being the southerly half of the tract known as the 'John M. Rhodes Rancho' in Capay valley. Price, $45.00 per acre (net) without crops, or $47.50 per acre (net) with the crop. Terms of payment as buyer and seller may agree. The said property to remain in the hands of Geo. D. Fiske & Co., for sale or exchange for thirty days from the date hereof, and I hereby agree that if, at the expiration of that time, five days' notice by me in writing of the withdrawal has not been given them, this agreement shall continue in full force until I give such notice, hereby authorizing Geo. D. Fiske & Co. to sell the aforesaid property and article, with purchaser for the same, as my agents, according to price and terms of payment above written, or any price or terms of payment which I may agree to take other than the above, and agreeing with them that, if the same be sold or exchanged during the time it is in their hands, no matter by whom, I will pay them a commission of all I receive over and above the price above mentioned on amount of said sale or exchange. And I further authorize Geo. D. Fiske & Co. to advertise the said property to the amount of $——. It is further understood by me, before signing this agreement, that Geo. D. Fiske & Co. will pay out of their commission all expenses of advertising done by them. W. H. SOULE. [Seal.] [Endorsed:] We hereby accept and agree to the terms of the within instrument this 15th day of April, A. D. 1887. GEO. D. FISKE & CO." The contract of sale which plaintiffs made with the purchaser is as follows: "$500.00. Received of John D. Stephens the sum of five hundred dollars, ($500,) the same being a part of the purchase money for the following described piece or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in Capay valley, Yolo county, Cal., formerly known as part of the 'John M. Rhodes Tract,' being the same land bought by me from John M. Rhodes, said land being bounded on the north and east by H. Hammel and Cache creek; on the south by Winters and Palmer; and on the west by the west line of the Rancho Canada De Capay,—containing 500 acres of land. The remaining portion of the purchase money, to-wit, the sum of $23,600.00, to be paid on or before the 12th day of May, 1887, by John D. Stephens or his assigns. In consideration of which the said land is to be conveyed free of all incumbrances to the said John D. Stephens or his assigns. Dated, Woodland, Cal., April 23, 1887. W. H. SOULE. By Geo. D. FISKE & Co., his agents." The defendant refused to convey the property, after a tender of the money specified in this agreement, and also refused to pay the plaintiffs their commissions.

It is contended by the appellant that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover because the contract of sale was for $45 per acre with the crops, when the limit of their authority to sell was for that price without the crops, and $47.50 per acre with the crops; but the sale was made for a sum in gross which amounted to more than $47.50 per acre. There was 601 acres of land, and it was sold for $29,100, which amounted to $48.41 per acre; so that, conceding that the contract of sale included the crops growing on the land, the sale was for more than the highest amount the plaintiffs were required to sell for, and the sale was not beyond their authority. The sale agreed upon was for $48.50 per acre, supposing that there were 600 acres of the land, but it turned out that there were 601 acres. And when a tender was made to the defendant, it was for $48.50 more than the written agreement called for, so as to cover the agreed price for the additional one acre. The court below found, however, that the sale was for $45 per acre without the crops, and there was evidence to support this finding so far as the verbal agreement between the plaintiffs and the purchaser was concerned, but not as to the written contract between them. The contract bound the defendant to convey the land without any reservation of the crops. This written contract was binding on the defendant, if the plaintiffs had the power to make it, unless corrected on the ground that by mistake it was not in accordance with the agreement actually made. Under its finding that the land was sold for $45 per acre without the crops, the court allowed the plaintiffs, as commissions, the difference between that sum and the sum of $29,148.50. The plaintiffs were bound by their agreement to account to the defendant for $47.50 per acre, if the crops went with the land, and were only entitled to the balance of the purchase price over and above that sum as their commissions, unless the defendant waived the form in which the agreement to sell and the deed tendered to him were made. We have seen that, by the terms of the written agreement, the crops must go with the land. Therefore, the amount found in favor of the plaintiffs was excessive to the amount of $2.50 per acre upon the 601 acres of the land, if this written agreement was to be looked to alone. It may be that, if the actual agreement was as claimed by the plaintiffs, and a tender and a demand for a deed containing a reservation of the growing crops had been made, the plaintiffs could recover the full amount claimed in any event, but this does not appear to have been done. But there is another ground upon which we think the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the whole amount of their commissions. The sale was reported to the defendant as a sale at $45 per acre without the crops. He asked the plaintiffs to sell the crops to the parties for $2.50 per acre if possible. The plaintiffs consented, and attempted to do so, but the purchasers stated that they did not want the crops, and refused to buy them. The form of deed presented to the defendant, when a conveyance was demanded of him, was an ordinary grant deed without any reservation of the crops. But the defendant did not refuse to consummate the trade on the ground that the deed was not in proper form, or on the ground that the sale was not in accordance with the written authority given by him. The evidence shows clearly that it was the understanding of all the parties, the purchaser included, that the crops were not to pass. If any such objection had been made, there can be no doubt that a deed containing the necessary reservation would have been accepted. It seems not to have been observed by any of the parties at the time that the contract of sale or the deed proffered were not in the form necessary to carry out the agreement of the parties. The defendant refused absolutely to consummate the sale or to negotiate with reference to it. It is perfectly apparent that the fact that the contract and deed were not in proper form had nothing whatever to do with his refusal to execute the deed. This being the case, he should not be allowed to offer that as an excuse for not complying with his contract by way of defense to this action.

It is contended by the appellant that the contract given by the defendant to the plaintiffs did not authorize the plaintiffs to sell the land or to bind the defendant by their agreement to sell it, but only to secure a purchaser. This might be material if the action were by the purchaser to enforce a specific performance of the agreement to convey, but it is wholly immaterial in this case whether the power of the plaintiffs was to sell or merely to procure a purchaser. They complied with their part of the contract. If the defendant did not see proper to convey to the purchaser they had procured, this was no reason why he should not pay their commissions. It is immaterial that the plaintiffs in their complaint construed and treated this as a power to sell, even conceding that it was not. The contract was set out and made a part of the complaint, and entitled them to whatever was authorized by its terms and the facts proved. The allegations were sufficient to entitle them to recover as mere brokers. Dolan v. Scanlan, 57 Cal. 261. It is claimed by the appellant that the authority given by the contract was revoked before the sale was made; but the court found to the contrary, and there was evidence to support the finding.

It is further contended that the contract of sale was not within the power of the plaintiffs because it required the defendant to convey by general warranty against all incumbrances. But the evidence shows that, when the tender was made, no such deed was demanded, nor do we think the contract required any such deed. The deed demanded was, as we have said, an ordinary grant deed, and its form was not objected to, nor was there any claim that the property was incumbered, or that there was any reason why the plaintiff could not or should not execute such a deed. It is also insisted that the contract was unfair and not mutual, because the purchaser was not bound, in any way, to pay the purchase money, except by a forfeiture of the $500 cash payment. But this, if so, is immaterial. The whole purchase money was tendered to the defendant when a deed was demanded of him, and before this commission was demanded. It is further claimed that the sale was not made within the time limited by the contract. This is based upon the assumption that payment of the purchase money was necessary to constitute a sale, which is not necessarily so. The purchaser could not be expected to pay the purchase money before receiving a conveyance. Counsel say that the contract required a sale for cash. This we think is not so. By the terms of the contract the terms of payment were to be "as buyer and seller may agree." If this is to be construed as reserving to the defendant the right to agree in person upon the terms of payment, it is still clear that it did not impose upon the plaintiffs the duty of selling for cash. Besides, there could be no reasonable objection to the terms of payment when cash was tendered, and no such objection was made to the consummation of the sale.

Again, it is contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover until the purchase money was paid. It may be conceded that this would be so if the purchaser had failed to pay the purchase money, but the defendant could hardly defend on this ground when the purchase money was not paid, solely because he refused to accept it. It appears from the evidence that the title to the property was not in the defendant, but in his wife. This was not material. He gave it to the plaintiffs to sell as his property, so stated in his contract, and the evidence is to the effect and the court found that the plaintiffs had no knowledge, until after they had made the sale, that the title was not in him. Under such circumstances his want of title could not affect the plaintiffs' right to recover their commissions. The court found on all the material issues. All of the findings necessary to a recovery are sustained by the evidence, and they support the judgment. Judgment and order affirmed.

HAVEMEYER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 13,709.)

CONTEMPT—WRIT OF PROHIBITION—RECEIVERS.

1. Under a writ of prohibition to a judge enjoining him from interfering with petitioners' possession of certain property, either through a certain receiver appointed by him or otherwise, the judge is guilty of contempt if the receiver acts in violation of the writ, and the judge, with knowledge of the receiver's proceedings, refrains from exercising his power to control them.

2. Where the appointment of a receiver is void as being in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and the receiver is advised by a preliminary writ of prohibition that the validity of the proceedings in the matter of the receivership are challenged on jurisdictional grounds, the receiver, having at the time of the service of such writ at most only a mixed or scrambling possession of the property, will be guilty of contempt in thereafter interfering with the possession of petitioners contrary to the terms of the writ.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Proceedings to punish for contempt. For decision on application for writ of prohibition, see 24 Pac. Rep. 121.

BEATTY, C. J. The application for a peremptory writ of prohibition herein, and the charge that the judge of the superior court and his receiver had violated the injunction contained in the preliminary or alternative writ, and had thereby committed a contempt, were heard and submitted together. In our opinion filed at the time of deciding the cause, (see 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. Rep. 121,) we stated very fully all the facts necessary to be considered in deciding upon the charge of contempt, excepting only those relating to the character and extent of Mr. Reddy's possession of the refinery, etc., at the time he was served with the alternative writ. Avoiding, as far as possible, any repetition of that statement, we proceed to consider whether the charge of contempt has been made out. That Mr. Reddy did interfere with the possession and control by petitioners of the refinery and other property claimed by them in their own right, and described in our writ; that he did interfere with the conduct and business of the same; and that he did continue to exercise with respect thereto all the powers granted in the order appointing him receiver, after service of our writ,—is conceded; and it is also conceded that the judge of the superior court, after like notice, entirely and purposely abstained from any interference with his proceedings. But it is contended in behalf of the receiver that before he had any notice of our order he was in complete and absolute possession of all the property claimed by the respondents, and that his subsequent dealings with it were only such as were necessarily incumbent upon him by reason of such possession. In behalf of the judge it is claimed that the effect of our writ was to deprive him of all control and direction of the receiver, and, consequently, to absolve him from any responsibility for his acts. This claim of exemption from responsibility on the part of the judge cannot be allowed. The object and purpose of our order and writ, expressed in the plainest terms, (84 Cal. 351, 24 Pac. Rep. 121,) was to restrain the action of the court. It was addressed directly to the judge, and only indirectly, through him, to the receiver. Both were bound by it, but it was nevertheless the duty of the principal to see that the agent obeyed it, and, whatever the receiver did in violation of its terms, the judge must answer for, if, with knowledge of his agent's proceedings, he refrained from exercising his undoubted power to control them. And such, as we have seen, is the case. The whole matter to be determined, therefore, is the correctness of the receiver's position; i. e., that he was in full possession before he had any notice of the injunction, and that he did nothing thereafter except to preserve things in statu quo. He contends that from the afternoon of February 17th he was in full, complete, and absolute possession of the refinery, shops, and offices, and was only impeded and interrupted in his control of some of the personal property therein. The assumption, however, upon which he builds his entire argument is that he was acting under a valid appointment, and had a lawful right to do everything that he attempted to do; and, since its basis is swept away, there is little left of the argument. We have decided—and we have no doubt of the correctness of that decision—that the appointment of Mr. Reddy, and all the proceedings in the matter of the receivership, were void. Therefore, when he entered into the refinery, shops, and offices, he did so as a mere trespasser, without any lawful warrant whatsoever, and all his acts in attempting to obtain possession must be viewed in that light.

We do not wish to be understood as conceding that Mr. Reddy's acts, even if his appointment had been valid, would have been entirely justifiable. We are not called upon to decide how summarily a receiver lawfully appointed may proceed in wresting the possession of property, specifically described in the order appointing him, out of the hands of strangers to the action claiming it in their own right. We had supposed that in such case it would be his duty to abstain from the exercise of anything like force; that, if he found the claim of ownership and possession by a third party to be made in good faith, he would report the matter to the court, and, if he proceeded further, do so only by an action for the recovery of the property, if he was satisfied that such claim was a sham, and the possession by such stranger held by collusion with (or as a mere agent or servant of) a party bound by the order, that he would still report the facts to the court, and have the persons resisting his authority cited to answer for contempt; and that after a hearing upon the citation the court would not, unless in a plain case, order a writ of assistance to dispossess such parties, but would direct an action to be brought so that their rights might be fully and fairly litigated. But, as we have said, these are matters which we are not called upon to decide here, and we have given this very general expression of our views only in order not to seem to acquiesce in the proposition so strenuously urged by counsel to the effect that in the case supposed it is the right and duty of the receiver to take the property regardless of the claims and possession of third parties; that it is their duty to yield unquestioning obedience to his commands, surrender possession of the property, and petition the court for leave to sue for its recovery. The question here is much simpler. It is whether Mr. Reddy and his men, regarded as mere naked trespassers, entering without any sort of lawful warrant, had, prior to the hour of 3 o'clock P. M., on February 18th, succeeded in ousting the petitioners from their lawful possession of the refinery, shops, etc., and in gaining so full and complete a possession themselves as to justify their subsequent proceedings. The testimony bearing upon this point is quite voluminous, and to some extent conflicting, though not more so than might naturally have been expected, considering the opposite points of view from which the occurrences at the refinery were viewed by those who participated in and have testified regarding them. It appears that Mr. Reddy, armed with the commission from the superior court, and attended by a number of men, acting in obedience to his orders, entered the refinery on the afternoon of February 17th, stated the authority under which he assumed to act, declared himself in possession, ordered the superintendent of the works to shut them down, disposed his men about the building, and stopped the delivery of sugar then in progress. The superintendent, however, refused to take any orders from Mr. Reddy, referred him to Mr. Mott, the general agent of the petitioners, and asserted their claims to the property. There is no doubt that the superintendent and his foreman were, to some extent, intimidated by the sudden irruption of Mr. Reddy and his men, and the threat of arrest and punishment if they refused to submit, and, no doubt, they did make use of various temporizing expedients in order to maintain their ground without resorting to open and violent resistance, but they neither left the building nor acknowledged Mr. Reddy's authority. The dispute ended at last in a sort of truce for the night, both parties remaining on the ground, the superintendent being allowed until next day to take legal advice and determine whether he would yield the possession or not. Acting upon the advice he received, the superintendent notified Mr. Reddy the next day that he would continue to resist him by all means short of force, whereupon Mr. Reddy applied to the court for the assistance of the sheriff. In the affidavit which he presented to the court for that purpose, and which was, as is evident, framed upon his theory as to the validity of his appointment, and the entire regularity of his proceedings, he states that he has entered into possession of the refinery, but that H. C. Mott and R. H. Sprague (the general agent and superintendent of petitioners) are impeding, hindering, and delaying him in the discharge of his duties as receiver, and are refusing to allow him to take into his possession and control certain property situate on the premises. This affidavit, as an assertion of possession, is almost felo de se in itself, and would have been quite so if it had disclosed the further and undisputed fact that Mott and Sprague were really impeding and hindering the receiver by their assertion of and their attempt to uphold the possession and right of the petitioners. Evidently, too, the superior judge attached less importance to the legal conclusion stated in the affidavit than to the facts by which it was qualified; for, by the terms of his order to the sheriff, that officer was commanded to do what was necessary to place Mr. Reddy in exclusive, full, and complete possession. The sheriff, in the return which he subsequently made of this order, seems to have fallen back on the theory of the affidavit, that Mr. Reddy was in possession of the refinery, though impeded and interfered with by certain persons whom he found on the premises, and who at his request retired therefrom, leaving Mr. Reddy in peaceful, undisputed, and undisputed possession. He does not disclose who these persons were, but the testimony shows that the superintendent and foreman of the refinery were meant. When Mr. Reddy and the sheriff came back on the 18th, armed with a new order, Mr. Sprague and his foreman did retire from the building in obedience to their demand, but almost immediately returned. There is a conflict of testimony as to the terms upon which they re-entered. Mr. Reddy's testimony, in which he is corroborated by others, is that they came back at his request to take care of the large amount of sugar then in solution, under a promise to obey his orders, and shut down the works as speedily as that could be done without too serious loss. They, on the other hand, claimed that they only promised not to oppose Mr. Reddy's orders, and declared their purpose to remain on the premises in the interest of the petitioners, and in their pay. It is not necessary, in our opinion, to reconcile this conflict in the testimony, which in all probability is mainly due to the different construction given by the two parties to what was actually said. We will assume that the arrangement was such as Mr. Reddy states it to have been, for even then he did not get complete possession. The only two persons removed from the premises, or who acknowledged Mr. Reddy's authority, were Mr. Sprague and his foreman. Mr. Mott, the general agent, was in a position of authority over them, and over more than a hundred other employes then on the premises, none of whom were removed, and none of whom ever received or obeyed any order from Mr. Reddy before he was enjoined, and all of whom continued thereafter in the pay and service of the petitioners. Mr. Mott, it is true, was not at the refinery while the sheriff was there, but he had been there before, resisting Mr. Reddy, and he returned afterwards, and renewed his resistance, so that Mr. Reddy was compelled to remove him by force,—a very gentle force, it is true, but it would no doubt have been greater if there had been greater resistance. In the meantime Mr. Reddy had been served with our writ, and Mr. Sprague had disclaimed his authority, and contrary to his orders had put a large additional amount of sugar in solution. This being the facts, it is clear that there was, in the best view for the respondents, a mixed and scrambling possession of the refinery, in which case the legal seisin, as it always does, attached itself to the right of possession. The result was that Mr. Reddy found himself in the position of being obliged to decide, at his peril, whether his authority was valid or not, and, as soon as service was made upon the superior judge, at a later hour on the same day, he was placed in the same position. A copy of the petition for the writ of prohibition, our order for the writ, and the writ itself, were all served together, and by them the respondents were fully advised that the validity of their proceedings was challenged upon jurisdictional grounds, and that until our further order they must suspend their proceedings against the property described in the writ. Their claim to be in possession of the refinery, and especially their right to discharge the superintendent of the petitioners, and put another in his place, stop the delivery of sugar, and close down the works, depended upon the jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. If that proceeding was void, they were bound to withdraw from the refinery, shops, office, etc., and leave the petitioners unmolested. If, on the other hand, the appointment of the receiver was valid, they might maintain the status quo, and perhaps were justified in doing the other things above mentioned. Being in this situation, they did right in taking legal advice, but the fact that they did so, and acted upon it in good faith, does not wholly relieve them from the consequences of the actual disobedience of which they were guilty. They were advised that the possession of the receiver was lawful and complete, and that he must do all that he subsequently did. They were also advised that the superior judge could not interfere with or control the acts of the receiver pending the hearing of the cause. This advice was erroneous, but we have no doubt that it was given, accepted, and acted upon in good faith, and, therefore, that the respondents, though technically guilty of contempt, did not intend any disrespect to the court, or any infraction of its orders, and that they should not be punished otherwise than by a nominal fine. The finding of the court is that William T. Wallace, judge of the superior court, and Patrick Reddy, Esq., did on the 18th day of February, 1890, and on various days thereafter, violate our injunction herein issued and served on said 18th day of February, 1890, by continuing in and about the refinery and other property in said writ described, and by interfering with the petitioners in the conduct of their business therein, and did thereby disobey our lawful order and writ, and were therein guilty of a contempt of this court. Wherefore it is ordered that said William T. Wallace and Patrick Reddy be, and each of them is, hereby fined in the sum of $10.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. There is no evidence of contempt committed by either party in this case.

BISHOP v. MCKINLEY, Judge. (No. 13,845.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—JURISDICTION—PROHIBITION—SEWERS.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. pt. 8, tit. 7, regulating proceedings had in the exercise of eminent domain, provides, in section 1243, that "all proceedings under this title must be brought in the superior court of the county in which the property is situated;" and section 1238 provides that the power may be exercised for the sewerage of any incorporated city, among other purposes. The municipal corporation act of March 13, 1883, c. 7, § 870, provides that when it is necessary that the city shall take private property for a sewer, "and the board of trustees cannot agree with the owner thereof as to the price to be paid, the trustees may direct proceedings to be had," etc. Held, that the authority of the superior court to entertain such proceedings is derived from the Code and not from the municipal corporation act, and hence the absence of the circumstances under which that act authorizes such proceedings to be had goes to the right of the trustees to maintain them, and not to the jurisdiction of the court.

2. In such proceedings to condemn the right of way for a sewer, the fact that inability to agree with the owner of the land as to the price, and an order from the trustees to begin the proceedings, are not alleged, or are not proved, is no ground for application for the writ of prohibition, but its effect is for the determination of the trial court on demurrer or plea.

Garber, Boalt & Bishop, (Stephen M. White, of counsel,) for appellant. John Haynes and Thomas Mitchell, for respondent.

FOX, J. This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, McKinley, Judge, from further proceedings against the petitioner, in a certain action pending in that court, wherein the city of Pasadena, is plaintiff, and the petitioner herein, and several other persons, including the county of Los Angeles, are defendants, brought for the purpose of acquiring by condemnation a right of way for a sewer along and in certain of the county roads of said county of Los Angeles. The city of Pasadena is a municipal corporation of the sixth class, organized and existing under the provisions of chapter 7 of the act of the legislature, entitled "An act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations," approved March 13, 1883. For the purpose of providing drainage for the city, and protecting the health of the inhabitants thereof, she has devised and adopted a system of sewerage, and secured a considerable tract of land situate outside of, and a considerable distance from, the corporation, as a place for the discharge of the sewage of the city, called the "Sewer Farm," and has commenced the construction of a main sewer through certain streets of the city, and contemplates continuing the same through certain of the public highways of the county, from the city to said sewer farm. The right of way has been granted by the board of supervisors of the county for said sewer, through the necessary highways, for a portion of the distance, but there is one highway through which the city authorities declare that it is necessary to construct the same, the fee of which is not vested in the county, but the county has a grant of the same "for the purposes of a highway, but for no other purpose;" or in other words, a mere easement, and to secure the right of way for this sewer in that highway, which constitutes a part of the route of the sewer, the action was brought, the further prosecution of which it is now sought to prohibit. It is claimed on the part of the petitioner here, who is the owner of a tract of land situate on the east side of the road or highway along which the right of way is sought to be secured by condemnation, and who owns the fee to the center of the road, and covering that part of the road-way in front of her lot under which the sewer is to be laid, that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the case, or to render or enforce any judgment therein, because it is not alleged or shown that the city authorities were unable to agree with her for the right of way, and because it does not appear from the record of the proceedings of the city council that it ever authorized the commencement of the action.

The question then is whether the absence of the existence, or the want of averment or proof, of these two facts, or either of them, deprives the court below, respondent here, of all jurisdiction to entertain, hear, or determine the action, or whether they simply go to the question of the right of the plaintiff in the action to institute and maintain the same, and to recover therein. If they deprive the court of jurisdiction to entertain the action, and to hear and determine the rights of the parties therein, so that it is acting upon the complaint filed therein wholly without jurisdiction, then it would seem that the petitioner here might be entitled to relief by prohibition; but if, on the other hand, it has jurisdiction to entertain the action for condemnation so commenced before it, and these are merely questions, upon which, among others, it may be called upon to adjudicate in the course of the proceeding before it, then the mere fact that it reaches an erroneous conclusion upon these questions, or either of them, will not entitle plaintiff to the writ of prohibition, but the error, if it be one, will be subject to review upon appeal. Chapter 7 of the municipal incorporation act referred to is the one which provides for the organization, powers, and government of municipalities of the sixth class. Section 862 of that act, found in that chapter, (St. 1883, p. 269,) gives to the board of trustees power * * * to construct, establish, and maintain drains and sewers. Section 870, (page 273,) so far as it relates to the subject-matter of this question, reads as follows: "Whenever it shall become necessary for the city or town to take or damage private property for the purpose of * * * rights of way for drains, sewers, and aqueducts, * * * and the board of trustees cannot agree with the owner thereof as to the price to be paid, the trustees may direct proceedings to be taken, under section one thousand two hundred and thirty-seven and following sections, to and including section one thousand two hundred and sixty-three of the Code of Civil Procedure, to procure the same." Petitioner insists most strenuously that it is from this section that the court derives its jurisdiction to entertain a proceeding for condemnation, for such a purpose, at the suit of such a corporation, and that if the complaint fails to show, or, showing it, upon the trial, the plaintiff fails to prove an attempt and inability to agree, and an order of the trustees to prosecute the action, the court is entirely without jurisdiction in the premises. We cannot accede to this proposition. The superior court is a court of general jurisdiction. By section 5 of article 6 of the constitution, it is specially provided that it shall have jurisdiction "of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for." Part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for "special proceedings of a civil nature." Title 7 of that part is devoted specially to the making of provision for proceedings had in the exercise "of eminent domain." It constitutes the general law of the state upon that subject, and expressly provides that the right of the people or government to take private property for public use may be exercised in the manner provided in that title. Section 1243, found in that title, provides that "all proceedings under this title must be brought in the superior court of the county in which the property is situate." They must be commenced by the filing of a complaint, and issuing a summons thereon. Section 1238 defines the purposes for which the power may be exercised, and among these is "sewerage of any incorporated city." It is from the constitution, the provisions of which are repeated in section 76, Code Civil Proc., and from title 7, pt. 3, of said Code, and not from any section or provision of the municipal government act, that the superior court derives its jurisdiction in and over proceedings had in the exercise of the power of eminent domain. The provisions of the last-named act may affect the question of the right of the municipality to maintain its action, and secure in the court the relief demanded; but they do not affect the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine all questions that may arise between the parties in such proceeding.

Counsel have cited very many cases in support of the proposition that the fact of inability to agree, and express authorization to institute the proceeding, are jurisdictional, and go to the power of the court itself to hear and determine the case. But most of them are cases where the proceeding was not only special, and not according to the usual course of civil procedure, as it is here, but also before tribunals which were themselves special, and of limited jurisdiction. Not one of them, so far as we have been able to find, challenges the power of a court of general jurisdiction to hear and determine, in such a proceeding, the question of the right of parties to maintain the action, and secure the relief, under statutory provisions like that above quoted from the municipal government act. The rulings made in the cases cited were made, not upon application for prohibition, but upon appeal, or, when the proceeding was before a tribunal of special and limited jurisdiction, upon certiorari. The complaint in the condemnation proceeding here sought to be prohibited is in strict conformity with the provisions of section 1244, Code Civil Proc., and contains everything that is there required. If it be true, that the absence of either averment or proof of attempt and inability to agree, or of express direction by the local board to institute and prosecute the proceeding, bars the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, or to recover the relief sought, that would seem to be a matter of defense, either by demurrer or by plea, and in such case the court before which the proceeding is prosecuted would be the one to pass upon the question so raised, in the first instance. Error in such determination would be subject to review upon appeal, but it would be merely error in the exercise of jurisdiction, and would not entitle the party aggrieved to prohibition. We are not called upon, or authorized, in this proceeding, to determine whether a ruling either way upon such a question would be error; that must be determined when the case comes here in proper form. All that we need now determine is that, if error, it does not furnish ground for prohibition. Upon this proposition, the case of State v. Valliant, 13 S. W. Rep. 398, seems to be much in point. We quote the statement as to what the case was, and as to what the court said on the subject, from petitioner's reply brief: "A certain railroad company sought to condemn part of the track of another by proceedings taken in the circuit court of St. Louis. The defendant company applied for a writ of prohibition, on the ground that the statutes and ordinances of St. Louis did not authorize the exercise of jurisdiction in eminent domain there invoked in favor of the company invoking it." Upon the application for prohibition the court held: "That the circuit court of St. Louis had jurisdiction of proceedings to appropriate property to public use, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, in a proper case, is unquestioned and unquestionable; but the substance of the petitioner's contention here, as well as the ground on which they, as defendants, resisted the proceedings in the circuit court, is that the statutes and ordinances do not authorize the exercise of such jurisdiction in behalf of the Southern Railroad Company. We are of opinion that the question thus raised is not a proper one for our decision upon this application. Where the action or course which the court is about to adopt, is such as it has lawful power to take, it should not ordinarily be prohibited from taking it. Whether the particular facts on which the court proceeds in that regard are or are not sufficient to justify its exercise of jurisdiction is a question of law, the solution of which, either way, cannot impair the court's right to apply its judicial power in the premises according to its view of the law, and of the facts before it." This quotation, taken from the petitioner's own brief, would seem to be conclusive against her in this proceeding. Nor is there anything in any of the cases cited from this court in conflict with this view. We have examined them all, and in every case but one, where the court has discussed the point here contended for by petitioner, it was upon appeal, and the question was whether the court below had erred in its determination of this question of law, not in exercising jurisdiction to determine upon it. In the one case of Mahoney v. Supervisors, 53 Cal. 384, the proceeding was for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors to act upon the appointment of commissioners made by the mayor and others to condemn certain water-rights. The petitioner, who claimed to be the owner of the property which was to be condemned, failed to show that he had ever offered to sell at any price. The statute and the tribunal were both special and local, and the act provided for the appointment of commissioners only in case the municipal authorities, who had not only the authority to purchase, but to select the commissioners in case the property could not be acquired by negotiation. The court refused to grant the writ. We do not see that the case is at all in point. Petitioner relies upon the decision of this court recently made in the case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 24 Pac. Rep. 121, as decisive of the question of her right to the writ of prohibition in this case. The cases are not at all parallel. In the Havemeyer Case, the proceeding in the court below was one taken on behalf of the state to secure a decree declaring the corporate franchise of a private corporation forfeited, and for a statutory penalty for violation of its charter. Upon the application for prohibition in this court, no question was made as to the jurisdiction of the court below to hear and determine the action which was brought before it, and in it to determine every question that was raised affecting the rights of the parties to the action, in the subject-matter thereof. And this court, in passing upon the application, expressly declared, in substance, that it did not pass upon the jurisdiction, or the regularity of the proceedings of the court below, in hearing and determining the case before it, or in enforcing the judgment which it had rendered. The proceeding to which the judgment of, and the writ granted by, this court was directed was one had after judgment in the matter of appointing a receiver with express direction to seize and take into his possession certain property not involved in the action in which the court had pronounced its judgment, and which was at the time in the possession of, and claimed to be owned by, persons who were not parties to that action, and who consequently had no day in court, and no right of appeal. In this case the petitioner is a party defendant in the action pending in the court below, and is actively prosecuting her defense, with a right to have any ruling which may be made in that court reviewed here on appeal. In the view we take of the case, she is not entitled to the relief here demanded. The writ must be denied, and the order heretofore made herein, staying proceedings in the court below, vacated. So ordered.

FEEES OF REFEREE.

1. A referee will not be permitted to exact exorbitant fees under color of a contract, under Code Civil Proc. Mont. § 501, providing that the fees of referees shall be eight dollars a day to each, "but the parties may agree in writing upon any other rate of compensation, and thereupon such rate shall be allowed."

2. The parties having agreed to pay the referee $18 for each day's attendance, and $.20 for each folio of transcript, and $.10 for each folio of copy, his compensation is reduced to $8 per day.

Motion of contestant to retax costs of referee. For opinion on the merits, see ante, 101.

Chas. O'Donnell, for contestant. McCutcheon & McIntire and B. Platt Carpenter, for respondents.

BLAKE, C. J. A motion has been filed to retax the fees claimed by the referee in these proceedings. This officer, who was also a stenographer, has been paid for his services, under an agreement entered into by the parties hereto, the following sums: For each day's attendance, $18; each folio of the transcript, $.20; each folio of copies, $.10. The statute which regulates this matter is as follows: "The fees of referees shall be eight dollars to each for every day spent in the business of the reference; but the parties may agree in writing upon any other rate of compensation, and thereupon such rate shall be allowed." Code Civil Proc. § 501. The charges for each folio of the transcript and copies are in excess of what is allowed by law for the same work by other persons. The statute under consideration should be construed to give an officer of this court the right to demand and receive a reasonable compensation, and he should not be permitted to take advantage of his trust, and obtain an exorbitant amount, under the color of a contract. A referee does not render more valuable services than the judges of the courts of the state. The compensation of the referee should be fixed at the sum of eight dollars for each day's attendance, which is sufficient under the circumstances; and it is so ordered.

STATE V. CHANDONETTE.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Dec. 1, 1890.)

APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES—REVIEW—SODOMY—INDICTMENT.

1. On an appeal from a conviction for felony, this court will strike from the transcript evidence not contained in a bill of exceptions, nor in any way identified as the minutes of the court, and it not appearing that the evidence in the transcript was before the court on the motion for a new trial.

2. The ordinary common-law indictment for the infamous offense against nature is sufficient.

Chas. O'Donnell, for appellant. Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

DE WITT, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction for the infamous crime against nature, and thereby as well from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The evidence was brought here in the transcript, but that evidence was not contained in a bill of exceptions, nor is it in any way identified or authenticated as the minutes of the court, nor does it appear that it was before the district court on the motion for a new trial, nor is it before this court in any manner provided by the law or practice in this state. The evidence was therefore ordered stricken out, on the motion of the attorney general. This order practically emasculates the appeal, as the only point pressed by appellant in his brief in which there was the appearance of merit is an alleged fatal variance between the indictment and the proof, or rather, perhaps, that there was no evidence of the crime charged in the indictment. As we have not the evidence, we cannot consider this point.

All that remains of the appeal are objections to the indictment. That pleading is the ordinary common-law indictment, which is approved by all the writers and precedents, and against the validity of which no authorities are cited or argument made. It is our opinion that the indictment is good. The defendant was sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, the minimum term under the statute. With a sentence of this severity, and with the moral infamy involved in the conviction, it is a matter of regret to this court that the appeal was not so prosecuted that the court could inquire into the merits of the conviction.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Oct. 27, 1890.)

ISSUANCE OF EXECUTION—MOTION FOR LEAVE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. Code Civil Proc. Mont. § 312, provides that "the party in whose favor a judgment is given may, at any time within 6 years after the entry thereof, issue a writ of execution, as prescribed in this chapter." This section originally read "5 years" after and was amended to read "6 years" after the adoption of section 349, which provides that, "after 5 years from the entry of the judgment, an execution can only be issued by leave of court on motion," "but the leave shall not be necessary when execution has been issued within the 5 years." Section 307 provides that a judgment shall be a lien for six years after its docketing, and section 41 limits to six years an action on a judgment. Section 410 abolishes the writ of scire facias, and provides that "the remedies obtainable in that form may hereafter be obtained by civil action." Held that, after six years from the entry of a judgment, no leave to issue execution could be granted.

2. The motion for leave to issue execution must be called to the attention of the court within the six years. It is not sufficient merely to file the written motion, with affidavits in support thereof, within the time limited. Following Wallace v. Lewis, 24 Pac. Rep. 22.

3. An amended statute is to be construed as if it had read from the beginning as it does as amended.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; WILLIAM H. HUNT, Judge.

This is an appeal from a special order made after final judgment refusing plaintiff leave to issue execution upon a judgment. The following are the facts: On December 8, 1883, judgment was duly entered against defendants, in favor of plaintiff, for $1,161.40, costs, etc. January 15, 1884, execution was issued, and on August 6, 1884, was returned wholly unsatisfied. On December 2, 1889, an affidavit was filed by plaintiff showing that the judgment remained unsatisfied, and other facts, as required by section 349, Code Civil Proc., cited below, and therewith, on the same day, a written motion "for leave to issue execution against the defendants, said motion being based upon the affidavit herewith filed." Nothing further was done until December 16, 1889, when the following was filed: "To Cornelius L. Vawter, etc.: You, and each of you, will please take notice that ten days after the service of this notice upon you, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, the undersigned, the attorneys for plaintiff in the above-entitled action, will move the court for an order granting plaintiff leave to issue an execution upon the said defendants." Signed by plaintiff's attorneys. This notice was served on defendant Vawter, December 16th. It is not apparent when this motion was brought to the attention of the court. It was denied March 20, 1890. It does, however, appear from the record that the court was not moved, the application to the court was not made, prior to December 8, 1889, the day upon which six years from the entering of the judgment expired. The motion being denied, plaintiff appeals. Section 421, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc. The question upon the appeal is the construction of the following statutes: Section 410, Code Civil Proc.: "The writ of scire facias * * * is abolished. The remedies obtainable in that form may hereafter be obtained by civil actions." On February 13, 1874, the following section was a portion of the codified laws, (Civil Practice Act, § 250:) "The party in whose favor judgment is given may, at any time within five years from the entry thereof, issue a writ of execution for its enforcement, as prescribed in this chapter." The above law being upon the statute-book, the act of February 13, 1874, provided as follows: "Sec. 7. After the lapse of five years from the entry of judgment, an execution can only be issued by leave of the court, upon motion, with personal notice to the adverse party, unless he be absent, or non-resident, or cannot be found to make such service, in which case service may be made by publication, or in such other manner as the court may direct.

Such leave shall not be given unless it be established by the oath of the party, or other satisfactory proof, that the judgment, or some part thereof, remains unsatisfied and due; but the leave shall not be necessary when the execution has been issued on the judgment within the five years, and returned unsatisfied in whole or in part." Section 7, just cited, now appears in Comp. St. (Code Civil Proc.) as section 349. In Code Civil Proc. 1887, § 301, section 250 of the Civil Practice Act (codified statutes, supra) was changed so that "five years" read "six years," and in that form it became section 312 of the present Code of Civil Procedure. Therefore this case has to do with the construction of section 312, Code Civil Proc., as follows: "The party in whose favor the judgment is given may, at any time within six years after the entry thereof, issue a writ of execution for its enforcement, as prescribed in this chapter," and section 349, Id., which is in the words as set forth above as section 7, Act Feb. 13, 1874. Section 307, Code Civil Proc., provides that a judgment shall be a lien for six years from the day of its docketing. By section 41, Id., (the amendment to that law, 16th Sess. p. 172, being not material to this inquiry,) an action upon a judgment is barred in six years.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The recent decision of this court in Wallace v. Lewis, 24 Pac. Rep. 22, restricts the inquiry herein to narrow limits. That case holds that a motion is an application to the court for an order; that the court must be moved to grant the order; and, when so moved, the proceeding is a motion. In this view, no motion was made for leave to issue execution in the case at bar until after December 8, 1889, which was after the expiration of six years from the entering of the judgment, and after the expiration of the period respectively limited in sections 41, 307, 312, Code Civil Proc. We are therefore left only the inquiry whether the court may grant leave to issue execution after the expiration of the period within which section 312 seems to limit its issuance; and incidentally after an action upon the judgment is barred, (section 41, Id.,) and after the lien of the judgment is lost, (section 307, Id.) These two latter sections we mention only as statutory suggestions, in pari materia, as to the length of life of a judgment. In other words, are these laws an absolute limitation of the life of a judgment, as is contended by the respondents, and held by the district court, or is the appellant's position correct that not only may execution issue of course within five years, and by motion in the sixth year, but also upon motion, under section 349, at any time after six years? If appellant's construction of the statutes be correct, then a judgment becoming dormant at the end of the fifth year may, after that time, and also for all time in the future, be vitalized sufficiently to support an execution, by motion; that is to say that, even after six years, the judgment only sleeps, but lives forever. Appellant's position is based upon the ancient doctrine of scire facias to revive a judgment. But that writ is abolished. The remedy formerly obtained thereby is now provided by the statutes heretofore cited, and the rights of the judgment creditor must be ascertained by a construction of these statutes, rather than by the authority or reason of the cases decided under the practice of scire facias.

Appellant calls our attention to the fact that when section 349 was enacted, on February 13, 1874, the limitation of section 312 was five years, and that section 349 was meaningless at the date of its enactment, unless it intended that execution might be obtained by motion even after the expiration of its life, as limited by section 312, which was then five years. Then he argues that, such intent being granted, when section 312 was made to read "six years," in 1877, the original intent of section 349, to the effect that execution might be obtained by motion, after the expiration of the apparent five years' life of the judgment, should also be applied to the effect that execution might be obtained after the expiration of this newly-created six years' life. For the purposes of this decision, we may grant that appellant's construction of section 349 correctly sets forth the intent of the act when passed in 1874. See Mason v. Cronise, 20 Cal. 211. But a later act (section 312, as amended in 1877) must operate upon the construction of section 349 of 1874. Chief Justice COOLEY, in People v. Circuit Judge, 37 Mich. 287, says that it is true, as a rule of construction, that "a statute amended is to be understood in the same sense exactly as if it had read from the beginning as it does as amended." Of course there are apparent exceptions to this rule, which, however, are not here of interest. Apply this rule to section 312, as amended in 1877, to read "six years" instead of "five," then to section 312 apply section 349, and there is no reason to hold that the two sections, in pari materia, do not mean just what they say, viz., that execution may issue at any time within six years in the manner prescribed by law; that is to say, within five years of course, and in the sixth year upon motion, and not otherwise, or at a later period. Again, in 1877, when the legislature enacted section 312 as it now stands, they had before them on the statute-book the provisions of section 349, allowing execution upon motion after five years, and they deliberately, by section 312, limited all executions to six years. The legislature had the power to do this. They did it in the light of section 349, and we cannot doubt that they intended what their words declare. We are of opinion that the judgment in the case before us was dormant from December 8, 1888, until December 8, 1889, and that on December 8, 1889, it died in its sleep, without experiencing the vivifying treatment of a motion for execution or an action at law. See 1 Freem. Ex'ns, § 27a, citing George v. Middough, 62 Mo. 549; Lyon v. Russ, 84 N. C. 588; Jerome v. Williams, 13 Mich. 521; McDonald v. Dickson, 85 N. C. 248; McGrew v. Reasons, 3 Lea, 485; Cannon v. Laman, 7 Lea, 513. The New York authorities cited in the text of that author are not in point by reason of the difference in the statutes. See, also, Bowers v. Crary, 30 Cal. 622; Mason v. Cronise, 20 Cal. 211; and Stout v. Macy, 22 Cal. 647. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. NARCROSS v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS.

MANDAMUS—REMEDY BY APPEAL.

Under Act Mont. Feb. 23, 1889, § 4, providing that in all cases where the board of medical examiners refuses or revokes a certificate authorizing the applicant to practice medicine the applicant may appeal to the district court of the county in which he applied for a certificate, mandamus will not lie to compel the board to grant a certificate.

Application for an alternative writ of mandate.

Elbert D. Weed, for applicant Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HARWOOD, J. This proceeding is an application for a writ of mandamus. The relator filed his affidavit herein setting forth the following averments: "That he, Carlton V. Norcross, is a citizen of the United States, and is over the age of twenty-one years. That he is now, and for more than seven years last past has been, a resident of the territory and state of Montana, and of the county of Silver Bow. That he is a graduate of the medical department of the State University of Iowa, situate at Iowa City, in said state. That said medical department of the university aforesaid is a legally organized medical school, within the meaning of section three (3) of an act of the territorial legislature of Montana, approved February 28, 1889, entitled 'An act to regulate the practice of medicine in the territory of Montana, and to provide for the examination and issuing of certificates to persons desirous of practicing the same, and for the punishment of persons violating the provisions of this act.' That the fact that said medical department of the State University of Iowa aforesaid was, on the 7th day of October, 1890, and for a long time prior thereto, and on the 1st day of March, 1887, when affiant graduated therefrom, a legally organized medical school in good standing, whose teachers were at the time of such graduation of affiant graduates of a legally organized school, which fact had at the time and in the manner aforesaid been determined by said board of medical examiners provided for by said act of February 28, 1889. That affiant graduated from said school on the 1st day of March, 1887, and received a certificate or diploma therefrom as of said date, which certificate or diploma is in words and figures as follows, to-wit: [Here follows a copy of said diploma; and affiant recites further facts as follows:] That affiant is the same person to whom said diploma was originally issued. That on the 4th day of March, 1887, affiant began the practice of medicine in the city of Butte, county of Silver Bow, and state (then territory) of Montana, and has been in the continuous practice of his profession within said territory and state of Montana, except when temporarily absent, since said 4th day of March, 1887. That on the 18th day of November, 1889, affiant presented his said diploma above set forth to one E. D. Leavitt, a member of said medical board of examiners, at Butte city, county of Silver Bow, state of Montana. That thereupon said E. D. Leavitt issued to affiant a certificate or permit to practice medicine until the next regular meeting of said board, which said certificate is in words and figures as follows." [Here affiant sets forth a copy of said certificate, and recites further facts as follows:] "That said board held its next regular meeting thereafter on the 4th day of April, 1890. That no certificate from said board was issued to this affiant at said April meeting thereof, but affiant was verbally notified by a member of said board that he might continue the practice of his profession until the next regular meeting of said board, in October, 1890. That at the regular meeting of board held in the city of Helena, in said state, in the month of October, 1890, affiant, on the 7th day of said month, duly presented his said diploma hereinbefore described to said board of medical examiners, and then and there duly demanded that said board issue to him a certificate executed under the seal of said board, and signed by the president and secretary thereof, according to law. That thereupon, on the 7th day of October, 1890, as aforesaid, the said board denied affiant's said request and demand, and then and there refused to issue to him such certificate. Affiant further says that he has never been guilty of any unprofessional, dishonorable, or immoral conduct, and that he has never publicly professed to cure or treat disease, injury, or deformity in such a manner as to deceive the public. That no charge against affiant of such unprofessional, dishonorable, or immoral conduct, or of such deceptive business method, was made to said board, and that said board made no such charge against affiant. Affiant further says that he has paid to said board the fee of fifteen dollars, required by law to be paid, and that said board still retains said fee. Affiant further says, that he is the party beneficially interested; that he has complied with all the requirements of the law on his part; and that said board had no just reason, or any legal cause or right, to refuse to issue their certificate to this affiant as aforesaid, and that he has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Upon this affidavit affiant prayed for an alternative writ of mandate commanding said board of medical examiners to issue to affiant the certificate provided for by law in such cases, authorizing and empowering affiant to practice medicine within this state, or that said board show cause why the same was not done. The writ of mandate was issued accordingly. The respondent board appeared by its president, and moves the court to quash the writ, on the ground that the relator

If the relator has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, he cannot invoke the aid of this extraordinary writ. This is not only the doctrine uniformly held by the courts, but it is so declared by our statute. "The writ shall be issued in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law." Section 567, Code Civil Proc. The act creating said board of medical examiners, and defining their powers and duties, provides—First, that all persons wishing to practice medicine or surgery in the state of Montana shall comply with the requirements thereof; secondly, that all persons practicing medicine in the territory of Montana at the time said act became a law, who were graduates in medicine from a medical school found by said board to be legally organized and in good standing, whose teachers were graduates of a legally organized school, should be admitted to practice medicine on presenting to said board a diploma from such school, if such diploma was found to be genuine, and had been issued to the person presenting the same; thirdly, said act provides for an examination by said board of those wishing to practice medicine in this state who were not graduates of such a school as the act describes, and also of graduates of such schools who commence to practice medicine in this state after the passage of said act. It is further provided in section 4 of said act as follows: "And such board may refuse or revoke a certificate for unprofessional, dishonorable, or immoral conduct, or refuse a certificate to any one who may publicly profess to cure or treat disease, injury, or deformity in such a manner as to deceive the public. In all cases of refusal or revocation the applicant, if he or she feels aggrieved, may appeal to the district court of the county where such applicant may have applied for a certificate." Now, it is clear that the legislatures in creating this board of medical examiners, contemplated the subjection of its final acts in refusing to grant the certificate authorizing the applicant to practice medicine, as well as its acts of revocation of such certificate, to the supervising control of the district courts. The remedy for the wrongful denial or revocation of a certificate by this board is provided in the act to be an appeal to the district court. It is the final action of the board in refusing relator a certificate entitling him to pursue the practice of his profession which he complains of. This question is ably expounded, in the light of numerous authorities cited, by Mr. High, in his work on Extraordinary Remedies, §§ 15, 16, and notes. In summing up his review of authorities, the author says: "Wherever, therefore, an express remedy is afforded by statute, plain and specific in its nature, and fully adequate to redress the grievance complained of, mandamus will not lie." We are of the opinion that the relator has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the course provided by statute to correct the wrongs complained of, and is therefore not entitled to the writ of mandate. Respondent's motion to quash the writ sustained.

PROCEDURE BY INFORMATION.

Procedure by information having been unknown in the criminal practice of the territory, and Const. Mont. having provided that "all criminal actions shall be procured by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or after leave granted by the court, or by indictment," the provision for proceeding by information is not self-executing, and, in the absence of a statute authorizing it, a conviction for felony on a prosecution by information is void, and the accused will be discharged on habeas corpus.

S. A. Balliett, for petitioner. Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

DE WITT, J. On December 18, 1889, the petitioner was convicted of the felony of burglary, in the eighth judicial district court in and for Fergus county. He was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary, from which he now seeks a discharge, on the ground that he was presented and tried on information, and not by indictment. These facts appear by the return upon the writ of certiorari issued in aid of the writ of habeas corpus. The state was admitted to the Union November 8, 1889, on which date the constitution went into effect. The constitution provides that "all criminal actions in the district court, except those on appeal, shall be prosecuted by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or after leave granted by the court, or shall be prosecuted by indictment without such examination or commitment, or without such leave of the court." There are further provisions as to the constitution of the grand jury. At the time the case before us was tried, the legislature of the state had not met, and there was no legislation in aid of the constitution in any manner defining the procedure by information, which procedure, as set forth in the constitution, was unknown in the criminal practice of the late territory. It is a matter of common knowledge that difference of opinion existed among the district judges and the profession as to whether the provisions in regard to information were self-executing, or whether they required legislation. In this transition period, the case now before us appears to have been tried. Afterwards, on January 14, 1890, the case of State v. Ah Jim, 9 Mont. 167, 23 Pac. Rep. 76, was decided in this court, in which it was held that a prosecution by information for a felony could not be had, until legislation had set in motion the provisions of the constitution. It follows that the petitioner was therefore not tried by process of law; that his imprisonment under the commitment before us is illegal; and that he must be discharged. It appears by statement of counsel for the state, assented to by petitioner's counsel, that petitioner is confined in the penitentiary also upon another commitment, upon a sentence on conviction for an offense other than the one set forth in the petition and return. It is ordered that he be discharged from imprisonment under the commitment in the case before us, but that this discharge shall in no way effect his imprisonment upon any commitment not before this court on this petition.

STATE v. CENTRAL PAC. RY. CO. (No. 1,331.)

TAXATION—UNSURVEYED PUBLIC LANDS—PLEADING—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

1. Unsurveyed lands acquired by the C. P. Ry. Co., under the acts of congress of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, are exempt from taxation by the state, the latter act providing that, before the lands shall be conveyed to any company entitled thereto, there shall be paid into the treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, and U. S. St. at Large 1886, p. 143, providing that no lands granted to any railroad company shall be exempt from taxation on account of the lien of the United States for the surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, "but this provision shall not apply to lands unsurveyed."

2. Unsurveyed lands are part of the public domain, and the company has no right to the possession of any particular tracts, and it has therefore no possessory interest subject to taxation.

3. A description of lands as certain odd-numbered sections, "as their designation will appear when the surveys of the government are extended over them," is not such a description as to show a possessory interest liable to taxation as is required by Gen. St. Nev. § 1088, providing that possessory claims shall be assessed as real estate, and described by metes and bounds, or by common designation or name.

4. A tax-payer has the right to pay on some of several subdivisions of his property entered on the assessment rolls, without paying on all, under Gen. St. Nev. § 1096, providing that "no tax receiver shall receive any taxes for any portion less than the least subdivision entered upon the assessment rolls."

Appeal from district court, Lander county; A. L. FITZGERALD, Judge.

Baker & Wines, for appellant. The Attorney General, W. D. Jones, Dist. Atty., and H. Mayenbaum, for the state.

BELKNAP, C. J. This is an action for the recovery of delinquent taxes assessed against the real and personal property of the defendant, situated in Lander county. Included in the list of assessed property is a large quantity of unsurveyed lands. The principal question in the case is whether land of this character is taxable or not. These lands were acquired by the railroad company under acts of congress of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864. The act of July 2, 1864, provides as follows: "Sec. 21. That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto under this act, there shall first be paid into the treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, by the said company or party in interest, as the titles shall be required by said company, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the commissioner of the general land-office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of railroad, and so from year to year until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act." 13 U. S. St. at Large, 365. In the case of Railway Co. v. McShane, 22 Wall. 462, the court, in considering this provision, said "that the payment of these costs of surveying the land is a condition precedent to the right to receive the title from the government can admit of no doubt. Until this is done, the equitable title of the company is incomplete. There remains a payment to be made to perfect it. There is something to be done, without which the company is not entitled to a patent. The case clearly is not within the rule which authorizes state taxation of lands, the title of which is in the United States. The reason of this rule is also fully applicable to this case. The United States retains the legal title by withholding the patent, for the purpose of securing the payment of these expenses, and it cannot be permitted to the states to defeat or embarrass this right by a sale of the lands for taxes. If such a sale could be made, it must be valid if the land is subject to taxation, and the title would pass to the purchaser. If no such title could pass, then it is because the land is not liable to the tax; and the treasurers of the counties have no right to assess it for that purpose. But, when the United States parts with her title, she has parted with the only means which that section of the statute gives for securing the payment of these costs. It is by retaining the title that the payment of costs of survey is to be enforced. And, so far as the right of the state to tax the land is concerned, we are of opinion that, where the original grant has been perfected by the issuance of the patent, the right of the state to tax, like the right of the company to sell, the lands, has become perfect." Again, in the case of Railroad Co. v. Traill Co., 115 U. S. 607, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201, these principles were reaffirmed. Said the court: "In the case of Railway Co. v. Prescott, [16 Wall. 603,] which was a writ of error to the supreme court of Kansas, this court held these lands could not be assessed and sold for taxes under state laws until this cost of surveying them was paid to the United States, because the government retained the legal title to the same to compel this payment. This case was decided in 1872. In 1874 the case of Railway Co. v. McShane came before us, involving the same question, and because it also involved some other points decided in Railway Co. v. Prescott, which the court reconsidered and overruled, it necessarily received full consideration, the result of which was to reaffirm the proposition that, until the United States was reimbursed for the expenses of the survey of those lands, they were not subject to state taxation." Advantage was taken of this interpretation of the law to escape taxation by neglecting to pay the costs of surveys. To obviate the difficulty, congress enacted "that no lands granted to any railroad corporation by any act of congress shall be exempt from taxation by states, territories, and municipal corporations, on account of the lien of the United States upon the same for the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, or because no patent has been issued therefor; but this provision shall not apply to lands unsurveyed." U. S. St. at Large, 1886, p. 143.

This is the only enactment of congress waiving the lien of the government upon railroad lands for the purpose of state taxation. A reason for withholding the right to tax unsurveyed lands may be found in the fact that it is impracticable to assess them. It is a well-established principle of law that land assessed for the purpose of taxation must be so described that it may be identified. The purposes of this requirement, as stated by Judge Cooley, are—"First, that the owner may have information of the claim made upon him or his property; second, that the public, in case the tax is not paid, may be notified what land is to be offered for sale for the non-payment; and, third, that the purchaser may be enabled to obtain a sufficient conveyance." Cooley, Tax'n 284. The lands granted to the railroad company were the odd-numbered sections within the limits of 20 miles on each side of the railroad, except such as had been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States, or to which a homestead or pre-emption claim had attached, or mineral lands. Until the surveys are made it cannot be known what parts of the lands are within the enumerated exceptions, nor what sections or parts of sections will belong to the company, nor until then can the locality of the lands be determined so that a description may identify them. The exemption enforces the principle that lands may not be assessed for taxation unless described so that they may be found. It is said, however, that the possessory interest of the defendant is taxable under the revenue laws of the state, independently of the land itself, or the title to it. It must be borne in mind that the unsurveyed lands are not described by metes and bounds, or by common designation or name, but as sections and parts of sections, and, as alleged by the complaint, "as their designation will appear when the surveys of the United States are extended over them." It is plain that this is not a description by which the identity of the lands can be established, and it is equally plain that possession of lands so described cannot be established until the surveys are made. The reasons suggested as having induced congress to exempt unsurveyed lands from taxation will exclude a possessory interest in such lands from taxation when described only "as their designation will appear when the surveys of the government are extended over them."

The answer of defendant alleges tender and payment of the tax imposed upon all of the assessed property described in the complaint other than lands. Defendant had the right, under the statute, (Gen. St. § 1096,) to pay the taxes upon any subdivision of its property entered upon the assessment roll. And no judgment for taxes or penalties should be entered against it by reason of its ownership of property, the taxes upon which have been paid in conformity with this provision of the statute. A motion has been made in this court to amend the record by striking out a pleading entitled "Amendment to Answer." The motion is denied upon the authority of the following cases: Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 521; People v. Romero, 18 Cal. 93; Boston v. Haynes, 31 Cal. 107; Bonds v. Hickman, 29 Cal. 464; Boyd v. Burrell, 60 Cal. 280. A similar answer was considered insufficient in the case of People v. Pearis, 37 Cal. 259. It is unnecessary for us, however, to rule upon the point, as the complaint states the facts upon which our decision is based. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

BIGELOW, J. I concur. The plaintiff obtained judgment in the court below, upon the pleadings. This judgment must, of course, be reversed, if the complaint does not state facts sufficient to support it, or if the answer presents any defense to the action. We are therefore confined upon this appeal to a consideration of the pleadings.

1. Included in the property assessed to the defendant is the possessory claim to certain unsurveyed lands, which are not described further than that they will, when the United States surveys are extended over them, be designated as certain congressional subdivisions. A possessory claim to land is to be assessed as real estate, and Gen. St. § 1088, requires that it shall be described by metes and bounds, or by common designation or name. If not so described, the assessment is void. People v. Mahoney, 55 Cal. 286; Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 302. The description here does not comply with this statute. The statement that land will, some time in the future, be designated as a "certain section" does not sufficiently describe it for the purposes of taxation. It does not show its present location, nor identify it as it now exists. And further, we know that it is impossible to tell, in advance of the official surveys, how any particular piece of land will finally be designated. Says the court, in Robinson v. Forrest, 29 Cal. 325: "Neither a private survey nor one made under the authority of the state will answer the purpose." And again: "The lines are not ascertained by the survey, but they are created, and although a surveyor may, in advance of the making of the subdivision of the township by the deputy of the United States surveyor general, run lines with the greatest practicable exactness from the corners established on the exterior lines of the township, to ascertain the bounds of any given quarter-quarter section, still, when the survey comes to be made under the direction of the surveyor general, the difference between the two surveys may be such that the 40-acre lot, which, under the private, and, theoretically, the more accurate, survey, appeared to fall within the lands listed to the state, will be excluded from the list, or vice versa." In Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 605, it is again said: "There is, in fact, no such tract of land as that described in the petition, until it has been located within the congressional township by an actual survey and establishment of the lines, under the authority of the United States, and the survey has been approved by the proper United States surveyor general." See, also, Bullock v. Rouse, 31 Cal. 590. 22 Pac. Rep. 919. It follows that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to support the judgment as to the taxes upon the land.

2. This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal, but as there are other important questions in the case which have been fully argued, are fairly raised, and are likely to arise again, it is proper to consider them. The motion to strike out the amendment to the answer, upon the ground that it was filed without leave, should be denied, because not made in the court below, where, had it been sustained, the proper leave to file it might have been obtained. Clarke v. Lyon Co., 7 Nev. 76; Longabaugh v. Railroad Co., 9 Nev. 271.

3. It is claimed that the answer is insufficient because it does not deny "all claim, title, or interest in the property assessed, at the time of the assessment," in the language of section 1108, Gen. St. It seems to me, however, that, taken altogether, it states a good defense. An attempt was made to assess a possessory claim to lands which, it was alleged, would some time be designated as certain odd sections, and which, we know, had been granted to the defendant by the United States. It could not truthfully deny all claim to the land, but it denied any possessory claim thereto, and stated facts showing that the right which it did have was not subject to taxation. This must be held sufficient, or else, under the guise of regulating the pleadings, a party may be debarred from stating facts which constitute a complete defense to an action, simply because the truth will not permit him to state them in a particular form of words. This cannot be done. Wright v. Cradlebaugh, 3 Nev. 349; Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 328; Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 1.

4. Under the facts stated in the answer, the defendant had no taxable interest in the land, nor was it subject to state taxation.

(a) It is therein alleged that the lands are unsurveyed; that the defendant has no possessory claim to them; and that the only claim it has is under the land-grant acts of congress, of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864. Several attempts have been made to tax some of the lands granted by these acts after they were surveyed, but it was finally settled that this was not permissible before patents had issued, upon the ground that congress had made the payment of the cost of surveying a condition of the grant, and that, until the patents issued, the government held a lien thereon as security therefor. Railroad Co. v. Traill Co., 115 U. S. 607, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 201. By the act of July 10, 1886, congress, however, authorized such taxation, notwithstanding this lien, (State v. Railroad Co., 22 Pac. Rep. 237;) but it was specially provided that this authorization should not apply to lands unsurveyed, (U. S. St. at Large 1886, p. 143.) So, if the government ever had a lien upon those unsurveyed, if the payment of these costs was ever a condition precedent to the passage of the title, it still exists, and they are consequently exempt from taxation. It is argued, however, that there can be no cost of surveying, and consequently no lien, until the surveys are made. This is ingenious, but I think not tenable. The most of the land was unsurveyed at the time of the grant, and it was certain that some time the United States must incur the expense of segregating it from the mass of the public domain. The language of the act is that none of the lands granted shall be conveyed until after the cost of surveying is paid. This has been construed, so far as surveyed lands are concerned, to mean that thereby congress intended to attach a condition to the grant, to hold a lien on the land for such costs. If so, why does it not also mean that it intended to attach the same condition, to hold the same lien, upon unsurveyed lands, for the cost that must certainly some time accrue? Congress could attach any condition to the grant that it saw fit. Until surveyed, and its character and status determined, no patents could be issued. When this was done, then the cost would be incurred, and it seems clear that the land was to be all the time holden for it, as well before as after surveys.

(b) Upon another ground unsurveyed lands are not subject to state taxation, although granted in present, where surveys are necessary to the issuance of the patents. Lands for which no patent has issued, are sometimes subject to such taxation, but it is only under peculiar circumstances, which are quite clearly stated in Railroad Co. v. Price Co., 133 U. S. 505, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341. It is there said: "It follows that all the public domain of the United States within the state of Wisconsin was, in 1883, exempt from state taxation. Usually the possession of the legal title by the government determines both the fact and the right of ownership. There is, however, an exception to this doctrine with respect to the public domain, which is as well settled as the doctrine itself, and that is that where congress has prescribed the conditions upon which portions of that domain may be alienated, and provided that upon the performance of the conditions a patent of the United States shall issue to the donee or purchaser, and all conditions are complied with, the land alienated being distinctly defined, it only remaining for the government to issue its patent, and until such issue holding the legal title in trust for him, who in the mean time is not excluded from the use of the property; in other words, when the government has ceased to hold any such right or interest in the property as to justify it in withholding a patent from the donee or purchaser, and it does not exclude him from the use of the property,—then the donee or purchaser will be treated as the beneficial owner of the land, and the same be held subject to taxation as his property."

In several respects, this case does not come within the rules here laid down. The donee is not entitled to the patent until the land is surveyed, and the fact also ascertained in some manner that it is not within some of the excepted tracts that are not included in the grant. This certainly cannot be done until its boundaries are clearly defined. Again, under the act of congress, entitled "An act to prevent the unlawful occupancy of public lands," approved February 25, 1885, it seems that the donee is also excluded from the beneficial use or possession of unsurveyed land, because, until surveyed, it is all a part of the public domain, and the defendant, no more than any one else, has any right to the possession of any particular tract or portion of it.

5. Tender. The complaint describes the property assessed in nine different subdivisions, and then alleges that certain taxes were levied upon the whole thereof. It is in the statutory form and is not required to state the details of the assessment. It consequently does not follow from this either that the property was or was not assessed in such subdivisions. But it was the assessor's duty to enter it upon the assessment roll in at least that number of parcels, and value each division separately. In the absence of allegation or proof to the contrary, we must presume that he did his duty. Lawson, Pres. Ev. 53. It has been decided that adjoining town lots, owned by the same person, may be assessed as one tract, but never under any statute similar to ours that entirely separate and distinct pieces of real estate and personality can be thrown together in one general statement and valued as one piece of property. Such an assessment is void. Cooley, Tax'n, 279; People v. Hollister, 47 Cal. 408. The answer alleges that, prior to the time the taxes became delinquent, the defendant unconditionally tendered to the tax receiver of Lander county all the taxes due upon a number of these subdivisions or parcels of property, amounting, in all, to $15,645.66; that he refused to receive it, but subsequently to the commencement of this action it was demanded by the district attorney, and paid to the county. The court held the plea of tender insufficient, and gave judgment for the full amount of tax and penalties, less the sum paid. The question is, can a taxpayer pay the taxes upon some subdivisions of his property, and not on all? It may be admitted that, except under statutory authority, he cannot. Several apparently conflicting provisions of our statutes can be cited which seem to indicate that the legislature did not understand it had authorized it; and yet the language of Gen. St. § 1096, "but no tax receiver shall receive any taxes for any portion less than the least subdivision entered upon the assessment roll," seems to clearly answer the question in the affirmative. If he is not to receive the tax on anything less than the least subdivision, then certainly the manifest implication is that he can receive it on anything more than that. Words of a statute are never to be construed as unmeaning, if it is possible to avoid it; but if the tax receiver must not receive the tax on anything less than the whole property, then certainly it is meaningless to forbid him receiving it on less than a subdivision. As the defendant tendered the taxes on what was certainly a subdivision of its property, it is unnecessary to consider whether anything less would also have been a subdivision; for instance, whether it could pay on each 40 acres of its land, and demand a receipt therefor. It is argued that it is a matter of discretion with the tax receiver whether he will receive the taxes so tendered or not; but this cannot be. Where a public officer has been clothed by statute with power to do an act which concerns the rights of third persons, the execution of the power may be insisted on, though the phraseology of the statute be permissive merely, and not peremptory. Mayor v. Furze, 3 Hill, 614. Nor was the amendment to section 1111, Gen. St., made a year later, a repeal of this provision, because—First, there is no necessary conflict between them; and, secondly, so far as any bearing upon this question is concerned, the amendment was merely a re-enactment of the section as it originally stood. It cannot be supposed that the legislature, in one section of a statute, intended to repeal another section of the same act.

6. The question of removal to the United States circuit court seems to have been virtually abandoned by the appellant upon the argument, and therefore requires no particular consideration.

WEST V. HUMPHREY et al. (No. 1,326.)

SALE—DELIVERY—WHEN TITLE PASSES.

An agent bought for his principals all the ores produced at a mine, to be delivered when loaded on the wagon at the mine. Ores were loaded and delivered to a carrier, consigned to the agent, and a bill of lading to him in his own name was sent him. Held, that the title passed to the principals when the ores were delivered to the carrier.

Appeal from district court, Nye county; THOMAS H. WELLS, Judge.

D. S. Truman, for appellant. Benjamin Carter, for respondents.

MURPHY, J. This action was brought to recover certain personal property, consisting of concentrates, or their value. The defendants had judgment of nonsuit. It appears from the record that W. J. Chamberlain and Frank Dillingham, of Denver, Colo., were partners doing business in buying and smelting ores and concentrates in this state, under the firm name of W. J. Chamberlain & Co.; that W. E. West was their agent in this state, and that as such agent, in the month of September, 1889, he entered into an agreement with

J. E. Severance to purchase all the ores and concentrates for Chamberlain & Co. that Severance could produce from the Barcelona mine, which mine Severance was working under a lease. The ores and concentrates were to be delivered to Chamberlain & Co. when loaded on the wagon at the Barcelona mine. Some ores and concentrates had been delivered under the agreement to West. On or about the 20th day of November, 1889, Robert Scott, a teamster and freighter, loaded seven or eight tons, more or less, of concentrates from the Barcelona mine, at the request of Severance, to be by Scott delivered to West at Ledlie; West to pay the freight charges. On the 23d day of November, 1889, West paid Severance $1,200 on the concentrates. On the 25th of November, 1889, and after the said concentrates had been loaded and in transit on Scott's wagons to West, and while Scott was at the town of Belmont, seven miles from where the concentrates had been loaded, the defendant Brougher, as sheriff of the county of Nye, under and by virtue of a writ of attachment sued out in the case of W. C. Humphrey against J. E. Severance, seized the property in dispute as the property of J. E. Severance. The following exhibits were put in evidence by plaintiff:

"A. Belmont, Nev., Nov. 20, '89. This certifies that I have this day sold to W. E. West, manager of the Ledlie Sampling Works, (11) eleven tons of concentrates and ore, (more or less,) now being loaded on Scott's team; consideration ($1,200) twelve hundred dollars. J. E. SEVERANCE.

"Friend West: I think the above is all that is necessary, and all that you require as a bill of sale. I shall leave for Austin on next stage, so you may hold money until my arrival. Yours, truly, J. E. SEVERANCE."

"B. Austin, Nev., Nov. 23, '89. Received of W. E. West, Mgr., acc't concentrates in transit, the sum of $1,275 for 11 tons, more or less. J. E. SEVERANCE."

Exhibit C is a bill of sale and assignment from Chamberlain & Co. to West, the plaintiff.

We will not in this opinion consider the errors assigned by the counsel for plaintiff to the refusal of the judge to sustain his objections to questions asked the several witnesses. We shall confine ourselves, therefore, to the other error alleged, to-wit, the question of nonsuit, for the reason, as assigned by the judge, "that the testimony of the plaintiff did not show that Chamberlain & Co. were the owners of the property in controversy at the time of the levying of the attachment. The bill of exceptions shows that the motion for nonsuit, which the judge sustained, was founded upon the theory that the sale of the property under the contract made in the month of September, 1889, between West, acting as the agent for Chamberlain & Co., and Severance, was not a bona fide sale of the property, and the bill of sale in evidence, marked 'Exhibit A,' shows that the property in dispute was sold by J. E. Severance to W. E. West November 20, 1889, and that the property was in transit at the time of the sale, and that a portion of the concentrates were not in existence at the time of the pretended sale." We think the nonsuit should not have been granted. The testimony of the plaintiff shows that there was an agreement between Severance and the agent of Chamberlain & Co. in the month of September, 1889, whereby all the ore and concentrates produced from the Barcelona mine were sold to Chamberlain & Co., and were to be delivered to them when loaded on the teams at the Barcelona mines. There had been one or more loads delivered under that agreement, and West testified that all his acts during the entire transaction were for and on behalf of his principals, Chamberlain & Co., and not for himself. Upon this state of facts, and no testimony in the record to contradict them, the mere fact that Severance wrote upon a piece of paper what purported to be a bill of sale to West could not change the original agreement without the consent of West or Chamberlain & Co. The right to rescind was neither exercised nor claimed by either of the parties to the agreement, nor is West's right to act as agent for Chamberlain & Co. questioned; and when he received the paper purporting to be a bill of sale, made in his name, in law it was for the use and benefit of Chamberlain & Co. A person who agrees to act for another is not allowed to deal in the business of the agency for his own benefit; and, if he takes a conveyance in his own name of property which he agrees to purchase for another, he will be considered as holding the property in trust for his principal. The fact that the property was in transit at the date of the paper purporting to be a bill of sale, or that a portion of the property was not in existence at the date of the sale, is of no avail to the respondents.

It appears from the evidence adduced at the hearing that the property was in the possession of the carrier seven miles from the Barcelona mine, and that it had been paid for by West before the levying of the attachment. Such being the case, Severance did not own the property at the date of the levy, without it could be made to appear that he had parted with the property to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, which question is not before us. The ownership of the property was to pass when loaded on the wagons at the Barcelona mine. The vesting of the title to property always depends on the intention of the parties, to be derived from the agreement and its circumstances. As long as the ore remained at the Barcelona mine, Chamberlain & Co. had no interest in it; but when the ore was put into sacks, placed in the wagon, delivered to the carrier, and he directed to deliver the property to West, what was up to that time a mere executory contract of sale became an actual or executed sale, and the title to whatever ore was placed in the wagon passed to Chamberlain & Co. "Where the buyer had purchased, in advance, all the crop of peppermint oil to be raised and manufactured by a farmer, the property passed to the buyer in all the oil which had been put by the farmer into the buyer's bottles and weighed, although never delivered to him." Langton v. Higgins, 4 Hurl. & N. 400. In the case of Aldridge v. Johnson, reported in 7 El. & Bl. 885, "plaintiff agreed with K. to purchase from K. 100 out of 200 quarters of barley, which plaintiff had seen in bulk and approved of, and he paid part of the price. It was agreed that plaintiff should send sacks for the barley, and that K. should fill the sacks with the barley, take them to a railway, place them upon trucks free of charge and send them to plaintiff. Plaintiff sent sacks enough for a part only of the 100 quarters. These K. filled, and also endeavored to find trucks for them, but was unable to do so. K. finally detained the barley, and emptied it from the sacks back into the bulk. K. having become bankrupt after he had emptied the barley from the sacks into the bulk, and the defendant, his assignee, having removed the whole together, held, by the whole court, that this was a conversion by the assignee as to the part put into the sacks, and the plaintiff should recover that quantity." In cases like the one under consideration, the carrier is the bailee of the person to whom, not by whom, the goods are sent; the latter, in employing the carrier, being considered as the agent of the former for that purpose. Benj. Sales, §§ 181, 693; Burton v. Baird, 44 Ark. 556; State v. Carl, 43 Ark. 353; Herron v. State, 10 N. W. Rep. 26; Kline v. Baker, 99 Mass. 254; Schmidt v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 373. The judgment will be reversed and cause remanded.

BIGELOW, J., (concurring.) I concur. The plaintiff's evidence shows that the sale of the concentrates was made to Chamberlain & Co., and not to West. West was acting merely as their agent, and, even if the contract of sale had been made in his name, which it was not, it is always permissible to show that it was for the use and benefit of his principals. This was shown here. Ruiz v. Norton, 4 Cal. 355; Huntington v. Knox, 7 Cush. 371. As West is the plaintiff, and the one to whom the defendants claim the concentrates were sold, it would make no difference whether sold directly to him, or first to Chamberlain & Co., and then by them to him, were it not that the complaint has specially alleged the deraignment of title through them.

The plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that J. E. Severance had been the owner of the concentrates; that he had made an agreement to sell them to Chamberlain & Co. before they were extracted from the mine; that after they were extracted he made a bill of sale to them, and they had fully paid him for them. This was certainly sufficient to vest the title in them, and authorize them to maintain an action for their possession as against a trespasser or stranger, without regard to whether there was any fraud in the sale or had been any delivery, want of delivery being also one of the grounds upon which the motion for nonsuit was made and granted. These questions are only material when the contest is between a purchaser and a creditor of the vendor having a lien by attachment or otherwise. Thornburgh v. Hand, 7 Cal. 554; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 443, 511. As the defendants had not yet come to their side of the case, there was of course no proof that either of them was a creditor of the vendor, or that any attachment had been issued, or any attempt made to levy the writ upon the property in dispute. When the motion was made, it only appeared that the title to the property had vested in the plaintiff; that he was consequently entitled to its possession, and that the defendants detained it from him. This certainly made prima facie case. As the case then stood, the defendants were merely strangers and trespassers. Until they had shown some right or interest in the property, it was no concern of theirs whether there was fraud in the sale or had been any delivery, nor could the questions be raised. Packard v. Wood, 4 Gray, 307; Benj. Sales, § 675.

STATE v. DIAMOND VALLEY LIVE-STOCK & LAND CO. (No. 1,327.)

ASSESSMENT OF TAXES—NAME OF OWNER—EXCESSIVE VALUATION.

1. An assessment of taxes against the property of "The Diamond Valley Live-Stock & Land Company," is not void because made against "The Diamond Valley Stock Company," the company having returned no statement of its property, and its vice-president and general agent having seen the list prepared by the assessor, observed the mistake in the name, and failed to call attention to it.

2. In an action to recover taxes assessed against one who has neglected to return a statement of his property, and refused to sign the one prepared by the assessor, evidence is not admissible that an excessive valuation was placed on the property, Gen. St. Nev. § 1091, providing that "where the person complaining of the assessment has refused to give the assessor his list under oath, as required by this act, no reduction shall be made by the board of equalization in the assessment made by the assessor."

Rives & Beatty and J. R. Judge, for appellant. The Attorney General, Peter Breen, Dist. Atty., and A. E. Cheney, for the State.

MURPHY, J. This a suit against the above-named defendant and certain real estate and improvements, described in the complaint, to recover state and county taxes assessed against the corporation in Eureka county for the year 1888, and to enforce against the property the lien created by law. The plaintiff had judgment against the corporation, which appealed, and seeks a reversal of the judgment upon two grounds.

The first defense set up is that there was no valid assessment of the property described in the complaint made against the defendant, "The Diamond Valley Live-Stock & Land Company," but that the same was made and the property assessed against the "Diamond Valley Stock Company, R. Sadler, Agent," and that the true name of the corporation is "The Diamond Valley Live Stock & Land Company." The question to be determined from the facts in this case is whether the defendant should be required to pay the taxes, notwithstanding the mistake in the name of the corporation, or whether the corporation was injured thereby, and the omitting of the words "Live" and "Land" from the name of the company is such an error as vitiates the assessment as made by the assessor, and relieves the corporation from the payment of its just proportion of taxes to the support of the state and county governments for the year 1888. While, on the other hand, it is important to the security of the tax-payer that as much regularity and uniformity as is practicable should be maintained in the naming of the owners of property, and the listing of the same for the purpose of taxation, it is also important that, as far as practicable, all persons and corporations liable to taxation should pay their or its just proportion of the public taxes, and not be permitted to escape by means of slight mistakes or frivolous objections. We think this is the plain intent of the law. Section 1080, Gen. St., reads: "All property of every kind and nature whatsoever within this state, shall be subject to taxation, except." And the property of the defendant does not fall within the excepted class. Section 1082 reads: "Between the first Monday in March and the first Monday in September, in each year, the county assessor * * * shall ascertain, by diligent inquiry and examination, all property in his county, real or personal, subject to taxation, and also the names of all persons, corporations, associations, companies, or firms owning the same. * * * He shall then list and assess the same to the person, firm, corporation, etc. He shall also demand from each person and firm, and from the president, cashier, treasurer, or managing agent of each corporation, * * * a statement, under oath or affirmation, of all property within his county owned or claimed by him, it, or them. If any person, officer, or agent shall refuse to furnish such list, or shall give a false name, or shall refuse to give his other name, or shall refuse to swear or affirm, he or she shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. If the owner of the property shall fail or refuse to make out and swear to the statement as required by the statute, the assessor shall make an estimate of the value of such property and assess the same. * * * If the name of the owner be known, the property shall be assessed in his or her name. If unknown to the assessor, the property shall be assessed to unknown owners. From the foregoing, we are of the opinion that where there is a slight error in the name of the person or corporation taxed, when the property is correctly described, and the owners are not misled by such name or description, the tax assessed to him or it may, notwithstanding such error, be collected of the person or corporation intended to be taxed, provided the person or corporation can be identified by competent evidence. In this case the omission of a part of the name of the defendant was the fault of the vice-president and managing agent of the corporation.

On the trial in the district court, C. C. Wallace, assessor of Eureka county, testified: "The Diamond Valley property, as I had always understood, belonged to Sadler before it was sold to the company.

I got my idea of the name of the company in 1888, of Sadler. He and I sat down together. When we got through, he refused to sign the statement, and went away. I had understood always that the name was 'Diamond Valley Stock Company.' The dispute between Sadler and me was on the value of the land. I had never heard that this was property of any other than the Diamond Valley Stock Company, and never heard that it was the property of the Diamond Valley Live-Stock & Land Company; nor did I inquire until after this action was commenced. Nine out of every ten persons that one would hear speak about the property would speak of it as the property of the Diamond Valley Stock Company. I never heard it called any other name. The company was commonly and generally known as the 'Diamond Valley Stock Company.' I asked Sadler to come into my office and fix up the statement of his property for 1888, including the property of this company. We sat down to my desk together with the statement partially prepared before us. The name 'Diamond Valley Stock Company' had been written in the statement in two places before he came in,—once near the top of the sheet, and the other near the middle of it. In each place the name is written in large, plain letters, much larger than the rest of the writing, and the name is so conspicuous that I do not see how it was possible that Sadler could help seeing it. We discussed the amount of personal property of the company, and I wrote it in the statement. We agreed as to the value of the personal property, but not as to the value of some of the real estate. Mr. Sadler refused to sign the statement, and the company never furnished me with any other statement of their taxable property for that year." Defendant admitted that the statutory notice of the commencement of the action had been published as required by law. It was also admitted that the summons had been served upon the defendant corporation and upon the real estate described in the complaint. Defendant called R. Sadler as a witness on its behalf, who testified that he was the agent and vice-president of the Diamond Valley Live-Stock & Land Company, named as defendant in this action, and so was during all the fiscal year 1888. Knew Wallace as assessor of Eureka county for a number of years. "In June, July, or August, 1888, Wallace made Exhibit A. and showed it to me; all the real estate made out as it is now; valuation set down. He consulted me only as to the personal property. I never told him the name, or talked to him at all about the name, of the corporation owning the property named in the complaint, and sued in this action, in 1888. I went before the board of equalization in 1888 concerning this and other assessments against myself and companies, but the board refused to act on my protests. I know that the personal property, and the description of the real estate, were written in the statement before it was shown to me, because I saw it at the time the statement was before Mr. Wallace and myself at his office." At this point the witness was asked the following question: "If you then saw that the description of the personal property and real estate written in the statement, how is it that you did not also see the name 'Diamond Valley Stock Company,' which was written in large letters on the same sheet as that which you said you did see written there? Answer. I did not say that I did not see the name. That was his lookout, and not mine. I did not go there to correct the assessor's mistakes. I represented to the board that this assessment was too high. I signed no statement or assessment of any property in which I was interested for the year 1888, because Mr. Wallace had assessed it all too high." It was admitted that all the property described in the complaint was owned by, and in the possession of, the corporation defendant herein, under recorded deeds. Here we have a corporation defendant, which, by its vice-president and managing agent, appeared before the assessor to give in the name, list, and statement of his company's assessable property. He sees that there is a mistake in the name of the corporation as written by the assessor, and he fails to correct the mistake, and upon the trial he says: "I did not go there to correct the mistakes of the assessor." That is just what he did go there for, and it was his duty to have called the attention of the assessor to any error or mistake that might have appeared upon the face of the statement. He not having done so, he will not now be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong, for it is, not to be overlooked that such errors will, in most cases, arise from the default of the taxpayer himself, who fails to perform the duty required of him by law of giving in his name and list of property to the assessor.

The second error assigned by the appellant is the refusal of the court to permit the defendant to show that an excessive valuation was placed upon the property by the assessor. An answer to that objection is that the agent of the defendant failed and refused to swear to the statement as made by the assessor, and made no statement of his own listing the company's property for the year 1888. Section 1091, Gen. St., reads: "Where the person complaining of the assessment has refused to give the assessor his list under oath, as required by this act, no reduction shall be made by the board of equalization in the assessment made by the assessor." And the same rule will be enforced in a court of law, and the answer does not raise the issue. See State v. Sadler, 23 Pac. Rep. 799. Section 1112, Gen. St., makes the civil practice act applicable in tax-suits. Section 4903 means that interest shall be allowed at the legal rate on all moneys after they become due, on any judgment recovered before any court in this state. Himmelman v. Oliver, 34 Cal. 247. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

VOLUNTARY BOND—ENFORCEMENT—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY.

1. As a general rule, a voluntary obligation founded upon a valid consideration is enforceable according to its terms and provisions, unless the same be against public policy, or forbidden by statute.

2. The sheriff has no authority to accept an undertaking for the release of money garnished, nor to execute a release for money in the hands of a garnishee, such property not being "in the hands of the sheriff." Code, §§ 111, 112. Nevertheless, where parties, through the instrumentality of an undertaking executed by them, procure money from the garnishee, they, having thus received the benefit of the undertaking, cannot be heard to deny its binding obligation upon themselves upon the happening of the contingencies therein provided for.

3. The authority of an attorney to appear for a party in a court of record must be questioned, if at all, in proper time and manner.

Error to superior court of Denver.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the opinion may be stated, in substance, as follows: Williams, the defendant in error, commenced suit against Given and Abbott, and caused the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company to be garnished in the sum of $485. To obtain a release of this money, an undertaking, in substance, like a redelivery undertaking in attachment was executed by Abbott, Longinetti, and Mazza, whereby, in consideration of the releasing of the money, they undertook and promised to the effect that in case the plaintiff recovered judgment in the action and the attachment was not dissolved, the defendant would, on demand, redeliver the money to the proper officer, or, in default thereof, that said defendant and his sureties would pay, or cause to be paid, to the plaintiff, the full amount of money so released. Upon receipt of the undertaking by the sheriff, he executed a writing to the garnishee, reciting that the money garnished in its hands was released, and thereupon the same was paid over to Abbott. Williams subsequently obtained judgment in the action for the sum of $480, including costs, and the attachment was sustained. Abbott, on demand from the sheriff for a redelivery of the money so released to be applied in satisfaction of the judgment, made default. Williams thereupon brought an action upon the undertaking, and recovered judgment thereon against Abbott and his sureties. This writ of error is prosecuted to reverse the latter judgment.

John A. Deweese and Ross & Deweese, for plaintiffs in error. L. B. France, for defendant in error.

ELLIOTT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is contended by counsel for plaintiffs in error that the sheriff has no authority to accept an undertaking for the release of money garnished, nor to execute a release for money in the hands of a garnishee; that the authority of the sheriff to accept an undertaking, and release attached property, is expressly limited to property "in the hands of the sheriff." Code, §§ 111, 112. Conceding that counsel have properly construed the Code provisions above cited, and that the sheriff did not have the power or authority, as a matter of law, to release the money in the hands of the garnishee, nevertheless, as a matter of fact, plaintiffs in error, through the instrumentality of the undertaking executed by them, did procure the money from the garnishee, and, having thus received the full benefit of the undertaking, they cannot be heard to deny its binding obligation upon themselves upon the happening of the contingencies therein provided for. It is a general rule that a voluntary obligation founded upon a valid consideration is enforceable according to its terms and provisions, unless the same be against public policy, or forbidden by statute. Hardesty v. Price, 3 Colo. 556, and cases there cited; Edwards v. Pomeroy, 8 Colo. 254, 6 Pac. Rep. 829; Johnson v. Weatherwax, 9 Kan. 75; Gartson v. Reeder, 23 Iowa, 21.

From the record, it appears that the undertaking sued on was entered into voluntarily by plaintiffs in error, with full knowledge of its purposes. The release of the money from the process of garnishment, and the delivery thereof to Abbott, was a good consideration for the promise to redeliver to the sheriff, or to pay the same to plaintiff, in case his attachment against Abbott should be sustained. The giving of the undertaking for the release of the money in the hands of the garnishee, though not provided for by the Code, was not against public policy; nor was it forbidden by statute. It was at most an unwarranted extension of the provisions of the attachment act, of which the plaintiff might justly complain, and which, if done without his consent, might be no protection to the sheriff, or the garnishee. But the plaintiff is not here complaining. On the contrary, he is asking the enforcement of the undertaking, and so, in a certain sense, may be said to have ratified the same ab initio. The cases cited by counsel for plaintiffs in error do not militate against the views above expressed. In the case of People v. Meigham, 1 Hill, 298, the action on the bond was defeated because the same was not in conformity to the statute; but the reasons given for the decision fully support our conclusions. Mr. Justice COWEN says: "At the common law, we might have saved the good, while we rejected the bad, part of the bond; or perhaps it might have been valid for the whole. Of this, it is not necessary to inquire; for 2 Rev. St. p. 214, § 60, (2d Ed.) absolutely destroys all and every part of any bond, taken by any officer by color of his office, in any other case or manner than such as are provided by law." As above stated, we have no such statute. The decision in the case of Henry v. Mining Co., 10 Fed. Rep. 11, seems to have been based upon an application to the court to discharge the garnishee upon giving the undertaking provided by the Code. While the court refused to order the money in the hands of the garnishee to be released, it does not by any means follow that, if the money had been so released, the parties executing the undertaking could have avoided their obligation, on the ground that the court was without authority to make the order.

A demurrer was sustained to the second defense of the answer; and this ruling is assigned for error. The defense consisted mainly of legal argument. The averment to the effect that, at the time of answering, an action was pending, in which Williams was seeking to recover of the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company the money garnished in its hands as due to Abbott, was clearly insufficient. It did not show that any judgment or satisfaction had been obtained thereon. The averment that "no money was ever received by said defendant Abbott, or either of said defendants, in consideration of executing said writing, and that said sheriff could not release the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company," was evidently regarded by the trial court as nothing more than a denial of the allegations of the complaint. It is clear that no substantial right was affected by sustaining the demurrer. The proof at the trial was positive and uncontradicted that the money garnished was actually paid over to Abbott upon the execution of the undertaking. The offer to show on the trial that Mr. France was representing the plaintiff, Williams, as his attorney, without authority, was properly refused. It was not the proper time nor manner of questioning the authority of an attorney to appear for another. Williams v. Canal Co., 13 Colo. 469, 22 Pac. Rep. 806; Dillon v. Rand, 15 Colo. —, ante, 185.

The remaining assignments of error do not require consideration. The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

KING COUNTY v. HILL et al.

FINDINGS BY COURT.

The court sustained defendants' exceptions to the report of a referee to whom a case had been referred for trial on questions of fact and law, ordered them set aside, and by the same order concluded that "it is the decision of the court that there is not sufficient evidence to support the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint in this action, and that the defendants' allegations are true, and the judgment should be rendered in favor of the defendants for their costs and disbursements herein." Held that, some of the allegations of the complaint not having been denied, and many of plaintiff's most important allegations being contained in the reply, the recitals of the order were not a sufficient compliance with Code Wash. § 246, providing that the court, on the trial of an issue of fact, shall state the facts found, and the conclusions of law.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

Ronald & Piles and W. S. Bush, for appellant. C. H. Hanford, Thomas Burke, Eben Smith, and Struve, Haines & McMicken, for appellees.

STILES, J. This cause involves the examination of the accounts of the appellee Hill, as treasurer of King county for a considerable period, and was referred by stipulation to a referee, under section 246 of the Code, to be tried upon questions of fact and law. The referee reported his findings of fact and conclusions of law in admirable form, together with the testimony and exhibits, and the cause then came before the court upon exceptions to the report filed by both parties. The plaintiff merely objected to the conclusions of law, which resulted in a smaller judgment in its favor than it deemed itself entitled to; but the defendants, by their objections, attacked the findings of fact as well, and sought to set aside the entire report and findings, including the testimony. The court, after argument, overruled the motion of the plaintiff, and at the same time, by an order, sustained certain of the exceptions of the defendants. The language of the order was: "The court sustains each and all of the exceptions [of the defendants.]" But further along it ordered "that the findings and conclusions of said referee be, and the same are, set aside," which, we take it, left the testimony intact, inasmuch as the subsequent decision of the court purported to be based on the evidence, for which there was no other resort than the testimony reported. This left the cause before the court for disposition, under section 256 of the Code, either to again refer or to "find the facts and determine the law itself, and give judgment accordingly." The latter course was chosen, and instantly acted upon; the same order which set aside the referee's report concluding with the following: "And it is the decision of the court that there is not sufficient evidence to support the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint in this action, and that the defendants' allegations are true, and the judgment should be rendered in favor of the defendants for their costs and disbursements herein." Then followed a judgment for defendants. The case was brought here upon several grounds, which were disposed of under the order of this court heretofore made, striking out appellant's statement.

The single ground now to be decided is whether the court erred in rendering a judgment against the plaintiff without finding the facts and determining the law thereon, appellant maintaining that the order of the court reciting that it is its decision "that there is not sufficient evidence to support the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint in this action, and that the defendants' allegations are true," is not a finding of facts at all, and that therefore there was no trial as required by the statute. With this view we are entirely in accord. The sections of the statute cited, taken together with section 246, are perfectly clear as to the duty of the court in such cases. We are not prepared to say that, where the pleadings make clear and simple issues, the allegations of the complaint and answer may not be referred to as findings, if the facts are found to be as laid in the one or the other, with the concise statement that the facts in each are true or untrue, as the case may be. But no such thing presents itself here, at least as to the complaint, of which it is said "there is not sufficient evidence to support the allegations." We know as a fact that some of the important allegations of the complaint were not denied by the answer, and many of the most important of the plaintiff's allegations were contained in its reply, wherein certain settlements alleged in the answer to have been made by defendant Hill with the county commissioners were shown to have been made under a mistake of facts, and these are not touched by the court's decision. From the language the court used, one reading its decision would be unable to say whether it found any particular controverted allegation sustained, and some others not; or whether all but one of the material allegations of the complaint may not have been fully sustained, and one equally material totally unsupported; or whether there was simply a general weakness of proof all along the line. If any fact material to the plaintiff's case was proven, it had a right to have it found, as though the cause had been submitted to a jury upon special issues. There was no waiver of findings. Even were there a statute similar to that providing for the waiver of a jury, mere silence would not constitute a waiver. Meeker v. Gilbert, 3 Wash. T. 369, 19 Pac. Rep. 18. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the superior court of King county, to be disposed of under section 256 of the Code.

LINBECK V. STATE.

BURGLARY—INFORMATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Code Wash. T. § 828, providing that "every person who shall be guilty of any such unlawful entry or unlawful breaking and entry, as described in the next preceding section, shall be deemed to have made such entry, or breaking and entry, with intent to commit a misdemeanor or a felony, unless such entry, or breaking and entry, shall be explained by testimony satisfactory to the jury * * * to have been made for some purpose without criminal intent," it is unnecessary for the prosecution to show the intent of the entry, and the information need not state the particular misdemeanor which defendant intended to commit. ANDERS, C. J., dissenting.

2. Under the statute making it the duty of the court to instruct the jury that no inference of defendant's guilt is to be drawn from the fact of his not testifying, it is error to omit such instruction where defendant simply remains silent.

3. Where the court, at the request of the jury, and in the absence of defendant, (he being confined in jail,) repeats certain of the instructions to the jury, and explains them, this is prejudicial error, though defendant's counsel is present and makes no objection.

Error to superior court, Chehalis county. Austin E. Griffiths, for plaintiff in error. George J. Moody, Pros. Atty., for the State.

HOYT, J. This action was commenced in the superior court of Chehalis county, by the filing of an information therein in substance as follows: "George J. Moody, prosecuting attorney of the state of Washington for the district comprising the counties of Wahkiakum, Chehalis, and Pacific, in said state, on oath accuse John Linbeck by this information of the crime of burglary committed as follows, to-wit: The said John Linbeck, on the 25th day of February, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety, and within one year next preceding the date hereof, in the county of Chehalis, aforesaid, in the state of Washington, did then and there, in the night-time of said day, unlawfully break and unlawfully enter the dwelling-house of one James Arland, there situated, with the intent then and there to commit a misdemeanor therein, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Washington." Defendant pleaded thereto not guilty. Trial was had, a verdict of guilty rendered, and judgment and sentence imposed; whereupon defendant has brought the case to this court for review.

The first ground of reversal relied upon is that the information does not state facts constituting a public offense; the contention in this regard being that it is not only necessary to charge that the entering was with an intent to commit a misdemeanor, but that the particular misdemeanor which he intended to commit must be set out. This contention is borne out by numerous authorities which the diligence of counsel has gathered for the information of this court; and we believe it to be the law in most of the states, and that it would clearly be the law here were it not for section 828 of our Code. Said section is as follows: "Sec. 828. Every person who shall be guilty of any such unlawful entry or unlawful breaking and entry as described in the next preceding section shall be deemed to have made such entry, or breaking and entry, with intent to commit a misdemeanor or a felony, unless such entry, or breaking and entry, shall be explained by testimony satisfactory to the jury trying the case to have been made for some purpose without criminal intent." And by virtue of its provisions the prosecution is no longer compelled to prove with what intent the defendant enters, but, on the contrary, the unlawful entering having been proved, the intent to commit a crime or misdemeanor is presumed; and, this being so, we are unable to see how the accuracy required before such section was enacted can now aid the defendant. The burden of showing the intent with which he entered is by said section cast upon him, and he can show such an intent to have been an innocent one as well without the details as to his specific intent as with it. Aided by the section above quoted, the information was sufficient.

The defendant was not sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and the court failed to instruct the jury, as required by statute, that from such fact no inference of guilt should be drawn. We think this was error. The statute in question makes it the duty of the court to give such instruction irrespective of the action of the defendant in relation thereto; and while we do not now hold that the right to have this instruction given may not be waived by some express act of the defendant to that end, we do hold that the simple fact that he remained silent did not amount to such waiver.

The court, upon the request of the jury, and in the absence of the defendant, (he being then confined in jail,) repeated certain of the instructions which he had given to the jury, and orally explained the meaning thereof, and we think this was error; and we do not think this error was cured by the fact that defendant's attorney was present and made no objection. Some other errors are founded upon the manner in which the instructions were given; but as these errors, if errors they were, are not likely to occur on a retrial of the cause, we do not think it necessary to discuss them. The judgment and sentence of the lower court must be reversed, and a new trial granted; and it will be so ordered.

SCOTT and STILES, JJ., concur. DUNBAR, J., not sitting.

ANDERS, C. J. I fully concur in the opinion of my associates that the judgment of the court below in this case should be reversed; but I am unable to concede that the information is sufficient to sustain the judgment pronounced against the defendant. The substance of our statute defining burglary is as follows: "Every person who shall unlawfully enter in the nighttime, or shall unlawfully break or enter in the day-time, any dwelling-house, etc., * * * within the body of any county, with intent to commit any felony or a misdemeanor, shall be deemed guilty of burglary." And it will be observed that the only difference, so far as the intent of the party charged is concerned, between the definition of the crime as above set forth and that at common law is that the former makes it burglary to enter or break a house with intent to commit a misdemeanor as well as a felony. Now the word "misdemeanor" comprehends and includes, in this state, all crimes not punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. It specifies no particular crime, but a class of crimes; and to charge one with having intended to commit a misdemeanor is simply to charge him with having intended some one of the many offenses included in the term, without specifying which, and without stating any facts from which any particular intent can be inferred. At common law, no indictment for burglary was sufficient which failed to state the facts necessary to show the particular felony intended to be committed, and the same rule should obtain under our statute. The defendant in this case had a right to be informed of the very nature and cause of the accusation against him, and not to be left wholly in the dark as to the particular facts he would be called upon to meet at the trial. And it seems to me that this information does not state any fact whatever as to his intent, but only a conclusion of law. Under our statute, which has gone, perhaps, as far as any in eliminating and discarding the useless forms and technicalities found in common-law indictments, the indictment or information must still be direct and certain as to the particular facts and circumstances constituting the crime charged; and these facts and circumstances must be clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, so that a person of ordinary understanding may know what is intended. Tested by this rule, this information is radically deficient. Nor am I able to understand how section 82nd of the Code can in any way supply the want of allegations in the information which would otherwise be necessary. It only purports to change or modify the rules of evidence, and not those of pleading. But in that respect it certainly goes to the very verge of legislative power, if not beyond it. It not only overrides the presumption of innocence which has hitherto been supposed to accompany the defendant through every stage of the trial, but it may also, under certain circumstances, completely nullify that provision of the statute which requires the trial judge to charge the jury not to draw any inference of guilt from the fact that the defendant may have failed or refused to testify in his own behalf. The court below neglected so to charge the jury, and that was one of the grounds on which the judgment was reversed. Of what avail could such a charge have been to the defendant if he was "deemed" guilty because he did not testify or show to the "satisfaction of the jury" that he entered the house for a lawful purpose?

McCLAIN v. TERRITORY.

ARSON—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Code Wash. T. § 323, as amended by Sess. Laws 1885-86, p. 77, provides that "every person who shall willfully and maliciously set fire to the dwelling-house, [tent, cabin, or any structure, no matter of what material constructed, used and occupied as a place of abode by any person or persons,] any barn, stable, outhouse, * * * of the value of five dollars, [or any stack of grain, hay, or straw of another of the value of five dollars,] shall be deemed guilty of arson, * * * and should the death of any person ensue therefrom, known to be occupying or present in said premises at the time such premises are willfully and maliciously set fire to, the offender, upon conviction thereof, shall be deemed guilty of murder in the first degree;" the words within the brackets being the amendments. Held, that an indictment for burning a dwelling-house which alleged that it was property of a certain person, and did not allege that it was used and occupied as a place of abode by anybody, was sufficient.

2. The allegation of the indictment that by the setting fire to and burning of the dwelling-house "one C., [deceased,] who was then and there known by M. [defendant] to be occupying one of the rooms in said dwelling-house, and known by said M. to be present in said room," etc., is a sufficiently direct statement that defendant knew that deceased was occupying the premises when they were fired.

3. The court, for the state, charged: "You must find from the evidence that C. was in the house at the time of the fire; that the defendant knew that he was there; and that C. came to his death in said house by reason of the burning of the house." Held error, in that it should have limited the knowledge of defendant that C. was in the house to the time the house was "set fire to."

4. The court of its own motion charged that "the prosecution must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt; that is to say, must prove the house, of five dollars at least in value, was burned at or about the date charged; that the defendant did this purposely; that C. * * * was in the house when he purposely set fire to it." Held, that the instruction was misleading, as not containing all the elements constituting the crime.

Error to district court, Thurston county. Ballard & Metcalf, (Eddy & Gordon, of counsel,) for plaintiff in error. W. C. Jones, Atty. Gen., for the Territory.

DUNBAR, J. The record discloses that, at a regular term of the district court of the counties of Thurston and Mason held at the city of Olympia, at the December term of said court, an indictment was returned against the plaintiff in error, which indictment, omitting the entitling of the cause, reads as follows: "Angus McClaine is accused by the grand jury of the territory of Washington for the counties of Mason and Thurston, of the crime of murder in the first degree, committed as follows: The said Angus McClaine, at the county of Mason, territory of Washington, on the 10th day of November, 1887, feloniously, willfully, and maliciously did set fire to a certain dwelling-house, the property of one W. H. Kneeland, of the value of six thousand dollars, and used and occupied as an hotel by the said Angus McClaine and his family, and then and there feloniously, willfully, and maliciously burned said dwelling-house. That by means of said setting fire to and burning of said dwelling-house as aforesaid, one Harry Connor, who was then and there known by the said Angus McClaine to be occupying one of the rooms in said dwelling-house, and known by said McClaine to be present in said room, was then and there in said room, within said dwelling-house, burned and consumed, and of the burning and consuming then and there died. And the grand jury aforesaid, by force of the statute in such cases made and provided, say that said Angus McClaine, in manner and form aforesaid, did feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, at said county and territory, kill and murder Harry Connor. [Properly signed and dated.]" The defendant having entered his plea of not guilty to said indictment, the trial of said cause was begun on the 9th day of December, 1887, and resulted in a verdict of "Guilty as charged in the indictment;" and on the 5th day of January, 1888, the plaintiff in error was sentenced by the court to suffer the death penalty. A stay of proceedings and writ of error were thereafter granted by the supreme court of the territory of Washington. Many errors were alleged in the assignment, but all the points mentioned in the supplemental brief of plaintiff in error or presented to the court by his counsel were the following: "(1) That the indictment in this case does not state facts sufficient to constitute the crime of murder, or any felony; (2) that it was error to permit the introduction of any evidence under the indictment; (3) that the court erred in giving the instructions asked by the prosecuting attorney; (4) that the court erred in instructing the jury upon its own motion." The indictment is based upon section 823 of the Code, as amended by the Session Laws of 1885-86, on page 77, which reads as follows: "Every person who shall willfully and maliciously set fire to the dwelling-house, [tent, cabin, or any structure, no matter of what material constructed, used and occupied as a place of abode by any person or persons,] any barn, stable, outhouse, ship, steam-boat, or other vessel, or any water-craft, mill, milk-house, banking-house, distillery, manufactory, mechanics' or artificers' shop, structure, building, or room occupied as a shop or an office for professional business, or printing-office of another, any public bridge, court-house, jail, market-house, seminary or college edifice, or building thereto belonging, or other public buildings of the value of five dollars, [or any stack of grain, hay, or straw of another, of the value of five dollars,] shall be deemed guilty of arson, and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than ten years nor less than one year, or in the county jail not more than six months nor less than one month, and be fined in any sum not exceeding one thousand dollars; and should the death of any person ensue therefrom, known to be occupying or present in said premises at the time such premises are willfully and maliciously set fire to, the offender, upon conviction thereof, shall be deemed guilty of murder in the first degree;" the words within the brackets being the amendments made in 1885-86 to section 823 of the Code. It is contended by plaintiff in error that the indictment in this case nowhere states that the dwelling-house burned was used and occupied as a place of abode by anybody, and that the allegation that it was used and occupied as an hotel by the said Angus McClaine and his family is not sufficient under this statute; that it is not the kind of occupancy contemplated by the statute where the building burned is alleged to be a "dwelling-house;" that, so far as the indictment alleging that the dwelling house was the property of one W. H. Kneeland is concerned, the word "property" is not used in the statute in connection with the burning of a dwelling-house; that it is not the burning of a dwelling-house the property of another that is included in the statute, but that it is the burning of the dwelling-house of another that the statute defines as arson; that our statute in reference to the burning of a dwelling-house is substantially the same as arson at the common law.

Were we to concede this last proposition, we should be compelled to pronounce the indictment insufficient, for at common law arson was the malicious and willful burning of the dwelling-house of another; the gist of the offense being the danger to the life of persons who were dwelling in the house. It was an offense against the habitation, and regarded the possession rather than the property; and when the burning of any other house than a dwelling-house was included within the offense, as the burning of barns and other outhouses, it was on the theory that the flames would extend to the dwelling and endanger the habitation. Hence the burning of many structures which is arson under our statutes was simply a misdemeanor at the common law. At the common law there was no question of value. It mattered not whether the house burned was worth thousands of dollars or but a few shillings; whether it was a palace or a hovel. It was the safety of the inhabitants of the structure that the law sought to protect. But a careful reading of our statute leads us to the conclusion that the legislature had in contemplation the protection of property as well as the preservation of life; for in every instance, including even a dwelling-house, a moneyed value is attached, and to secure a conviction for arson under the statute, value would have to be alleged and proven. The statutory crime and the common-law crime are radically different, and we can but adopt the view of the attorney general, that the legislature intended to define and punish the crime of arson upon an entirely different principle from that in which the common law made it belong; that they have intended to define a new crime, and the common-law definition cannot be resorted to, even for the purpose of aiding in the construction of this law, because it is manifest that the legislature used words in an entirely different sense from the sense in which they were used at common law. From the number of buildings and structures made the subject of arson in section 823 of the Code, the burning of many of which could in no wise ordinarily endanger life, it is evident that the main idea of the legislature was the protection of property; and this is confirmed by the fact that the legislature afterwards added, "any stack of grain, hay, or straw, of another of the value of five dollars," thereby carrying the provisions of the statute beyond the realm of habitation, although the question of valuation is never lost sight of. Under the provisions of section 823, it would not have been arson to have burned a stack of grain, hay, or straw of another; but the experience of the people soon after that enactment taught them that this was a class of property which needed protection from incendiaries, and the legislature, doubtless in response to their demands, incorporated this further protection to property under this section. The qualifying words "of another," are evidently used in the sense of ownership or property. "A stack of grain of another," or "a stack of straw of another," means nothing more or less than a stack of grain or straw belonging to another, or the property of another; and as the words "of another" are used in reference to a dwelling-house in the same sense, and qualify it in the same manner as they do all the succeeding words to which they apply, we must conclude, by all admissible rules of construction, that it is there to be construed to mean a dwelling-house the property of another, and not a dwelling-house inhabited by another.

It is urged again that the indictment is defective because it does not charge that the dwelling-house was used and occupied as a place of abode by any person or persons. Whether the allegation that "the dwelling-house was used and occupied as an hotel by the said Angus McClaine and his family" is a sufficient allegation, where an allegation of occupancy as a place of abode is required by the statute, we will not now discuss; for we are clearly of the opinion that, under our statute, no such an allegation is necessary, as the words "used and occupied as a place of abode by any person" were not intended to qualify the words "dwelling-house," "tent," or "cabin." These words are not found in section 823, although the word "dwelling-house" is in said section; the word "dwelling-house" being unqualified excepting by the words "of another." Afterwards, during the session of 1885-86, the words "tent or cabin" were added, because it was questioned whether the word dwelling-house" was comprehensive enough to include these mean habitations; and so that there might be no question about any manner of dwelling being included in the statute, after the words "tent," "cabin," were added the words, "or any other structure, no matter of what material constructed, used and occupied as a place of abode by any person or persons," the words "used and occupied as a place of abode by any person or persons" plainly qualifying the words "or any structure, no matter of what material constructed." Any other construction of this sentence would force us to conclude that the legislature intended to punish, under the provisions of this chapter, the malicious burning of a water-craft, though it may not have been used for months, and yet not punish the malicious burning of a dwelling-house unless it was used and occupied as a place of abode. We do not think that such is a fair or sensible construction of the statute. The plain intention of the legislature, gathered from the act and the history of its amendments, was to punish the malicious burning of any property mentioned in the act.

We do not think there is any force in the objection that the indictment does not charge by direct statement that the plaintiff in error knew that Connor, the deceased, was occupying or present in said premises at the time they were fired, but that it only appeared by way of recital. The language of the indictment is "that, by means of said setting fire to and the burning of said dwelling-house as aforesaid, one Harry Connor, who was then and there known by said Angus McClaine to be occupying one of the rooms in said dwelling-house, and known by said Angus McClaine to be present in said room," etc. We cannot understand how an averment could be more directly stated than this. It would make it no stronger and no more direct to transpose the words and say, "the said McClaine did know," etc. It is simply a choice of expression and arrangement of words. We are of the opinion that the indictment contains every averment necessary to charge the statutory crime of arson.

We now pass to the third and fourth grounds of objection urged by plaintiff in error,—objections which are more serious, in our opinion, and which are fatal to the prosecution in this case. At the instance of the prosecuting attorney the court gave the jury the following instruction: "You must find from the evidence that Harry Connor was in the house at the time of the fire; that the defendant knew that he was there; and that said Connor came to his death in said house by reason of the burning of the house;" and in no other part of the charge is the subject of the defendant's knowledge of Connor's presence at the time of the fire mentioned. It will be observed that the court here does not instruct the jury that they must find that the defendant knew that Connor was in the house at the time he set fire to it, "but at the time of the fire." This would embrace any time between the setting of the fire and the entire destruction of the house. Under such an instruction, if it had been proven that Connor was not there at the time of the setting of the fire, but that he afterwards came, and defendant knew of his being there, and in attempting to extinguish the flames, or through any accident, he lost his life in the flames, the jury would have been justified in convicting McClaine of murder. The language of the statute is: "And should the death of any person ensue therefrom, known to be occupying or present in said premises at the time such premises are willfully set fire to," etc. Were this instruction cured or explained by any other instruction, it might possibly be overlooked; but the following instruction, given by the court on its own motion, lays down a still looser rule for the guidance of the jury. The court says: "The prosecution must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt; that is to say, must prove the house, of five dollars at least in value, was burned at or about the date charged; that the defendant did this purposely; that Connor, or Connors, was in the house when he purposely set fire to it; and if about any of these essential facts there is any reasonable doubt you must acquit." Here it is not even hinted at that defendant need have any knowledge whatever of Connor's whereabouts at the time the fire was set or any time during the fire; but the jury is charged in substance that the essential facts are that the house burned was of the value of five dollars; that defendant burned it purposely, and that Connor was in the house at the time it was purposely set fire to; and that if these essential facts are proven beyond a reasonable doubt they must convict. It is too obvious to admit of discussion that all the elements of the crime necessary to be proven were not presented to the jury in this instruction; and the question now to be considered is whether this particular instruction was so segregated from the rest of the charge, and made so distinct and impressive, that it would be likely to mislead the jury as to what were the essential elements of the crime.

It is urged by the attorney general that "the omission to state all the law in a particular paragraph, if the law is correctly stated in the charge as a whole, is not error." We think the authorities uniformly hold that if, in defining the crime, any of the essential elements of the crime be omitted, or any legal defense to which the defendant is entitled, such omission cannot be cured by reason of any other portion of the charge correctly stating the law. In the case of People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 151, where it was alleged that the court in one paragraph had wrongfully instructed the jury on the law governing the subject of flight, the court, in reversing the judgment, says: "But it is claimed in behalf of the prosecution that the charge as a whole is correct, and therefore the judgment should stand. There is no doubt that in one part of the charge the law on this subject [flight] was correctly given to the jury; but the charge was contradictory; and that which was bad cannot be aided by that which was good;" and the court cited as in point the case of People v. Valencia, 43 Cal. 552, and that case is certainly in point here. In that case the court said: "It is not doubted that part of the charge is erroneous, as it omits from the definition of murder in the first degree the essential qualities of deliberation and premeditation; but it is contended by the prosecution that the court had correctly defined murder in the first degree; and, as the jury would consider together all the parts or propositions of the charge, the error in the part above cited is cured by the correct definition which had already been given. The two parts of the charge are contradictory; and the jury would not be able to say that the former rather than the latter should be received by them as the correct definition of murder in the first degree." In People v. Bush, 65 Cal. 129, 3 Pac. Rep. 590, the court says: "It is no answer to the objection that an erroneous instruction was given for the prosecution to show that in another part of the charge another instruction was given in which the law was correctly stated." So, to the same effect, Rice v. Com., 100 Pa. St. 28; People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 69; State v. Ferguson, 9 Nev. 113; Holmes v. State, 23 Ala. 23. In People v. Campbell, 30 Cal. 313, where the court in its general charge omitted one of the grounds of self-defense, but afterwards gave the instruction at the request of the defendant, the supreme court held that the instruction was somewhat modified by the portion of the charge before given, and the judgment was reversed. It seems to us that the case at bar is a much more extreme case than any above cited; for the instruction of the court on its own motion, to which the objection is raised, was evidently an attempt to group the essential elements of the crime together, and present them thus condensed for the consideration of the jury. And the jury, always anxious to ascertain the opinion of the court, are more inclined to give consideration to its voluntary instructions than to instructions given by request by either the prosecution or defense, and would be liable, if indeed not actually justified, in this case, in concluding that the essential facts necessary to be proven to insure a conviction were the identical essential facts mentioned by the court on its own motion; and, even if all the instructions in this case were considered together, without misleading or causing any embarrassment from omissions from any particular paragraph of the instructions, the law is not correctly stated, and the rights of the defendant were not wholly protected. This is a capital case; the defendant's life is at stake; and he had a right to have the law governing his case plainly, explicitly, and correctly stated. This was not done. It follows that the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. And it is so ordered.

STEWART v. LOHR.

PROBATE COURT—JURISDICTION—ADVERSE CLAIM—APPEAL—REVERSAL.

1. The probate court has no jurisdiction of a suit to determine the right to real estate as between the administrator of an estate and the husband of the decedent, who sets up an adverse claim.

2. Where, on motion to dismiss an appeal, it is decided that the judgment below is void because the court had no jurisdiction, the supreme court will order the judgment reversed, to avoid the evils which an apparently regular, though void, judgment may entail.

Appeal from superior court, Skagit county; J. R. WINN, Judge.

McBride, Preston, Carr & Preston and W. S. Bush, for appellant. Ronald & Piles, for appellee.

HOYT, J. Upon the motion to dismiss the appeal in this cause, it was made to appear to this court that the action was instituted in the probate court, and was there a contest between the executor of an estate and one claiming adversely as to whether or not certain real estate should be included in the inventory of the property of said estate. When this fact appeared, suggestion was made to counsel that the question of the jurisdiction of the probate court to hear and determine such a controversy was the material inquiry which the court would enter upon in deciding the motion to dismiss, and upon such suggestion argument was had and authorities cited, and we shall therefore examine the question.

It is conceded that if the probate court had no authority to institute the action, by reason of want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, then the superior court and this court could get no jurisdiction by way of appeal therefrom. That the probate court is without jurisdiction to try the title to property as between the representatives of an estate and strangers thereto is too well established by the authorities to require argument. See Schouler, Ex'rs, § 236; Lynch v. Divan, 66 Wis. 493, 29 N. W. Rep. 213; Budd v. Hiller, 27 N. J. Law, 54; Snodgrass v. Andrews, 30 Miss. 472; Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447. In the case at bar the person claiming adversely to the estate was the husband of the deceased party, and it appears that this fact was thought to affect the question. We, however, do not think so; for, while it is true that the probate court has jurisdiction to determine the claims of property as between those interested in the estate, this authority only goes to the extent of determining their relative interests as derived from the estate, and not to an interest claimed adversely thereto. In the case before us the husband, though interested in the estate of his deceased wife, was, so far as the claim he was attempting to assert, an entire stranger thereto. See Budd v. Hiller, above cited. The probate court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, from which it follows that the higher courts could get no jurisdiction on appeal.

It only remains to determine the character of the order to be entered. In the appellate courts of some of the states it is the practice, in cases like this, to simply dismiss the appeal and leave the judgment of the court below to stand in form as a judgment in force. These say that, as the judgments are upon their face absolutely void, they will not take jurisdiction even to reverse them. Other appellate courts, however, take the ground that as they have the power to clear their own records of objectionable entries, even though as standing thereon they are absolutely void, they have like power to set aside like void entries in the inferior courts, when the form of removing such void entries to such appellate courts has been complied with. We think the latter practice the better one. See Lynch v. Divan, above cited. A judgment unreversed, though void upon its face, may seriously embarrass the person against whom it is in form rendered, though it can, of course, be of no benefit to the person who has secured it. This being so, such judgment should not be allowed to stand. The appeal in this case must be dismissed, and the judgments in the superior court and in the probate court reversed; and such probate court must proceed in the administration of the estate in question in accordance with law. The appellant will recover costs of this court, and the appellee the costs in the superior court.

CADE v. BROWN.

LAND CONTRACT—BREACH—DAMAGES.

Where plaintiff has bought land, and made improvements on it, and bought lumber, and hauled it on the land for the erection of a building, the measure of damages for breach of contract to convey the land is the value of the land, including improvements made by plaintiff at the time of the breach, less the price plaintiff was to pay, together with any special damages in the purchase of the lumber.

Error to superior court, King county.

Ronald & Piles, for plaintiff in error. Jacobs & Jenner and Lewis & Gilman, for defendant in error.

SCOTT, J. Plaintiff claims he entered into a parol agreement with defendant for the purchase of a tract of land, being part of a larger tract owned by defendant. He also claims the defendant took him upon the premises, traced the boundaries of the land in question, and placed him in the possession thereof; that, in pursuance of the agreement, plaintiff kept possession of the premises, and made valuable improvements thereon with the knowledge and consent of defendant, and also purchased and placed upon the land certain lumber to be used by him in erecting a building thereon, which lumber subsequently became valueless to him through the breach of the defendant; and, further, that he tendered full compliance with the contract upon his part; that the defendant refused to comply therewith, and sold the land to another person; whereupon plaintiff brought this action at law to recover his damages. Upon the trial plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury that the measure of damages he was entitled to was the value of the land at the date of defendant's breach of the contract, together with the amount expended by plaintiff in making said improvements, less the purchase price plaintiff was to pay for the land. The court refused to give the instructions, but directed the jury, if they found for the plaintiff, to assess as his damages an amount equal to the reasonable value of the improvements made by him, to which plaintiff excepted.

It fairly appears from the whole case that the proof tended to show the land had greatly increased in value; and while the instructions asked by plaintiff were not correct in asking pay for his improvements in addition to the value of the land at the time of defendant's breach, as the value of the land at that time would include the improvements made thereon, and would have resulted in giving plaintiff pay twice for his improvements, which was properly refused, yet the instruction given by the court was also erroneous. The measure of the damages was the value of the land at the time of the breach, less the price plaintiff was to pay therefor, together with any special damage plaintiff might prove in purchasing lumber to erect a building upon the premises, which could not be considered an improvement before its erection. It is urged by appellee that an action at law will not lie in such a case; that the plaintiff's remedy, if he had any, was an action for specific performance of the contract, it not having been put in writing, and the purchase price not having been actually paid, but only tendered by plaintiff and refused by defendant; and where a specific performance cannot be had because of the inability of the defendant to convey, he having previously parted with the title, and where the action cannot be maintained against the vendee by reason of his not having had actual notice of plaintiff's rights, or where the possession of plaintiff was not sufficiently open and notorious to be held a constructive notice, that the plaintiff would be without a remedy, although a specific enforcement in consequence of a part performance by plaintiff might have been decreed against the defendant, had he retained the title. We think otherwise, and hold that in such a case an action at law for damages can be maintained. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MECHANICS' LIENS—DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES—PLEADING—PROOF—APPEAL.

1. Under the rules of the supreme court of Washington, where there is no motion to strike from the files an improperly settled statement of facts, objection to it is waived, though the point is made in the brief of the objecting party.

2. In an action against two as partners for the price of brick, the partnership is not established by evidence that defendant, who denies his liability, was working on the building with the other defendant, and that he wrote out the receipt for the brick, which was signed by his co-defendant only, and that he had stated something about his being as much a contractor on the building as any one.

3. In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, defendant may deny, on information and belief, the recording of the notice of lien.

4. Where defendant holds under a lease the property sought to be subjected to the lien, plaintiff cannot show defendant's interest by oral testimony.

5. Where the claim of lien is upon the whole of a lot, but the proof shows that it is only upon a part of it, 36 feet in width, nearer the center than either side of the 60-foot lot, the description proved is too indefinite to support a judgment, even though the latter adds to the description the name of the building on the land.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

HOYT, J. Plaintiffs obtained a judgment against C. Kavanaugh and Charles Roberts for certain brick alleged to have been sold and delivered to them, and also obtained a decree of foreclosure of a lien alleged to have been claimed and filed upon the leasehold interest of the defendant W. H. Cowie, in a certain brick building, in the construction of which, it was alleged, said bricks were used. From the judgment and decree thus entered defendants, Cowie and Roberts, have appealed, and the case is before us on a transcript of the record, and a statement of facts settled therein. As to this statement of facts, the record shows that the appellees objected to its settlement, and, in their brief filed here, they say it should be stricken from the record because not properly settled. But, as no motion to strike the statement was made and filed, as required by the rules of this court, we must consider the point made in the brief waived, and cannot enter upon an examination thereof.

Plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show a sale of the brick to defendant Kavanaugh alone, and the only evidence tending to show that defendant Roberts had any connection with the sale, either as a partner of Kavanaugh or otherwise, was the fact that he was at work with Kavanaugh on the building into which the brick went, and the further fact that he wrote an acknowledgment of the receipt of the brick, and of the amount still due thereon; but as this paper, though written out by Roberts, was signed by Kavanaugh only in his own name, and not by Roberts at all, neither the fact of his writing it out, nor the fact that he was working with Kavanaugh, would establish even prima facie the partnership alleged. It is true that, in addition to the above circumstances, one of plaintiffs' witnesses testified that defendant Roberts said something about his being as much a contractor on the building as any one; but this alleged conversation was too indefinite to prove anything, and could not aid the plaintiffs.

A notice of lien was introduced in evidence, but there was no proof tending to show that it had been recorded, as required by law. Not even the file-marks of the auditor appear upon the copy of the lien contained in the transcript. That the lien notice must be filed before the lien attaches, so that there can be a foreclosure thereof, is too plain for argument; and we do not understand that counsel for appellees contend to the contrary. The appellees, however, claim that there was no sufficient denial of such filing in the answer of defendant Cowie, and that for that reason they were not required to prove such fact. The language of the denial of the paragraph alleging the recording of the lien is as follows: "Defendant denies any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, and therefore denies each and every allegation contained therein." And it is not claimed that it is not sufficient in form. It is however contended that a denial of knowledge or information, as to a fact the truth or falsity of which can be ascertained by reference to a public record of which every person has constructive notice, is sham, and frivolous, and of no effect. We think the rule thus stated is too broad. To hold that a defendant must, at his peril, obtain positive knowledge of every fact shown by the public records of which he by law is required to take notice would be contrary to the provisions of our Code, as it has been interpreted by a uniform course of practice for a series of years. It would likewise be against the weight of authority. See Vassault v. Austin, 32 Cal. 597; also, Brown v. Scott, 25 Cal. 190. The true rule we believe to be that as to all facts that are presumptively in the actual personal knowledge of the defendant, or as to which it is his duty to have or obtain such personal actual knowledge, he must answer positively, or, by direct averments, show why he cannot so answer, and that, as to all other facts, he may answer that he has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief. From the fact that the law makes a record constructive notice, it does not follow that every one has any actual personal knowledge of such record, nor does it impose upon them the duty of acquiring such knowledge. The claim of lien was upon the whole of lot 3 in a certain block in Seattle, whereas the proof tended to show that a portion of said lot was not only not owned or leased by the defendant, but was in the actual and open possession of other owners or lessees, and upon such proof plaintiffs sought a foreclosure on a portion only of said lot. Whether or not such a course could be sustained in any case we shall not now decide, as, in this case, the particular part of the lot upon which it was claimed that the lien could be maintained was not made sufficiently definite and certain to sustain a judgment. The proofs showed that it was a part of said lot 3, 36 feet wide, nearer the center than either side of said lot, and that said lot was 60 by 120 feet.

In the judgment, there is an attempt to improve upon the proofs, by adding to such description an allegation that the building thereon situated was known as the "Cowie Block;" but this addition was unwarranted by the proofs, and, even when thus aided, we think the description so indefinite that a sale thereof could not be intelligently had. It is an easy matter to have these descriptions accurate, and fair dealing, as well as public policy, requires that they shall be, in substance, so complete and certain that an officer charged with the sale of the property would have no doubt as to just what he is called upon to sell.

Plaintiffs were allowed to show, by oral testimony, facts in regard to the ownership of the lot in question, and as to defendants' interest therein as lessees of said owner, though it affirmatively appeared that the lease in question was in writing, and within the convenient reach of the parties. This was error, and should be corrected on a retrial of the cause. The court found that $60 was a reasonable attorney's fee in the proceeding, for which finding we are unable to find any warrant in the proofs. The judgment and decree must be reversed as to defendants Cowie and Roberts, and a retrial had in accordance with this opinion.

FOSTER v. STATE.

GAMING—DEFINITION—INDICTMENT—JUDGMENT.

1. Code Wash. § 1253, providing that every person who shall deal, play, or carry on, open or cause to be opened, or who shall conduct either as owner, proprietor, or employe, any game of faro, monte, etc., shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and section 1258, providing that any person who shall suffer or permit any of the acts or things forbidden or made punishable by sections 1253, and 1256 to be done or carried on in any house, room, or other place, of which he is the owner, or in the possession of which he is entitled under this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor,—state with sufficient clearness that the act of dealing faro or suffering or permitting the same to be done on one's premises is a crime.

2. An indictment charging one with permitting faro to be dealt on his premises is sufficient without specifying with whom the game was played, or in what particular manner it was conducted.

3. Under the provisions of section 1258, imposing a fine not exceeding $500 on conviction, and declaring that defendant shall stand committed until the same is paid, it is no valid objection to a judgment that the court included costs in its sentence, and that it did not fix a definite period of imprisonment in case of non-payment of the fine, as the section should be construed in connection with section 2105, providing that on conviction the defendant shall be liable to costs in all cases, and section 1125, providing that in default of payment of fine and costs a warrant shall be issued for defendant's commitment, specifying that he be imprisoned one day for every $2 of such fine and costs.

Appeal from district court, King county;
THOMAS BURKE, Judge.

Code Wash. § 1253, provides that "each and every person who shall deal, play, or carry on, open or cause to be opened, or who shall conduct, either as owner, proprietor, or employe, whether for hire or not, any game of faro, monte," etc., "whether the same be played for money, checks, credits, or other representative of value, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and shall be imprisoned in the county jail until such fine and all costs are paid: provided, that such person so convicted shall be imprisoned one day for every two dollars of such fine and costs, and that such imprisonment shall not exceed one year." Section 1258 provides that "any person who shall suffer or permit any of the acts or things forbidden by or made punishable by sections 1253 and 1256, this act, to be done, or carried on in any house, room, shop, or other building whatsoever, or any boat, booth, garden, or other place, of which he is the owner, or in the possession of which he is entitled under this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and imprisoned in the county jail until such fine is paid."

Robinson & Farwell, for appellants. E. M. Carr, Pros. Atty., for the State.

ANDERS, C. J. The grand jury of King county returned an indictment into the district court charging appellant with the crime of permitting the game of faro to be dealt upon his premises, the body of which is as follows: "J. H. Foster is accused by the grand jury of the territory of Washington, for the county of King, in the third judicial district of said territory, by this indictment, of the crime of permitting faro to be dealt on his premises, committed as follows: The said J. H. Foster, on the 12th day of January, 1889, in the county of King, in the district aforesaid, then and there being in the lawful possession of a certain room, then and there situate, and being in a certain building known as the 'Grotto,' then and there situate, and being on the south side of Yesler Avenue, between Commercial and South Second street, in the city of Seattle, in said King county, unlawfully, knowingly, and willfully did permit one J. Bachele, then and there and therein to unlawfully, knowingly, and willfully deal a game of faro then and there played with cards for money." To this indictment appellant caused a plea of guilty to be entered, and subsequently filed a motion in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment did not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime. The motion was denied, and the defendant was sentenced, by the court, to pay a fine of $500 and costs amounting to $20, and stand committed to the county jail of King county until said fine and costs should be paid or the defendant discharged according to law, and remanded the defendant into the custody of the sheriff to carry the sentence into effect. The defendant appeals, and asks this court to reverse the judgment of the court below for the following reasons: (1) That section 1258 of the Code is void for uncertainty, and because it does not describe the offense; (2) that section 1253 is also void; (3) that, even if the statute is valid, the indictment does not state facts constituting an offense; and (4) that the judgment and sentence of the court is void because it exceeds the limitations of the statute and the jurisdiction of the court.

The objection to the validity of the statute is not tenable. The language is sufficiently explicit to enable the court, with reasonable certainty, to discover what the legislature intended, and the statute cannot therefore be held void for ambiguity or uncertainty. Mere inaccuracies of expressions, or faulty arrangement of words and phrases, if the meaning is intelligible, are insufficient to warrant the court in declaring a statute void. Bish. St. Crimes, (2d Ed.) § 41. And we are of the opinion that the objection that the sections of the Code above mentioned do not describe an offense is equally untenable. Counsel claims that the statute does not explicitly point out or describe the acts constituting the crime; but we think otherwise. It states clearly enough, as we read it, that the act of dealing faro, or suffering or permitting the same to be done on one's premises, is a crime. Similar statutes exist elsewhere, and, so far as we are advised, have seldom been questioned. People v. Beatty, 14 Cal. 567; People v. Sam Lung, 70 Cal. 515, 11 Pac. Rep. 673.

The indictment is sufficient. The gravamen of the offense consists in permitting the game to be dealt in prohibited places, and it was not necessary to specify with whom the game was played, or in what particular manner it was conducted. The definition itself sets for the constituent elements of the crime, and the indictment being in substantially the same language fulfills all the requirements of the law. People v. Saviers, 14 Cal. 30; Rice v. State, 3 Kan. 141; Bish. St. Crimes, (2d Ed.) §§ 890, 891; Romp v. State, 3 G. Greene, (Iowa,) 276; People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 153, 22 Pac. Rep. 129.

That the judgment in this case exceeds the limitations of the statute or the jurisdiction of the court we cannot concede. Section 1258 of the Code imposes a fine not exceeding $500 upon conviction, and provides that the defendant shall stand committed until the same is paid, but is silent as to costs; and it is therefore claimed that the court had no right or authority to include the costs in its sentence, and thereby really impose a fine of $520. It is also contended that the judgment is void for the further reason that the court did not fix a definite period of imprisonment in the event of the non-payment of the fine. But we think these objections cannot be sustained. This section ought, in our opinion, to be construed in connection with the general provisions of the Code upon the subject of costs in criminal cases, and of imprisonment for non-payment of fines. Section 2105 provides that on conviction the defendant shall be liable to pay the costs in all cases, and section 1125 (amended in Laws of 1883, p. 38) provides that when a defendant is sentenced to pay a fine and costs, and is remanded into the custody of the sheriff, the clerk of the court, in default of payment or security of payment, shall issue a warrant for his commitment, specifying that the defendant shall be imprisoned one day for every two dollars of such fine and costs. We see no error in the judgment and sentence of the court in this action. The only exception to the general rule that the defendant on conviction must pay the costs, of which we are aware, are found in section 1104 of the Code, which provides that, if the court or jury trying the cause expressly finds otherwise, the defendant shall not be liable. For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the court below must be sustained.

WAY v. STATE.

GAMING—APPEAL—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Under a statute permitting the destruction of gambling apparatus seized and held as evidence, on the conviction of defendant, where the record is silent as to how the apparatus came into the sheriff's hands, it cannot be presumed that such possession was wrongful, or that the recitals and order of the court directing the destruction were unauthorized.

Appeal from district court, King county; THOMAS BURKE, Judge.

Robinson & Farwell, for appellants. E. M. Carr, Pros. Atty., for the State.

ANDERS, C. J. The facts in this case are similar in all respects to those of the case of Foster v. State, ante, 459, (just decided by this court,) except that in this action the court ordered the destruction by the sheriff of certain gambling apparatus which was seized in the possession of the defendant and held as evidence upon the trial. Appellant claims that the statute permits the destruction of such gambling implements only as have been seized under the authority of a search warrant and retained as evidence, and that the property destroyed was not so obtained. It is difficult to see how the method of obtaining the possession of things liable to destruction on account of their character and the purposes for which they are used could affect the power of the court over them; but it is not necessary to determine that question in this instance, for the reason that the record is silent upon the question of how this "gambling apparatus" came into the possession of the sheriff, and we cannot presume that such possession was wrongfully obtained, or that the recitals and order of the court were unauthorized. And, besides, the record fails to show that any objection or exception was made or taken to the order, and the assignment of errors fails to mention it. For the foregoing reasons, and those given in the case of Foster v. State, above mentioned, the judgment of the court below must be sustained.

MECHANIC'S LIEN—NOTICE OF CLAIM—DESCRIPTION OF LAND—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A notice of claim of mechanic's lien describing the land on which the building is situate as a certain lot specifically bounded "excepting a space of 22 feet, more or less, wide on Pike street, by about 25 feet deep," is insufficient, because too indefinite, it not appearing where, in the larger piece, this excepted smaller piece is located.

2. In Washington there can be no lien on the building alone separate from the land.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

HOYT, J. Opinion on Motion to Dismiss. The objections to the appeal herein urged by the appellee are as to irregularities not going to the jurisdiction of the court, and, in view of the uncertainty existing at the time the appeal was taken, growing out of the change of the rules of this court, and the unsettled practice thereunder, we do not think that they are such as should deprive the appellants of the right to be heard. The motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore denied.

Opinion on Merits. Appellee sought to obtain a judgment for material furnished by it for the erection of a certain frame building, and to foreclose a lien thereon for the material so furnished. Many questions have been argued here by counsel for the respective parties, but the view we take of the law of the case makes it unnecessary for us to consider more than one. The notice of the claim of lien was introduced in evidence, and from such notice it appeared that the description of the land upon which the lien was claimed was "all that certain plat of land situated at the south-westerly corner of Pike and Fourth streets, in the city of Seattle, King county, and state of Washington, being seventy feet on Pike street, and on the southerly line thereof, by seventy-five feet front on Fourth street, and on the westerly line thereof, excepting a space of 22 feet, more or less, wide, on Pike street, by about 25 feet deep; the same being a part of the said lots 2 and 3 of said block 21, A. A. Denny's addition, aforesaid;" and was in our opinion so indefinite and uncertain that a decree of foreclosure could not be founded thereon. It is true that the large piece first described is definite and certain, and, if the effect of the continuance of the description had been to except therefrom any certain portion, then the description as a whole would have been good. But such is not the effect of the remainder of the description; on the contrary, its effect is to except from such larger piece a smaller one, the location of which is entirely uncertain. It is true that the area of such smaller piece may be taken as definitely set out by striking from such description the words "more or less," and also the word "about;" and, for the purpose of sustaining the lien, we should not hesitate to treat such words as surplusage. The fact that the area is certain will not, however, aid the description so long as its location in the larger tract is uncertain. The area in question might be a strip 11 feet wide and 25 feet long on either side of a line drawn at any point from Pike street, not less than 11 feet, nor more than 59 feet, from Fourth street. The description, as a whole, is just as uncertain as to the land covered thereby as would be one covering an entire section of land excepting one quarter thereof, without in any way pointing out which quarter section was so excepted. The question is not here presented as to the effect of such notice if the proofs had been such as to make certain the description intended, and the decree had corresponded to the amended description made by such proofs, for in this case the description in the notice is in no way aided. It follows that there could be no foreclosure of any interest in the land upon which the building was erected because of such insufficient description. The notice of the lien described the building into which the material went so that it might properly be identified; and, if a lien can be maintained upon a building, as such, separate from any interest in the land upon which it is situated, then the decree of foreclosure in this case might be sustained so far as it relates to the building, and would only have to be modified so as to cover that and nothing more. Such a lien can only be maintained when the statute in express terms so provides. Every case which we have been able to find holds that there can be no such lien without a statute expressly providing for a lien on the building separate from the land. Babbitt v. Condon, 27 N. J. Law, 154; Coddington v. Dry-Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law, 477; Tracey v. Rogers, 69 Ill. 662. In Missouri and Iowa, and perhaps other states, a lien upon the building alone can be maintained; but there, as elsewhere, the courts say that it can only be allowed by force of the positive provision of the statute, which in those states not only provides for a lien upon the building separate from the land, but further provides that the purchaser of such building shall have a reasonable time in which to remove the same from the land upon which it was situated. Jodd v. Duncan, 9 Mo. App. 417. Our statute would be capable of such a construction had it provided any way by which a lien established upon a building alone could be made of value to a lienor, but it has not done so, and we are therefore forced to the conclusion that the lien upon the building was only intended to be enforced in connection with some interest or right to the land upon which it was situated. Something has been said about the duty of courts to give a liberal interpretation to our statutes; and that such is the duty of all courts, made so by the statute itself, is very plain. But the most that a liberal interpretation can allow a court to do, is to look with leniency upon the language used, and determine, without regard to technical accuracy of language, what the legislature intended. When the intention of the legislature has been thus ascertained, it is beyond the power of a court to dispose with any of the steps prescribed. To hold that a lien could attach without a full compliance with the statute, as thus interpreted, would be contrary to the act itself, as well as to the constitution of our state, which provides that no property can be taken without due process of law. Under the circumstances of this case there can be no lien, and the cause will be remanded, with instructions to set aside the judgment and decree, and enter a new judgment against defendant Phillips for the amount found due and unpaid for the material furnished, with interest thereon to date of the judgment. Appellants will recover costs of this court.

PARTNERSHIP—LIABILITY OF RETIRING PARTNER—NOVATION.

1. An agreement between partners upon dissolution of the firm that the retiring partner shall not be liable for the previous firm debts, which shall be paid by the one continuing the business, does not relieve the retiring partner from liability to the firm creditors unless they assent to the arrangement, and assent is not given by mere silence after notice of the dissolution and agreement.

2. The retiring partner who relies on this agreement and the assent of the creditors to it as a release, must prove such assent by a preponderance of evidence.

Appeal from superior court, King county; I. J. LICHTENBERG, Judge.

Thomas Burke, (Andrew Woods, of counsel,) for appellants. Lewis & Gilman, for appellees.

DUNBAR, J. This was an action by plaintiffs and appellants to recover a balance alleged to be due from defendants and appellees on account, amounting to $203.43, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the 3d day of April, A. D. 1884. Service of summons was had only on defendant Joseph Green. The defendant Green, for an affirmative defense, alleged that on the 23d day of February, A. D. 1884, he and one Alfred Page were doing business under the firm name of Page & Green; that on or about the 3d day of April, 1884, they dissolved partnership; that at said time there was due Wadhams & Elliott about the sum of $203; that the said Page continued to run and manage the said business of the said partnership; that the said Page was to pay the said Wadhams & Elliott the said amount due said firm; that Wadhams & Elliott were notified of said dissolution; that they accepted the said Alfred Page for the said indebtedness due them from said firm of Page & Green, and transferred the account of Page & Green to the said Alfred Page, and held the said Page only for the said amount of indebtedness, and did then and there release the defendant Green from any obligation or indebtedness due to plaintiffs by the said firm of Page & Green. The affirmative matter in defendant's answer was denied in plaintiffs' reply. Payment of the said indebtedness was also alleged in the answer, but no attempt was made to prove the payment on the trial, except as stated in the affirmative answer. The jury found a verdict in favor of defendants, judgment was rendered in accordance therewith, and from said judgment plaintiffs appeal to this court, also alleging certain errors in the instruction of the court.

While a "novation" was pleaded as an affirmative defense in this action, there was no proof tending to show that Wadhams & Elliott had ever, by express or implied contract, agreed to extinguish defendant Green's liability by substituting or accepting Page as the payor of the debt incurred by the partnership of Page & Green. It is true that the testimony of Green showed that it was agreed between Page and Green that Page should assume this debt, and that Green should be discharged, and that Wadhams & Elliott were notified of the dissolution and of the agreement between Page and Green. But the promise of one partner to pay the debt of another, for which he is already bound, is no consideration for an agreement to release the other partner. Early v. Burt, 68 Iowa, 716, 28 N. W. Rep. 35; Wildes v. Fessenden, 4 Mete. (Mass.), 12. In order to give any weight to an agreement whereby liabilities are extinguished, it is essential that all parties in interest should be parties to the agreement. It would certainly be a loose and unjust law that would allow obligations to be thrown off or transferred at the will of the obligor. Such is not the law. If one partner transfers his liability to another, and the creditor does not assent to the transfer, his rights are not affected. As stated by Mr. Lindley, in his excellent work on Partnership, it cannot be too often repeated that, merely by retiring, a partner gets rid of no liabilities, as to past transactions unless there is some statutory enactment applicable to his case; and the same observation applies to a total dissolution. To use the words of Mr. Justice HEATH: "When a partnership is dissolved, it is not dissolved with regard to things past, but only with regard to things future. With regard to things past the partnership continues." Indeed, so improbable was the idea that a creditor would release a part of his security, and rely on one debtor when he before had two, without taking any other security, that some of the early English courts held that where a partnership had been dissolved, one member retiring and the other continuing the business, and agreeing to pay the debts of the old firm, where the creditors knew of the arrangement, and consented to it, and transferred the debt to the new firm, and where there was strong testimony outside of this fact showing that the creditors had agreed to discharge the defendant, and look to the other partner, the retiring partner was liable; and the fact that no person had become liable to the defendant who was not so originally was relied upon by the court as showing that there was no consideration for the alleged discharge. The most noted cases holding this doctrine were Lodge v. Dicus, 3 Barn. & Ald. 611, and David v. Ellice, 5 Barn. & C. 196. But, while this doctrine has been modified by the later decisions and authorities, no court that we know of has gone so far as to hold that the simple agreement between the partners that one of them should be discharged, and notice to the creditors of said agreement, will affect the rights of the creditors, or be construed as any implied promise on the part of the creditor to discharge either partner. But the opposite doctrine has been enunciated by many courts. Chase v. Vaughan, 30 Me. 412; Umbarger v. Plume, 26 Barb. 461; Coleman v. O'Neil, 1 N. W. Rep. 846; Aiken v. Thompson, 43 Iowa, 506, and cases cited; Blew v. Wyatt, 5 Car. & P. 397; Harris v. Lindsay, 4 Wash. C. C. 98; Heberton v. Jepherson, 10 Pa. St. 124; Payne v. Slate, 39 Barb. 634; Offutt v. Scott, 47 Ala. 104.

It is urged by counsel for appellees that the fact of silence, and the long delay in making any demand, is, of itself, evidence of acceptance of the agreement of the partners in this case. Even if the testimony bore out this assumption, silence alone on the part of the creditor is no evidence of a "novation." The failure of a creditor to demand payment for any period of time within the statute of limitations will not discharge the retiring partner. Harris v. Lindsay, 4 Wash. C. C. 98; Jenness v. Lane, 26 Me. 475; Hall v. Jones, 56 Ala. 493. But the testimony does not show silence on the part of Wadhams & Elliott. On the contrary, the defendant Green himself testifies that after he had notified Wadhams & Elliott of the dissolution, and of his arrangement with Page for Page to pay the debts, Wadhams & Elliott expressly insisted that he (Green) should sign a note with Page for the payment of said debt, and that he refused to so sign. This was also sworn to by plaintiffs. This, instead of indicating an acceptance of Page by Wadhams & Elliott, was a direct avowal by them that they would not discharge Green; and that they desired to have their account settled by the joint note of both partners, as is usual in such cases. The testimony of Wadhams also was that he wrote several letters to Green demanding the payment of this account, and the exhibits show that, for some time prior to August, 1886, he had placed the account in the hands of attorneys for collection; and it can easily be gathered from the correspondence that the bill had been presented, and payment thereof refused by the defendants. Neither was there any testimony tending to show that the account of Page & Green had been transferred to the account of Page. The only testimony on this point was the testimony of Wadhams, who testified positively that all the payments that had been made on the account of Page & Green were credited on the account of Page & Green, and that the said account of Page & Green had not been transferred to the account of Page. In fact we are unable to find any testimony in the case tending to show in the least any consent expressed or implied on the part of Wadhams & Elliott to discharge the defendants from their obligations. This being the case, and the amount claimed by the complaint to be due having been proven by the plaintiff to be due, and the correctness of the claim not having been denied by the defendants in their testimony, the verdict was unwarranted, and the judgment must be reversed. It is also claimed by appellants that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "It is not necessary that the defendant Green proves to you beyond a reasonable doubt that the creditors or these plaintiffs accepted Page, nor need he prove the fact by an overwhelming weight of evidence. It is not necessary that he proves it by more testimony than against it." This instruction we think was error. It is almost too elementary to need repeating here that every affirmative allegation must be proven by a preponderance of testimony. This is a general proposition, but the law especially provides that the onus of showing an extinguishment lies upon those who allege it. Davis' Estate v. Desauque, 5 Whart. 530, and cases cited; Hall v. Jones, 66 Ala. 493.

It is urged by the appellees that the charge as a whole was correct, and the jury would not be misled; but we think this particular statement,—"It is not necessary that he proves it by more testimony than against it,"—couched, as it was, in words which could be plainly understood by an unprofessional mind, and a proposition that the jury would probably segregate and remember, would be liable to mislead them as to the amount of testimony necessary to establish an affirmative allegation.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded to the lower court, with instructions to grant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

WILKIE V. CHANDON.

INDORSEMENT OF NOTE—CONSIDERATION—WAIVER OF PROTEST.

1. One who becomes a party to a note by indorsing the same before delivery to the payee identifies himself with the maker; and the settlement of a pre-existing debt owing from the maker to the payee is a sufficient consideration to uphold, not only the note, but also the contract of indorsement.

2. A waiver of protest on a negotiable instrument executed and indorsed in California also waives presentment and notice under the express provisions of Civil Code Cal. § 3160.

3. Where the undisputed proof shows that defendant signed a note as indorser, a special interrogatory to the jury as to whether defendant signed as maker, surety, or indorser is properly refused.

4. The special interrogatory is also bad for indefiniteness, as the jury might feel called on to answer it either with "yes" or "no," or as to in which capacity defendant signed the note.

Appeal from district court, Chehalis county.

Bignold & Stinson, for appellant. O. V. Linn, for appellee.

HOYT, J. Defendant was sued as an indorser of a certain promissory note. Judgment was rendered against him, to reverse which he has brought the case here. Several errors are assigned as cause for reversal, but of these it is only necessary that we should examine two, as all the others depend upon and must be controlled by the decision of those two: (1) That the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for nonsuit; (2) that the court erred in refusing to submit certain questions, requiring a special finding of fact, to the jury. Plaintiff, to maintain his action, introduced proof tending to show that the note in question was given in settlement of an account due him from one John Wilkie, a brother of defendant, and that said note was signed by said John Wilkie as maker, and was payable to the defendant, who before its delivery to plaintiff indorsed it, first causing to be written above his name as such indorser the words, "I hereby waive protest on within;" that plaintiff received the note, and the promised payment of $35 in cash, as a settlement of his said account against said John Wilkie; and that said note had not been paid. There was proof upon some other points, but the statement thereof is not necessary for the discussion of the questions raised on this appeal. When plaintiff rested, defendant moved the court for a judgment of nonsuit, and urges here two reasons why such motion should have been granted: First, that the proof failed to show any consideration for the note sufficient to charge this defendant; second, that no demand of payment upon the maker had been proved. That the settlement and satisfaction of a pre-existent debt is sufficient consideration for a note given in such settlement is too well settled to require argument at this day, and we do not understand that appellant contends to the contrary, so far as the original debtor, as the maker of the note, is concerned. He does, however, contend that, as no consideration actually passed from the original creditor—that is, that he parted with nothing of value—at the time of the transaction, there was no such consideration as would sustain defendant's contract as indorser, as he was a stranger to the original indebtedness. We think, however, that, by consenting to become a party to the note and an indorser thereof before delivery, he identified himself with the maker, and became a party to the consideration; and that, as there was a good consideration for the making, there was also, under the circumstances disclosed by this case, a good consideration for the indorsement.

Where the language of the waiver, as in this case, was only of the protest, it would be a question of some importance to determine whether or not in the absence of a statute upon the subject it could, by intentment, be so extended as to be a waiver of demand of the maker; but that case is not now presented, as this note was executed in California, where there is legislation upon this subject. Section 3160 of the Civil Code of California is as follows: "A waiver of protest on any negotiable instrument, other than a foreign bill of exchange, waives presentment and notice;" and, aided by this, the waiver on the note in question was a waiver of demand, and therefore it was not necessary to prove one.

The defendant asked the court to submit two questions to the jury. The first was as follows, to-wit: "Did the plaintiff in this action ever present the note to the maker thereof, or demand payment of the same from the maker, John Wilkie, before the commencement of this suit?" We have already seen that there was absolutely no proof as to demand, and that under the law of the case no demand was necessary, and hence it would have been worse than idle to have submitted such questions, and the court did only its duty in refusing so to do.

The second question was: "Did the defendant, David Wilkie, sign the note as maker, surety, or indorser?" The court properly refused to submit this question for the reason that the undisputed proofs showed that he signed the same as indorser, as not only the plaintiff's proofs showed this to be the fact, but the same was testified to by defendant himself. Besides, the question was not in such form that the court could properly require the jury to answer it. The jury, from it, might feel called upon to answer as to in which of said capacities he signed, and equally as well might feel called upon to answer "Yes" or "No" as to the entire question. Questions submitted to a jury for a special finding should be carefully drawn, and call for a direct answer, and should be such that all minds would understand them alike; and, if not so framed, the court should refuse to submit them. On the whole record, we see no error, and the judgment must be affirmed, with costs; and it is so ordered.

IN RE RAFFERTY.

HABEAS CORPUS—PRACTICE—JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Under Enabling Act Wash. § 24, and Act Wash. Dec. 13, 1889, (Sess. Laws, 1889-90, p. 94,) continuing all laws in force applicable to the state government, and substituting the word "state" for "territory," the provisions of Code Wash. c. 53, in regard to habeas corpus, apply to the supreme court of the state.

2. The provisions of Const. Wash. art. 4, § 4, that the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction in habeas corpus, is self-executing.

3. Under the authority of the supreme court v. 25P. no. 7—30 to issue writs of habeas corpus it can grant an order nisi to show cause why the writ should not issue.

4. The provision of the constitution that "the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction in habeas corpus and quo warranto and mandamus as all to state officers," does not limit the jurisdiction of the court in habeas corpus proceedings to cases where state officers are concerned.

5. The provision of Const. Wash. art. 1, § 2 that "the constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land," relates only to matters wherein the general government assumes to control the states, and does not control the further provision of the constitution relating to prosecutions by information, and to dispensing with grand juries.

6. The title of Laws Wash. 1889-90, p. 100, relates only to proceedings by information. Const. Wash. art. 3, § 19, provides "no act shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." Held, that section 7 of the act, dispensing with grand juries, unless ordered by the judge, was within the title, and did not bring another subject into the act.

7. Where an act containing a repealing clause is void, the former act will in all cases be unaffected by the repealing clause.

8. Under Code Wash. § 677, prohibiting inquiry into the legality of a commitment issued on a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, where the court is competent to exercise jurisdiction in the premises, but, by reason of irregular process and proceedings, does not obtain and maintain jurisdiction, the remedy is by appeal, and not by habeas corpus after commitment.

Henry W. Lueders, for petitioner. W. C. Jones, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SCOTT, J. Defendant was convicted in the superior court of Pierce county of the crime of an attempt to commit rape, and upon June 24, 1890, was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of 14 years. After his incarceration, application was made to the Honorable THEODORE L. STILES, one of the judges of this court, for a writ of habeas corpus, whereupon an order nisi was made by said judge, requiring the warden of the penitentiary to show cause to this court why the writ should not issue. This being the first proceeding of the kind before us, the question arises as to the jurisdiction of the court in such matters, and necessitates a construction of section 4, art. 4, of the state constitution, as to its purport, and as to whether it is self-executing in this particular, and, if not, whether an act passed by the last legislature, (see Sess. Laws 1889-90, p. 321,) re-enacting said section verbatim, vivifies the same, no way having been pointed out as to the manner of procedure in such cases; also, as to whether the provisions of the Code found in chapter 53 apply to this court, by virtue of section 24 of the enabling act, and an act of the legislature approved December 13, 1889, (see Sess. Laws 1889-90, p. 94,) continuing all laws in force applicable to our present system of government, and substituting the word "state" for "territory," etc. It is contended that the provisions of the Code are not applicable to us, because it would result in compelling this court or its several members virtually to sit as committing magistrates under Code, § 678, to inquire into the sufficiency of causes, where persons are held for trial upon criminal charges, and that no such state of affairs could have been intended, in view of its consequential inconveniences and expense. It is further contended that the provision referred to of the constitution is not of force until legislation is had pointing out the manner of carrying the same into effect, and providing some means of preserving the records in such cases, particularly when such a proceeding is had before one of the individual judges of this court; and, if this is true, then the literal re-enactment of said section by the legislature does not help this out, and the constitutional provision is dormant.

In the light of all the law submitted to us bearing upon the subject, we are forced to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the awkward results that might occasionally be brought about in cases where this court should be called upon to review the proceedings of committing magistrates, which would practically amount to an appeal therefrom, and be a rehearing thereof, the provisions of the Code mentioned do apply to this court until the same are changed by legislative enactment. We are also of the opinion that the constitutional provision in question is within those denominated or recognized as self-executing, especially when considered with the general power of the court to regulate its proceedings. It can hardly be supposed it was contemplated or intended so important a right as this should be suspended, as far as the jurisdiction of this court is involved, until such uncertain time as it should be called into life by legislation pointing out the method of procedure. In the absence of such legislation, this court could establish rules defining the course to be pursued, if necessary to enforce it. It is apparent, however, by section 687 of the Code, that in all cases where the writ is directed by the supreme court or a judge thereof, or an order nisi made, the same should be issued by the clerk of this court. Where the same is made returnable before a superior court or judge, the subsequent proceedings would be had in such court.

An objection was urged that there was no authority for granting an order to show cause at all; that, as the laws cited speak only of the writ, it must be the writ, if anything. It is the practice in the United States courts to grant an order nisi, and section 755 of the Revised Statutes is more imperative than our own in relation to the speedy issuance of the writ. It was also the established practice at the common law to grant a rule nisi in the first instance. See Whart. Crim. Pl. § 986. Therefore, in view of the lesser expense and greater simplicity of the proceeding in not requiring the presence of the prisoner, we think it is the better practice, and authorized here.

It is further contended that our constitution only gives the supreme court authority to issue the writ as to state officers, although it gives each one of the judges of said court power to issue on behalf of any person held in custody, and, at the option of such judge, to make the writ or order returnable before the supreme court. The language of that part of the section is as follows: "The supreme court shall have original jurisdiction in habeas corpus and quo warranto and mandamus as to all state officers;" and while, perhaps, a literal grammatical construction of this clause, as contended, might not give the court jurisdiction, and might prevent its exercise, except as to where state officers are concerned, yet, if so, the language must yield somewhat to prevent what would apparently approach a legal absurdity. See Potter's Dwar. St. pp. 143-146, as to American rules of construction. 1 Story, Const. par. 400, at page 283. It cannot well be supposed that it was intended to confer greater powers upon the several judges of this court than upon the court itself, and especially to give the single judges power to compel the court to hear and determine such matters in all cases, by making the process returnable before the court. No reason has been pointed out for such a grant, and reliance is had solely upon what is contended to be the correct interpretation of the clause quoted. We are of the opinion that the fair meaning of the whole section gives the court original jurisdiction to issue the writ or make the order nisi in all cases.

It is also contended that the lower court had no jurisdiction in this case because the defendant was tried upon an information. In support of this, petitioner argues that as section 2, art. 1, of the state constitution reads, "the constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land," and as the constitution provides no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, that there is no authority to try persons in this state for such offenses upon information, claiming that the provisions in our constitution, relating to prosecutions by information and to dispensing with grand juries are of lesser force, and must yield to section 2, quoted. In further support of this position he cites section 4 of the enabling act, requiring the constitutional convention to declare on behalf of the people that they adopted the constitution of the United States. It is manifest, however, that section 2 only relates to those matters wherein the general government assumes to control the individual states, and the requirement of a presentment by a grand jury is not one of them. That it was not intended to carry the principle further than this in our constitution is apparent in the light of its other provisions. Nor can it be supposed that congress undertook or intended to impose upon the newer states any restrictions additional to those placed upon the older ones. In fact, section 8 of the enabling act expressly declared that they should be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the original states. As to construction, see 1 Story, Const. §§ 402-405, Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) p. 26; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90; Twitchell v. Com. 7 Wall. 321.

Petitioner further contends that section 7 of the act found at page 100, Sess. Laws 1889-90, dispensing with grand juries unless ordered by the judge, is void, as not being within the title of the act which only relates to proceedings by information, and he also claims it is another and distinct subject. To support this, our attention is called to section 19, art. 2, of our state constitution, which provides, "No act shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title," and to Harland v. Territory, 3 Wash. T. 131,<sup>1</sup> but we are all of the opinion the section of the act referred to is within the title, as in providing for proceedings by information the necessity for a grand jury was dispensed with, and the same act, consequently, could very well provide that grand jurors should not be summoned, except in the contingency there mentioned. Nor does it bring another subject into the act in the sense contemplated by the constitutional provision referred to, it not being within the spirit or reason of the prohibition. The subject being in relation to prosecutions for crimes, the matters there legislated upon were all properly included in the act.

It is further urged that the crime of rape is not a statutory offense in this state; that Code, § 812, was repealed by a subsequent law enacted in 1886. See Sess. Laws 1885-86, p. 84, § 1, which, under the decision of the territorial supreme court in Harland v. Territory, is void, it having been entitled only as an act to amend section 812 of the Code, but that section 2 of said act, which contains the repealing clause, is valid, as it being in favor of defendants in criminal prosecutions is entitled to a more liberal holding. The weight of authority is entirely against the petitioner. If the act is void as claimed, it is invalid for all purposes, and Code, § 812, is still in force; and even if there was no statute upon the subject rape would still be an offense at common law.

Petitioner claims if the Code provisions relating to habeas corpus do apply to this court that we are not prevented from issuing the writ in this case by subdivision 1 of section 677, which prohibits inquiry into the legality of any commitment issued on a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. He claims the lower court, by reason of alleged errors lost jurisdiction of defendant's person, and that the writ can issue in all cases where such jurisdiction is wanting. But we are of the opinion said provision does not mean that the writ will lie where the court did not have and maintain such jurisdiction by regular process and proceedings, but means a court competent to exercise jurisdiction in the premises. In such cases defendants must be left to the remedy by appeal. Ex parte Williams, 1 Wash. T. 240. Here the superior court had jurisdiction of the offense charged, and for that matter it appears of defendant's person as well. Were any irregularities found in its proceedings, we could not review them in this way. The authorities cited by petitioner, where a different rule prevails, were founded upon statutory provisions essentially differing from our own. The writ is denied.

FINDINGS OF FACT—WAIVER.

1. Under the provisions of Code Wash. T. § 246, that on the trial of an issue of fact by the court, its decision shall be given in writing, and filed with the clerk, and that the facts found and the conclusions of law shall be separately stated, and judgment shall be entered accordingly, the recital in the judgment that "the court finds the matters and things set forth in the complaint are true," etc., cannot take the place of findings; especially where one of the allegations of the complaint is admitted to be untrue by the reply.

2. In the absence of an affirmative showing by the record that findings of fact were not waived, there is no presumption of such waiver.

Appeal from superior court, Pierce county; FRANK ALLYN, Judge.

Town & Likens, for appellants. Applegate & Titlow, for appellee.

STILES, J. This was a bill in equity filed to compel the specific performance of a contract for the sale of standing timber and numerous articles of personal property, the performance involving the payment of the sum of $302.75 in money, the execution and delivery of certain promissory notes secured by a mortgage, and the procurement of a policy of insurance. An injunction to restrain the sale of the contracted property and the appointment of a receiver were asked pending the litigation. The cause was tried by the court, and a judgment for $2,199.65 and costs was rendered against the defendants. A motion for a new trial was denied, and the cause appealed to this court.

One of the grounds for a reversal urged by the appellants is that no findings of fact or law were filed by the court as required by section 246 of the Code, and, as we consider the objection well taken, we shall confine our decision to that point in the main. Section 246 is as follows: "Upon the trial of an issue of fact by the court, its decision shall be given in writing and filed with the clerk. In giving the decision, the facts found and the conclusions of law shall be separately stated. Judgment upon the decision shall be entered accordingly." This language is almost precisely the same as that of sections 632 and 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California. No findings of fact whatever were made or filed in this case, it is conceded. But the appellee points out that in the judgment there occurs the following: "The court finds the matters and things set forth in the complaint are true, and that, upon the cause of action therein set forth, said defendants, Bard and Patrick, are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of ($302.25) three hundred and two dollars and twenty-five cents, with interest thereon, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, from October 8, 1888, and the further sum of ($2,000) two thousand dollars, with interest thereon, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, from the 20th day of October, A. D. 1888, and the further sum of ten dollars for his attorney fee herein; and that, on account of the matters set up in the answer, the defendants are entitled to recover, by way of set-off against plaintiff's demand, the sum of ($250) two hundred and fifty dollars, to be deducted as of the date of October 20, 1888." This we are urged to accept as a compliance with the statute, inasmuch as it is there stated that the court "finds the matters and things set forth in the complaint are true," and several cases from the California Reports are cited to sustain this view, or to avoid the effect of the omission should we not agree with the appellee. So far as we are aware, from the Washington Territory Reports, this is the first time this issue has been squarely raised here, and we shall therefore allude to a number of the California cases on the subject. In McEwen v. Johnson, 7 Cal. 258, is the first instance where findings of fact made by reference to the pleadings were sustained. But there the findings were "that the facts stated in the plaintiff's complaint are true," and "that the facts stated in the defendants' answer are not true," and the court said: "Under these provisions, we think the findings may well refer to the pleadings for a specification of the facts found and not found; provided, such reference is sufficiently distinct to make it intelligible, and the facts are sufficiently stated in the pleadings. In this case there was a very clear and simple statement of the facts in both the complaint and answer." In Fralus v. Mining Co., 35 Cal. 34, the decision says: "The special findings of fact by the court, as found in the record, cover the material issues in the case, and the general finding that 'all the allegations and averments in plaintiff's complaint are true, and that all in the answer are untrue,' is sufficient and conclusive of the issues made by the pleadings." Citing McEwen v. Johnson. In Williams v. Hill, 54 Cal. 390, the statement is: "The objection that the findings do not support the judgment, in that the court did not find as to the alleged mistake, is fully answered by the finding of the court 'that all the facts set forth in the complaint are true,' and by the fourth finding." Carey v. Brown, 58 Cal. 180, sustains a finding "that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and all the allegations of the answer are untrue," on the authority of Fralus v. Mining Co. Likewise in Davis v. Drew, 58 Cal. 152, certain findings of the court were objected to, one of them being in the following form: "(4) And all and singular the allegations contained in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4 of defendant's answer are true." But the supreme court sustained the finding, with this exclamation of regret: "This mode of finding facts by reference to the answer or portions of it is not to be commended. It imposes greater labor in this court, both on counsel and court. But our predecessors have accepted such findings as proper and sufficient, and therefore we do not feel disposed to adopt a different course." There are many other cases in the California Reports on this subject, but we do not find a single one in which a total absence of findings was sustained, except for reasons hereafter mentioned, or one in which the recitals of a judgment were taken as a compliance with the law. In every one of the cases mentioned above, findings were filed, and in all but the first there were special as well as general findings.

We now stand where the supreme court of California stood in 1857, when it passed upon the case of McEwen v. Johnson, and we deem it better, as we have the opportunity, to shape the practice in this state so that our successors may not have to repeat the helpless plaint of the California supreme court, when deciding Davis v. Drew, in 1881. The cases in California, however, hold that, unless it appears affirmatively, by the record, that findings of fact were not waived in the court below, it will be taken that there was a waiver, and therefore no error, and appellees urge a like practice here. But section 634 of the California Code of Civil Procedure expressly provides three methods by which findings of fact may be waived, and the case of Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626, clearly explains the theory upon which the supreme court of that state holds as it does as to waivers. It is enough to say that we have no statutory provision of this sort whatever, and therefore nothing to base such a ruling upon. Eakin v. McCraith, 2 Wash. T. 112, 3 Pac. Rep. 838, is cited to sustain the proposition that, if the findings are general, the aggrieved party must move in the court below to have them made more specific. But that was not a case where there were no findings; on the contrary, the findings made and filed are quoted in the opinion, and we do not observe that any point was made in the argument, as reported, against the findings; but, even if there were, we do not dissent from the decision of our predecessors, under the circumstances stated in their decision. The case under consideration is therefore not parallel with any of the cases cited or discussed above. The complaint was long and much involved. The answer, in addition to general denials of almost everything in the complaint, alleged fraudulent misrepresentations, payment, compliance with the contract, and failure of the plaintiff to comply, and his want of ability to comply, besides a paragraph in the nature of a counter-claim for damages. And the reply admitted one very material allegation of the complaint, viz., the ownership of certain timber contracted to be sold, to be untrue. Therefore, were we to admit the recital in the judgment that "the court finds the matters and things set forth in the complaint are true," to be a finding, within the statute, we must hold it to be entirely insufficient. Indeed, the court could not find the allegations of the complaint to be true, in the face of the admissions of the reply as to the ownership of the timber. Again, this "finding" makes no disposition whatever of the allegations of the answer, except that it awards $250 to the defendants, but whether as damages, or on account of payments alleged, does not appear. And the judgment itself, being for $2,199.65 in favor of the plaintiff, negatives the idea that the allegations of the complaint were found to be true, since under its allegations the judgment prayed for would have been the only proper judgment, and not a judgment for money. True, we are informed in the course of argument by counsel that the time for the payment of the notes for $2,000 had expired at the time of the trial, and that for that reason the money judgment was entered; but that could not be done without the filing of a supplemental complaint, under Code, § 114, when the cause of action would change from that of specific performance to one of money demand or contract, with, perhaps, a foreclosure of the promised mortgage.

Under these circumstances, it is unnecessary for us to revert to or pass upon the numerous errors assigned by the appellants, upon the court's refusal to admit certain testimony of the defendants, and to exclude certain testimony of the plaintiff; except that we may say that there are 27 of these alleged errors requiring the minute examination of the whole mass of short-hand testimony, and the retrial of the entire case, all of which serves to emphasize the necessity of proper findings in this instance. These alleged errors were nearly, if not quite, all connected with the introduction of a certain written contract, which was the basis of the action; and if we had here the view of the trial court expressed in the findings, concerning that contract, there would have been little or no propriety in bringing up the voluminous testimony, as the appeal would, in all probability have been based upon the proposition that the conclusions of law and the judgment were not warranted by the facts found,—a pure question of law, not requiring any statement of facts, or the great expense necessary to its preparation and settlement. As we regard it, section 246 is for the protection of court and parties. To the court it gives an opportunity to place upon record its view of the facts and the law in definite written form, sufficiently at large that there may be no mistake. To parties, it furnishes the means of having their causes reviewed, in many instances, without great expense. The findings of fact are deemed a verdict, and are subject to the same rules as a verdict; and that they be found is a substantial right, as inviolate, under the statute, as that of trial by jury under the constitution, without express waiver. While we are upon this subject, and touching the requisite of proper findings, we cite Breeze v. Doyle, 19 Cal. 102, and Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 302, as authorities. The judgment of the court below must be reversed, and a new trial granted, with leave to the plaintiff to file a supplemental complaint, and with further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. And it is so ordered, costs to appellants.

DEMURRER—MISJOINDER OF CAUSES—APPEAL—PLEADING.

1. Where two causes of action, one for $200 and the other for $500, are improperly joined, and defendant demurs for this reason, and because the complaint does not state a cause of action, the court cannot avoid passing upon the first ground by sustaining the second as to one of the causes of action. The demurrer for misjoinder must be sustained, and plaintiffs allowed to amend by selecting which cause they will stand upon, and dismissing the other.

2. The plaintiffs, having excepted to the sustaining of the demurrer to their cause of action for $500, could have appealed, and the amount in controversy would have exceeded $200, and been sufficient to give the supreme court jurisdiction; and, as the right to appeal is reciprocal, defendant's appeal from the judgment against him on the cause of action for $200 gives jurisdiction.

3. A complaint to recover a real-estate commission is defective when it merely alleges that plaintiffs found a purchaser and made a sale to him at the price fixed in their contract with defendant, without averring that they communicated the fact to defendant, and that the arrangement was either carried out or that defendant refused to carry it out after notice.

4. An averment that defendant "denies generally each and every allegation" of the complaint was a good general denial, and defendant could introduce thereunder all evidence tending to disprove the evidence to sustain the complaint.

5. Where, in addition to a good general denial, defendant pleads other matters which might be proved under the general denial, the fact that the court improperly strikes them out as frivolous and irrelevant is not prejudicial error.

6. The reviewing court cannot consider a statement of facts settled and certified in the absence of the opposite party, and without notice to him.

Appeal from superior court. Whatcom county.

STILES, J. The complaint contained the separate statement of two improperly joined causes of action, in the first of which $200 was demanded, and in the second $500. Demurrers were interposed, on the ground—First, that two causes of action had been improperly joined; and, secondly, that the complaint did not state a cause of action. The court below, on the hearing of these demurrers, disregarded the first ground of demurrer, but ruled on the second, to the effect that the first cause of action, as pleaded, was sufficient, but that the second was not. We presume that the failure to pass upon the demurrer for misjoinder was upon the theory that, as the facts stated in the second cause of action were not sufficient to constitute a ground of complaint, there was no misjoinder, and it was therefore not necessary to rule upon that point. This was clear error. The demurrer upon this ground should have been sustained, and the plaintiffs allowed to amend by selecting which of the causes of action they would stand upon, and dismissing as to the other. The error thus committed would not be very material in this case were it not that the court's action has opened the way to a motion to dismiss this appeal, on the ground that this court has no jurisdiction under that clause of the constitution (article 4, § 4) which restricts it to cases of this class, where the original amount in controversy is above $200. In this instance, the "original amount in controversy" was the amount demanded,—$700. But the appellees contend that, inasmuch as the second cause of action contained an allegation of damage in the sum of $500, and the first cause of action a like allegation of damage in $200, the act of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the second cause, ipso facto, reduced the amount in controversy to exactly $200. The demand, however, remained $700, and there was no amendment making it less. Inasmuch as the allegations of the first cause of action tended to show a right in the plaintiffs to compensation for services rendered of the value of $200, for which demand had been made before suit, the proper judgment would have been $200, with interest thereon from the date of the demand until the judgment,—something more than $200. Therefore, it was proper that the prayer of the complaint on that cause of action should be more than the bare principal, which would have given this court jurisdiction.

There is another and an equally important ground, however, upon which we must sustain this appeal. It is claimed in the brief of the appellees that, upon the demurrer to the second cause of action being sustained, that cause of action was abandoned, and no longer formed a part of the controversy. Were that so, and had an amended complaint been filed, demanding only $200, we should hold with the appellees. But on referring to the record, we find that not only was there no abandonment, but that the order sustaining the demurrer distinctly shows the plaintiffs excepting to the ruling of the court, thus preserving to the plaintiffs the right to appeal from that judgment. True, the trial went on upon the first cause of action, and plaintiffs were apparently satisfied with their recovery; but, had the judgment been against them, it was quite in their power to appeal to this court, giving it jurisdiction of the whole amount of $700, on account of the alleged error of the court in sustaining the demurrer. If there would be jurisdiction for one side, there must be jurisdiction for the opposite side. The notice of appeal was given in open court, and was in accordance with the act of 1883. No notice whatever appears to have been given to the plaintiffs of the settlement of the statement of facts, nor do they or their attorneys appear to have been present when it was settled or certified. Upon the objection of the appellees, we must therefore disregard it. Taylor v. Osborn, 23 Pac. Rep. 858. The appeal is therefore before us upon the judgment roll upon the following points: (1) Error of the court in not sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the first cause of action; (2) for want of findings of fact and conclusions of law; (3) error in striking out portions of the answer. This was an action for a real-estate agent's commission, and the complaint alleged that certain property was placed in the hands of plaintiffs by defendant for sale at a certain price, and the plaintiffs undertook to use their best efforts to find a purchaser at the price named; for which, they being successful, they were to receive the usual commission, alleged to be 5 per cent., and to charge the defendant. The complaint also alleged that plaintiffs had found a purchaser at the price named, and completed the bargain with the purchaser for the sale of the same. But there was no allegation that the plaintiffs had ever communicated knowledge of their action to the defendant, or that he had carried out the arrangement they had made for the sale, or had refused to carry it out after notice of the arrangement; and in these particulars at least it was fatally wanting. Mechem, Ag. § 612; Love v. Miller, 53 Ind. 294.

A motion for a new trial was made upon several grounds, none of which we can notice, with the exception of the fifth, for the reason that they are dependent upon the statement of facts, which is out of the case. The fifth ground was that the decision was against law, and is argued by reference to the insufficiency of the facts to support the judgment. No findings whatever were filed, the only allusion to the subject being found in the judgment which recites that the court "finds for the plaintiffs." We have discussed this matter of findings at large in Burd v. Kleeb, ante, 467, (decided at this session of the court.)

The court below, on motion, struck out all of the defendant's answer excepting the first clause in these words: "First. He denies generally each and every allegation thereof;" that is, of the complaint,—which defendant assigns as error. But, although, we do not consider all of the matters stricken out as sham, frivolous, or irrelevant, the error was harmless to the defendant, as everything material was in the nature of evidence which could have been introduced under the general denial. We note, however, in the judgment, that the court seems to have held the first denial above quoted not to be a general denial, and refused to allow the defendant to introduce any testimony under it, although it is recited that "the defendant offered evidence tending to deny the allegations of the complaint." We are at a loss to understand how a better general denial could have been framed. Gammon v. Dyke, 2 Wash. T. 266, 5 Pac. Rep. 845, and Dillon v. Spokane Co., 3 Wash. T. 498, 17 Pac. Rep. 889, did not hold otherwise, or even touch the question. Assuming that the plaintiffs had proven facts sustaining every allegation of their complaint, it was then certainly competent for the defendant, under his restricted pleading, to disprove those facts if he could. The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted, with instructions to the court below to sustain the demurrer of the defendant on the ground of the misjoinder of causes of action, and also his demurrer to his first cause of action, with leave to the plaintiffs to elect which cause of action they will proceed upon, and to file an amended complaint thereon; after which defendant will have leave to answer the amended pleading. And it is so ordered, with costs to the appellant.

CARSTENS v. McREAVY.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Nov. 21, 1890.)

REAL-ESTATE AGENTS—AUTHORITY TO SELL—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. A real-estate agent authorized to "sell" land has thereby no authority to execute a contract of sale.

2. The objections that the evidence did not justify the findings, and that the court erred in permitting the witnesses to testify concerning certain matters, cannot be considered, where there is not brought up with the record any statement of witnesses, or any question or answer, or any objection, ruling, or exception.

Appeal from district court, King county.

Thompson, Edsen & Humphries and Rochester, Lewis & Gilman, for appellant. Preston, Albertson & Donworth, for appellee.

STILES, J. A so-called "statement of facts" is brought up with the record in this case, which is merely a slight enlargement of the findings of fact filed by the judge who tried the cause. Presumably this statement was intended to respond to the first and third grounds urged on the motion for a new trial, viz., that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings, and that the court erred in permitting the agents of the appellant to testify concerning certain matters. When this court is called upon to say whether the evidence fails to sustain any or all of the findings of fact below, the testimony, at least in so far as it touches the objectionable findings, must be included in the statement; and, if objections to the admission of testimony are relied on, the questions asked, the answers returned, and the documents admitted, if any, must appear, with such other of the testimony as may be necessary to explain the connection of the objectionable matter with the case. In this instance, the statement does not contain the name of a single witness, or the statement of any witness; nor any question or answer; nor any objection, ruling, or exception; and it very decidedly sustains the findings in every particular, as might be expected. Therefore, it is useless for the purposes for which it was prepared, and we must confine any examination of the case to the other question raised, which is whether the conclusions of law and the judgment were warranted by the findings, which were in almost the same language as that of the complaint.

The appellant was the owner of certain real property in the city of Seattle, and the court found that, at a certain date, agents named, who were real-estate agents in Seattle, "were the agents of defendant for the sale of the aforesaid real estate, and were then and there duly authorized and empowered by the defendant, by writing under the defendant's hand, to make and negotiate a sale of said real estate." The agents, thus authorized, executed and delivered to the appellee a contract for the sale of the appellant's property, without his knowledge, and in his absence from the state, and received a portion of the purchase money. Appellant refused to recognize the contract thus made, claiming that the authority by him given to "sell" did not include the authority to execute a contract, or anything more than to find a purchaser. This was the vital point in the case, upon which the court held with the appellee, and directed that the contract thus made be performed. The statute of frauds may be satisfied by the execution of a contract for the sale of lands by the hand of another person than the party to be charged, if that person be thereunto lawfully authorized, and it is well settled that such third person may be thus lawfully authorized orally, by written direction not under seal, and even by a course of conduct amounting to an estoppel. It, therefore, only remains to determine whether the ordinary real-estate agent or broker, authorized to sell land, is thereby empowered to enter into a contract binding upon his principal, in an action for specific performance. A real-estate agent is a person who is, generally speaking, engaged in the business of procuring purchases or sales of lands for third persons, upon a commission contingent upon success. He owes no affirmative duty to his client, is not liable to him for negligence or failure, and may recede from his employment at will, without notice. On the other hand, courts almost unanimously unite in holding that in case of an ordinary employment to sell, when he has procured a party able and willing to buy upon the terms demanded by his principal, and has notified him of the purchaser's readiness to buy, the agent's work is ended, and he is entitled to his commission. It is not his duty to procure a contract, or to make one, and he is not in default if he fails to do either. Therefore, to our minds, it seems clear that, ordinarily, it is not within the contemplation of the owner and agent, where property of this character is placed in the hands of the latter for sale, that he shall, without consultation with his client, execute a contract. We are aware that courts have held to this extent, basing their decisions upon a distinction between an authority to sell and an authority to find a purchaser, and upon the well-known rule that an authority to an agent to do a thing is presumed to include all the necessary and usual means of executing it with effect. But such holdings do not commend themselves to our judgment, and as this is a new question in this state, and we are satisfied that it is not the general practice of agents to make such contracts, we do not hesitate to dissent from the decisions above mentioned, especially as there is no lack of authority for the position we take. We cannot shut our eyes to the obvious defect in the argument that authority to sell, in this instance, necessarily implies authority to execute a contract. A sale of land "executed with effect" includes the execution of a deed, and the delivery of possession, neither of which the agent can do, unless his authority to sell is supplemented by the delivery of possession to him, and a power of attorney to convey; so that he does not, although in possession of the authority to "sell," have all the necessary means of executing that authority with final effect. He stops short somewhere, and, when we are inquiring where the probable and proper place of his stoppage is, the evils that would attend the extension of his actual authority, beyond the finding of a purchaser, furnish ample reasons for fixing his limit there. An agency of this kind may be created by the slightest form of words, without any writing, leaving it to litigation to determine whether the substance of the authority is "to sell," or "to find a purchaser," wherein the unscrupulous and dishonest agent would be at once arrayed as the principal witness against his client, with every advantage from some note, "made at the time," of what the instruction was. Perjury would go at a premium in such cases, and the confiding and unlettered would be its victims. Scarcely any man, when listing his property with a real-estate agent, stops to give details, either as to the property itself or as to the arrangements he desires to make, yet no one would sell upon equal terms to a first-class business man, and to an habitual drunkard, or well-known insolvent; and the ordinary owner would not sell at all to a person whose very occupancy would tinge the neighborhood with a bad repute. These are good reasons, and are probably some of the reasons why custom and the law have made it not necessary that real-estate agents should actually procure contracts in order to earn their compensation, and why, in this connection, the common understanding of the phrase "authority to sell" means only authority to find a purchaser, whether the authority be given orally, or by written request.

In considering this case, we have examined the numerous authorities cited by both sides, as well as many others, and find the position we take fully sustained by Morris v. Ruddy, 20 N. J. Eq. 236; Milne v. Kleb, 44 N. J. Eq. 378;<sup>1</sup> Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240; Armstrong v. Lowe, 76 Cal. 616;<sup>2</sup> Mechem, Ag. § 966; Warvelle, Vend. 213; 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 573, note 2. The earlier cases in New York were to the same effect, notably Colman v. Garrigues, 18 Barb. 60, and Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. 145; but they were overthrown by Haydock v. Stow, 40 N. Y. 363, without sufficient reason, as it seems to us. We note that in nearly, if not all, the states where the courts at any time held agents to sell real estate authorized to execute contracts of sale, especially in New York and Illinois, the legislatures very soon after amended the statutes of frauds, so as to require the agent's authority to contract to be in writing. Lyon v. Pollock, 99 U. S. 668, presents a state of facts not found, to any extent whatever, in the case at bar, and is therefore not applicable, and the same may be remarked of Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213. What a broker must do to "complete a sale" is well defined in McGavock v. Woodlief, 20 How. 227, thus: "The broker must complete the sale; that is, he must find a purchaser in a situation, and ready and willing, to complete the purchase on the terms agreed on, before he is entitled to his commission." Per contra, if the broker has "completed the sale" so as to be entitled to his commissions, by finding a purchaser, without a contract, his duty is thereby performed, and his authority exhausted. The judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the action dismissed; costs to appellants.

CRIMINAL LAW—MISNOMER—SENTENCE—VENUE.

1. Under an indictment against John Doe, an Indian, whose true name is unknown, where the record does not show any order containing the proceedings against the accused by any other name, nor that the true name was disclosed, no sentence can be pronounced on a verdict of guilty against "the defendant Que Cha Ca."

2. The venue of an offense is not laid by an averment that it was committed "near the town of Arizona City, in said county of Yuma, and territory of Arizona," Arizona City being situate near the boundary of the territory.

Appeal from district court, Yuma county.

TWEED, J. The defendant was convicted in the district court for the county of Yuma, at a term of that court held in November, 1871, of the crime of murder. The appeal is from the judgment. No exceptions seem to have been taken to any of the proceedings, and no motion made for a new trial. The transcript certified by the clerk contains a copy of the indictment, what purports to be the substance of the evidence on the trial, the verdict of the jury, and the judgment and sentence of the court, with some brief and very unsatisfactory memoranda of the minutes of the proceedings.

The indictment describes the accused as "John Doe, a Yuma Mohave Indian, whose true name is to the jury unknown," etc. There is nothing in the record showing that upon the arraignment, or at any subsequent period, the true name of the accused was discovered, nor any order of the court that the proceedings should be continued against him by any other name. The verdict of the jury, however, is against one Que Cha Ca. The verdict, as it is set out in the transcript, reads as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant, Que Cha Ca, guilty of murder as charged in the indictment." All the proceedings subsequent to the verdict, including the judgment and sentence of the court, refer to and designate the accused by the name given in the verdict. Perhaps the full minutes of the trial would show that the name Que Cha Ca was properly substituted for that of John Doe; but, as the record comes to us, there is nothing to connect the party charged with the person against whom the verdict was rendered and judgment pronounced. No judgment affirming that of the district court could be entered by us upon such a record.

But we pass to the consideration of an objection to the sufficiency of the indictment. It charges "that John Doe, a Yuma Mohave Indian, whose true name is to the grand jury unknown, yeoman, late of the county of Yuma, and territory of Arizona, on the twenty first day of September, A. D. 1871, near the town of Arizona City, in said county of Yuma, and territory of Arizona, with force and arms," etc. If there is uncertainty in the portion of the indictment quoted as to the place where the homicide was committed, whether in the county of Yuma or elsewhere, such uncertainty is nowhere in any other part of the indictment cured. Is there such uncertainty? We are compelled to the conclusion that there is, and that the clause quoted from the indictment may be strictly and literally true, and yet the homicide may have been committed on the side of the Colorado river opposite Arizona City, and in the state of California. We may err in this, but it seems to us that the indictment does not charge the offense to have been committed at a place within the jurisdiction of the court with the accuracy and certainty required in criminal procedure, and by the fourth subdivision of section 222, of proceedings in criminal cases. Comp. Laws, p. 123. The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings upon a sufficient indictment.

FRENCH, C. J. The writ in this cause was ordered dismissed, there being no error in the record. But, if error had occurred, this writ would still have been unauthorized and improper. by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, a conviction for felony will be set aside on appeal unless the record shows that the charge was in writing, and read to the jury, or that the accused consented in open court that the charge should be verbally given. REAVIS, J., dissenting.

Appeal from district court, Yuma county. G. H. Aury, for appellant. J. E. McCaffry, Atty. Gen., for the Territory.

TITUS, C. J. This is an appeal by William Gertrude from a judgment of death pronounced upon him by the district court of the second judicial district of Arizona, on a trial for murder. There was no assignment of error, and the case was submitted on briefs, without oral argument. On inspection of the transcript, however, it does not appear that the charge of the judge before whom the case was tried was in writing and read to the jury; nor does it appear that the defendant consented in open court, or otherwise, that the charge should be given verbally. The law of Arizona (section 368, p. 137, Comp. Laws, "Proceedings in Criminal Cases") is as follows: "The charges of the court to the jury shall be in writing, signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the defendant consent in open court for the charges to be given verbally." This court has decided at its present term, in the cases of Territory v. Kennedy, post, —, and Territory v. Duffield, post, 476, felonies not capital, that the record must show on appeal in such cases as these that the charge was in writing, and read to the jury, or that the defendant consented in open court that the charge should be verbally given. It is the opinion of this court in the present case that, if the record must show these things in cases such as those, a fortiori it ought to show the same things in cases such as this, whose penal consequences are so much more severe, and that, the record failing to show them in this case, the judgment ought to be reversed. The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

REAVIS, J., (dissenting.) The appellant, William Gertrude, was tried and convicted of the crime of murder at the November term, 1871, of the district court of Yuma county. The proceedings at and during the trial, so far as the record shows, were in all respects regular, and the error complained of on the part of the appellant appears, from the statement on appeal, to have occurred after the sentence and judgment were pronounced and entered of record. Therefore, so far as the record of the trial is concerned, no question is presented for our consideration, and our attention will be directed to the action of the court below subsequent thereto.

We are asked to reverse this judgment for the following reasons, to-wit: (1) Because one of the jurors who sat on the trial of this case was not at that time a citizen of the United States; (2) because the court below refused to grant a new trial on motion for that purpose made and filed after the sentence of the law and the judgment of the court thereon had been pronounced upon the defendant, and entered of record. The facts, as we have been able to gather them from the record, are as follows. Several days after the judgment, and while the court was still in session, Jacob Fisher, one of the jurors who tried the case, presented himself in the United States district court, then also in session in that district, and made application and was admitted to citizenship, under the provisions of an act of congress providing for the naturalization of aliens who had served in, and had received an honorable discharge from, the army of the United States during the late civil war, by a petition in a competent court showing that fact, without further proceedings. The court very soon afterwards adjourned until the fourth Monday of the following December. The facts, as above stated, having come to the knowledge of counsel for appellant, and the presiding judge being temporarily absent from the county, application was in the interim made to a commissioner of the court for leave to file a motion, nunc pro tunc, for a new trial, which was granted. It is not our purpose to inquire into the power of a court commissioner to grant such leave, as the determination of that question, in my opinion, can in no way affect the result in the disposition that I think should be made of this cause.

The motion, together with the affidavits of counsel for the defendant, was filed at the assembling of the court in December, and a hearing was had thereon. The court below overruled the motion for a new trial, on the ground that it had come too late, and could not be entertained, to which ruling counsel for appellant excepted, and the case comes here on appeal. Was it error on the part of the court below in overruling the motion? Section 410 of the Criminal Code provides that a motion for a new trial must be made before the judgment is entered, and this I believe to be the settled authority on the subject. I might stop here, but, as the legal status of the juror Fisher has been urged upon our attention with earnestness by counsel for appellant, I am disposed to examine this question, although it is a matter of some doubt whether it is properly before this court for adjudication. In the affidavit of counsel for appellant filed in support of the motion for a new trial, we find, among other things, the following statements of facts: "That Jacob Fisher was regularly sworn in as a juror to try said case; that said Jacob Fisher, upon examination under oath, answered affirmatively that he was a citizen of the United States." This declaration of citizenship seems to have been made by the juror when examined on his oath touching his qualifications to serve as a juror in that case. No challenge for cause could be interposed for that reason, and, so far as the court and counsel were advised, Fisher was a competent juror, and was sworn on the panel.

There is nothing on the record to show, nor are we advised by the affidavits of appellant's counsel, that the juror in question willfully deceived the court in order to sit on the trial as a juror, or that he was guilty of moral turpitude in connection therewith. But what evidence have we before us that Fisher was not a citizen of the United States at the time of the trial? All that we have been able to gather on that point is the following additional statement in the affidavit of appellant's counsel before mentioned, to-wit: "That subsequently, [to the trial,] to-wit, on the eleventh day of November, 1871, said Jacob Fisher appeared before the clerk of the United States district court for the purpose of naturalization; that trial of the above cause was had upon the seventh day of November, 1871; that the time for filing notice of motion for new trial had elapsed before the knowledge of the foregoing facts, to-wit, the non-naturalization of said Fisher, had come into the possession of the defendant, or his attorneys, or either of them." These are the facts as they appear in the record on the subject as to the citizenship of the juror Fisher. If the determination of that fact were material in this case, would this court be justified in holding that because the juror had appeared in the United States district court for the purpose of naturalization, he was for that reason incompetent to sit upon a jury that had tried a case a few days before? In other words, is that fact itself conclusive of the alienage of the applicant? I do not think so. It is not difficult to see how the ends of justice might be always thwarted if a rule so dangerous as this should obtain. There is nothing in the law to prevent any man who has served in the army of his country, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, from going into any court in the United States of competent jurisdiction, and, in the mode provided by the statute, be admitted to citizenship, no matter whether the place of his birth is beyond the blue water, in another hemisphere, or on the soil of America; and the fact of his having done this is not conclusive evidence that he was not a citizen before. But if we give the appellant the full benefit of the exception, and waive all irregularity in its presentation, both in the court below and in this court, is it ground for the reversal of the judgment? I think not. In the case of Rex v. Sutton, 15 E. C. L. 208, it was held that "alienage is ground for challenge, but is not ground for new trial." The same authority may be found in 1 Archb. Crim. Pr. 516. "A juror cannot object to serving on the ground that he is an alien." 1 Brightly's Fed. Dig. 507, tit. "Jury," § 9. "A new trial will not be granted because one of the jurors was an alien." Id. 678, tit. "Practice," § 537. That which is ground for challenge to a juror is not always ground for new trial; for instance, the fact that one of the jurors was an alien or non-resident. 3 Whart. Crim. Law, § 3220. That Fisher was a competent juror, under the circumstances, I have no doubt, both upon reason and authority. I am unable to find on a careful inspection of the record that any substantial right of the defendant has been prejudiced in the trial of this cause in the court below, and am therefore of the opinion that the judgment should have been affirmed.

ARRAIGNMENT—RIGHT TO COUNSEL—READING INDICTMENT.

1. Counsel having been assigned to the accused two days after his arraignment, and before he pleaded, the failure to inform him, when he was arraigned, of his right to have counsel, is a harmless error, under Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 126, § 247, providing that if the accused appear for arraignment without counsel, he shall be informed of his right to have them before he is arraigned.

2. The record not showing that the clerk read the indictment and stated the plea to the jury, as he is required to do by Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 134, § 331, and it not appearing that the prosecuting officer did not, as is the usual practice, read the indictment in his opening statement, it will be presumed that if the statute was not complied with the error was harmless.

Appeal from third district court.

John Howard and William J. Berry, for appellant. John A. Rush, for the Territory.

TITUS, C. J. In this case the defendant, Richard M. Hargrave, was convicted of the murder of Ygnacio Rubio, at Prescott, in the county of Yavapai, on the 11th of July last, (1872.) The defendant was sentenced to death by hanging on the 13th of the same month, and on the 16th, notice of this appeal was given by William J. Berry, the defendant's counsel. The want of authority of the judge of the third judicial district to preside and try the cause was the only exception which the record shows to have been made in the court below. This was rightly overruled at the time, and seems since to have been abandoned as worthless. No assignment of errors has been made, no brief has been filed, and no argument, oral or written, had in this court. The case comes here by a futile appeal to baffle justice, and prolong for a few months the life of the doomed defendant.

The case has been submitted on the record alone, with nothing beyond, to aid its examination. On careful inspection, however, the record of this case exhibits no such error as ought to vitiate the verdict in the court below, or disturb the verdict here. The record itself is quite as full as usual, and with an ordinary share of that presumption in favor of the proceedings below, without which no human administration of justice can stand, the present judgment may be maintained. The record of this case, however, exhibits in the proceedings of the court below, as stated, two omissions and one departure from the course of procedure enjoined by our criminal statutes. It does not appear from the record that the defendant was informed that it was his right to have counsel before he was arraigned, nor does it appear that the indictment was read to the jury trying the cause. It does appear, however, from the record that the defendant, on inquiry by the court, was assigned counsel two days after the arraignment, as stated, when he pleaded to the indictment. These harmless errors, however, ought not to disturb the judgment in the present case, for they do not appear to have prejudiced the defendant, and they are mentioned here only to show that they have not been overlooked in the examination of the record, and as a caution in other cases which may be less carefully tried than this one has obviously been. Our statutes provide, (Comp. Laws, p. 126, § 247:) "If the defendant appear for arraignment without counsel, he shall be informed by the court that it is his right to have counsel before he is arraigned, and shall be asked if he desire the aid of counsel." The same laws provide, (page 134, § 331:) "If the indictment be for felony, the clerk must read the indictment and state the plea to the jury." In this case the arraignment or partial arraignment of the defendant without counsel, as it appears, did not prejudice him, for the plea, which is really the only accompaniment or immediate consequence of the arraignment requiring the aid of counsel, was postponed for two days after such arraignment, when counsel was assigned the defendant, immediately before such plea was made and entered. The usual, and perhaps better, practice is for the prosecuting officer to read the indictment to the jury in his opening and statement of the case for the prosecution. Elsewhere this is so much a matter of course that it is always presumed to be done, and requires no statement in the record. As the reading of the indictment is, by our statute, required to be made in a manner exceptional and peculiar, it would seem that the statement of it ought to be thus made in the record. In the absence of such statement, the presumption is that the indictment was read to the jury in the ordinary way. Legal presumption is always in favor of judicial proceedings, until the contrary appears.

The foregoing conclusions in favor of the proceedings in the present case are corroborated by our statute concerning appeals; for the Compiled Laws, p. 148, provide, (section 468:) "After hearing the appeal, the court shall give judgment, without regard to technical error or defect which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties." The charge of the court in the present case was extremely cautious, and the utmost indulgence seems to have been allowed the defendant throughout the whole case. The judgment and order of this court, therefore, are that the original judgment in the present case shall be carried into execution by, and in pursuance of, an alias warrant, such as is required in all cases in which the judgment of death is rendered, and that this judgment be entered in the minutes of this court, and a certified copy of the same, with such entry, forthwith remitted to the clerk of the court from which this appeal was taken.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

The plaintiff and the defendant owned adjoining mining claims, and joined in a conveyance of them, the plaintiff receiving $10 a foot, which he had agreed to take on the representation of the defendant that the purchaser would buy if he could get the two claims, and was willing to pay $10 a foot for them. The purchaser in fact paid $20 a foot, the defendant receiving the difference on the plaintiff's claim. Held, that defendant was not the agent of plaintiff on the sale, and the latter could not recover the extra $10 a foot.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

John A. Rush and H. H. Cartter, for appellant. Hargrave & McDaniel, for respondent.

DUNNE, C. J. Action began by Thorne to recover $666.66 from Bowers. Thorne alleged that Bowers had received this sum in the sale of some mining ground in such a way that it was properly due and owing to Thorne, and had not been paid to him. Defendant denied. On the trial, plaintiff gave in evidence that he and one Hogle and one Cassidy owned a mining claim together, of 200 feet in length, on a certain quartz lode, each owning a one-third interest; that defendant, Bowers, and several other parties owned the adjoining claim of 200 feet on said lode; that on a certain occasion Bowers said to plaintiff that a certain person would buy these claims if he could get all the interests,—that is, the whole 200 feet in each claim, or 400 feet in all,—and that this person was willing to give $10 a foot for it, and asked plaintiff if he would take that sum; that plaintiff said he would, and ultimately joined all the other parties in a deed for the whole of said 400 feet, and received for his interest $10 a foot; that he did not notice the consideration in the deed at the time of signing it, but afterwards learned that it was $4,000, which would have been an average of $20 a foot, and that he subsequently learned that some of the other vendors got $20 a foot; that he charged Bowers with having negotiated the sale, and having received from the purchaser $20 a foot for his (plaintiff's) interest, and that he therefore had $666.66, which properly belonged to plaintiff; that Bowers neither admitted nor denied having received $20 a foot for plaintiff's ground, but said, in reply to the demand for the money: "How are you going to get it?" When plaintiff closed his evidence, the court below granted a nonsuit against him, on the ground he had made no case. Plaintiff appealed.

We think the nonsuit was properly granted. It is true the evidence, though not showing the fact, might be considered as tending to show that Bowers received $20 a foot for plaintiff's ground, but we do not think there is anything in the evidence which tends to show that, if he had received such money, it was any fraud on the plaintiff. There is nothing tending to show that Bowers acted as agent for plaintiff, or was under any obligation to pay the extra $10 a foot to plaintiff, even if he had received it from the purchaser. Judgment affirmed, with costs.

INDICTMENT—JOINDER OF OFFENSES—CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A count for resisting an officer, and one for assault on him, without reference to his official character, cannot be joined, under Crim. Code Ariz. § 217, providing that "the indictment shall charge but one offense, but may set forth that offense in different forms, under different counts."

2. Crim. Code Ariz. § 368, requiring in criminal cases that the charge "shall be in writing, signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the defendant consent in open court for the charges to be given verbally," is not complied with by charging orally and filing after verdict what purports to be a copy of the charge given.

Titus, C. J., dissenting.

C. W. C. Rowell, for appellant. G. H. Owry, for respondent.

REAVIS, J. This cause was brought into this court on appeal from the district court of Pima county. There are numerous errors complained of on behalf of appellant, but we do not feel called upon, nor do we deem it necessary, to examine more than the two following points, urged by counsel for appellant, a proper solution of which, in our judgment, will dispose of this whole matter: First, it is claimed that the indictment in this case in the court below contains two separate and distinct charges; and, second, that the court erred in delivering an oral charge to a jury, when the same should have been in writing, the defendant not having waived his right to have it so given.

There are two counts in the indictment, and the record shows that the jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged in both. The first charges the defendant with an offense against public justice, to-wit, in resisting the sheriff of Pima county in attempting to execute a lawful order of the judge of the district court for said county, issued while sitting in the capacity of a committing magistrate, and directed to such sheriff for execution. Section 94, Crim. Code. The second charges an offense against the person of an individual; that is to say, with an assault with a deadly weapon upon the person of said sheriff, with intent to put him in fear, and, by fear, to compel such sheriff to obey an unlawful command of said defendant. Section 50, Crim. Code. We have no doubt of erroneous joinder of those two offenses in the same indictment. Section 217 of our Criminal Code provides that "the indictment shall charge but one offense, but it may set forth that offense in different forms, under different counts." In the case before us, it cannot be claimed, as we think, with any kind of propriety, that the same offense has been set forth in different forms in the several counts therein contained. The offenses are wholly dissimilar and can have no possible connection. The first is a crime against the public justice of the country, without reference to the person of the officer; while the second is a crime against the person of an individual, without reference to his official character.

The other point to which our attention is directed is one of the gravest importance, and demands careful and serious consideration. The Compiled Laws (section 368, Crim. Code) requires the judge in all criminal cases to give his instruction to the jury in writing, unless its being so given shall be expressly waived by the defendant in each particular case in open court. How does the fact stand in this case? The record shows that the presiding judge below charged the jury orally, and that, on the day following the return of the verdict, he filed with the clerk a manuscript purporting to be the charge he had given the jury the day before. Was this a substantial compliance with the statute? We think not. In the case of People v. Ah Fong, 12 Cal. 346, the supreme court held that "the fact that the judge told the counsel he would put the instruction in writing, if desired, does not help the error." This was after the charge was given. The mischief intended to be prevented by the act might have been partly done. The court further remarked in that case: "In such trials the exact language used is often forgotten or differently understood by different persons; and in the press of business, with his attention diverted to various matters, it is next to impossible for a judge to remember days after the trial precisely what occurred during its progress." The same principle was decided in People v. O'Hara by that court during the same term. It is true that the language of the statute under which the decisions referred to were made, is not identical with that of the statute of this territory on the same subject; yet we are of the opinion that the spirit and intent of the two acts are for all the purposes of justice substantially the same in effect. When the charge of the court to the jury in a criminal case is required to be given in writing, the presiding judge must first reduce it to writing, and deliver its contents to the jury by reading in their hearing from the original manuscript. And it is no answer that the charge of the court was in writing at the time of its delivery to the jury when the judge gives orally from his recollection what purports to be the contents of the written charge. The jury in that case would be left wholly dependent upon the memory of the judge for the accuracy of his statements, however widely they might differ from those he had reduced to writing, and which, when filed, the law makes a part of the record. The true point of inquiry is, what did the judge charge? The defendant in a criminal case has an undoubted right to have every word uttered by the judge to the jury written at large in the record, and a failure to do so when required, touching the charge to the jury, as the law directs, is error. The substantial requirements of the law in the particulars mentioned not having been complied with on the trial of this cause in the court below, the judgment must be reversed; and, as we are of opinion that no valid conviction can be had upon the indictment herein, no new trial will be ordered. It is therefore directed that the ball of appellant herein be, and it is hereby, exonerated, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as shall be necessary and proper according to law.

TWEED, J., concurs.

TITUS, C. J., (dissenting.) I cannot concur in the opinion of the court read in this case, and, with due respect to those from whom I differ, the reasons of my dissent are thus submitted. The opinion of the court alleges two errors as reasons for reversing the judgment, neither of them, however, in the language of the Code, which we are here sworn to administer. The errors as therein stated are: First, it is claimed that the indictment in this case contains two separate and distinct charges; second, the court erred in delivering an oral charge to the jury when the same should have been in writing, the defendant not having waived his right to have it so given.

Our Code does not prohibit two charges from being included in the same indictment. It does declare ("Proceedings in Criminal Cases," § 217) that "the indictment shall charge but one offense, but it may set forth that offense in different forms, under different counts." Thus it will be perceived that it is two different offenses, and not two different charges, that are thus excluded from the same indictment. These terms are essential in our law, and, concerning the substitution of one for the other, it may with becoming deference be submitted as a conjecture whether the opinion of the court is not predicated on some other Code, real or imaginary, different from our own. Similar substitution of essential terms is also made in its statement of the second error, as it is declared to be: That statement is "that the court erred in delivering an oral charge," etc., "the defendant not having waived his right to have it given in writing." Our Code declares (Comp. Laws, "Proceedings in Criminal Cases," § 368:) "The charges of the court shall be in writing, signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the defendant consent in open court for the charges to be given verbally." As amended in 1867. The difference between the law as thus declared and the error assigned is radical and essential. The law does not say how the charge shall be delivered, nor that it may not be delivered orally. How can the charge be delivered otherwise than orally, except by silently handing it to the jury in writing? Our law certainly does not require this. Even if the judge read it to the jury, it must be done viva voce. It can be made audible in no other way. The law does not say when the charge of the court shall be in writing. In the course of this opinion it will probably appear that there is a constructive difference between the statement of the law in the opinion of the court and the test of which it is made.

The answer to the defendant's first exception is that it is not true in fact, and ought not therefore to avail in law. The law of Arizona on this subject, which deserves recitation, is as follows, (Comp. Laws, c. 11, § 217:) "The indictment shall charge but one offense, but it may set forth that offense in different forms, under different counts." It is not and cannot be pretended that duality of counts in the same indictment, under our law as thus cited, is or can be error. Its very letter thus permits as many counts as there are different forms of the one offense charged in the same indictment. Neither is multiplicity of charges error by the law of Arizona. A charge is an essential and indispensable part of every count in any possible criminal practice, and there must be as many charges as counts in the same indictment. It is duality of offenses that our law declares to be error, when charged in the same indictment. Careful inspection, aided by fair analysis, of the indictment in the present case, will show that it charges but one offense. The one act charged in both is single, simultaneous, indivisible. No judicial scrutiny, however critical, keen, and technical, can find a single element of more than one act in the two counts of the indictment under consideration. The day, the hour, the very instant, the place, the persons concerned, the occasion, the magisterial order which led to the offenses, the weapon drawn, the withdrawal of the defendant, his refusal to deliver his arms, his defiance, each word and incident of all these, however minute, are the same in both counts. So absolutely true is this that each of these incidents in the second count is referred to its own identity in the first count by the word "aforesaid," so potent in criminal pleading for the purpose. The order alone may be taken as the crucial test of this unity and identity. What was it, as described in such count? "To disarm the said Milton B. Duffield." It is so described in both counts. More absolute sameness of description is impossible to the human intellect than is found presented by this one particular of both counts of the indictment. There is no badge, no shade, no scintilla of difference. No effort of the human mind can find aught in any act or incident of either count of this indictment different in the slightest degree from the same act or incident of the other count of the same indictment. The judges of this court all know equally well that not on either side was it pretended in the argument of this case that more than one act was charged in the two counts of the indictment. Trace the act to its personal consequences, and we find the same unity, the same identity. Who suffered these consequences? Of the many persons present on the occasion, the indictment describes Peter R. Brady, sheriff, as the person who was obstructed, resisted, and opposed; in the second count the same Peter R. Brady, sheriff aforesaid, as the person who was put in fear and compelled to obey an unlawful order. The act, the objects, the sufferings, are the same in both counts. Peter R. Brady is the one man in both counts who suffered the same obstruction, resistance, opposition, the same fear, and the same man who was coerced to the same obedience. For the first time in the annals of criminal practice, it is submitted, has this, or anything such as this, been construed into such a difference as constitutes a misjoinder in criminal pleading. It makes crime depend not on the malignity, force, and imprudence of the perpetrator, and the sufferings of the victim, but on the minute shades of difference in the remote consequences of his act.

Something more, it is submitted, than the rendition of a certain statute, or the construction of a doubtful one, will be required to find two offenses in the one act under consideration, single, simultaneous, entire, and indivisible as it is. It is true that this offense, as described in the first count, is punished by a different penalty from the same offense described in the second count of the same indictment. This, however, is no proof of diversity or duplicity. The two parts of the one act which describes this one offense in its two different forms were framed by the same codifier, enacted at the same time, by the same legislature, published in the same Code, and in one and the same chapter. Howell's Code, c. 10, §§ 50, 94. True it is that this one offense is described in its two forms in different divisions of the same chapter noted just above, entitled "Of Crimes and Punishments," in one form in the "Fifth Division," entitled "Offenses against the Persons of Individuals," and in the other form in the "Ninth Division," entitled "Crimes and Offenses against Public Justice." This difference in the division never was intended legitimately to indicate any difference in the degree or character of the crime thus divided. It was copied by Blackstone from Hale's Analysis of the Laws of England, and introduced into our Code for the common purpose of convenience of reference. By no judicial torture, however, it is submitted, can this fact be made a sufficient reason for assuming that to include these two forms of the same offense in one indictment by different counts is misjoinder in criminal pleading. The crime of larceny, as modified by the Arizona statute of 1871, is punished differently from knowingly receiving stolen goods. Comp. Laws, c. 10, §§ 60, 63. They were, too, declared at different times by several legislatures. It will hardly be pretended that these may not be embodied in the same indictment by different counts. In nearly every state of the Union the crime of burglary, and the crime of grand larceny, when perpetrated by the same person or persons, in the same house, and at the same time, are really but one offense, and may be included by different counts in the same indictment, though consecutive acts. In California they are excluded, not by judicial construction, but by statute. The incendiary, who fires a dwelling-house and burns it with its sleeping inmates, may also be indicted by different counts of the same indictment for murder and arson, and this, though the firing and killing are consecutive in time. The man who commits murder on the highway, and robs his victim, may, in nearly every state of the Union, be indicted in the same indictment by different counts for murder and highway robbery, though these two are consecutive acts, and not like the one under consideration, entire, simultaneous, and indivisible. The meaning of our law above cited, concerning the joinder of charges in different counts of the same indictment, is not left to mere conjecture or judicial decision, under our own or some other Code here or elsewhere.

It was enacted by congress (Act Feb. 26, 1853, § 1, 10 St. at Large, 163) "that whenever there are or shall be several charges against any person for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions committed together, and for two or more acts or transactions of the same class of criminal offenses, which may be properly joined, instead of having several indictments, the whole may be joined in one indictment in separate counts; and, if two or more indictments shall be found in such cases, the court may order them consolidated." By the same act it is declared that "any person admitted to manage suits in any court of the United States, or any of the territories thereof, who shall multiply indictments to increase expenses, may be mulcted in the costs."

In Insurance Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. 511, it was declared, by MARSHALL, C. J., as the opinion of the supreme court, that, "in legislating for the territories, congress exercised the combined powers of both the federal and state governments." In Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393, it was declared, by MCLEAN, J., that "the United States, in legislating for the territories, exercised the whole power on the given subject." This was what was meant by MARSHALL, C. J., in Insurance Co. v. Canter, and not that the power of congress over the territories is absolute. The same conclusion is supported by Hunt v. Palao, 4 How. 589, and Benner v. Porter, 9 How. 235. By our organic law, (Sept. 9, 1850, § 17, 9 St. at Large, 452, and Feb. 24, 1863, § 2, 12 St. at Large, 665,) the constitution and laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect in the territory of Arizona as elsewhere in the United States. If applicable at all, they apply, as they are passed, to the territories without any limitation as to time. What more necessarily applicable to the territories than a law to prevent multiplicity of criminal prosecutions, and the anxiety and expense which attend them! This act of congress, and the authorities cited, show us that it must be regarded as a rule of construction in our criminal practice. There appears no trace of any attempt to limit this act, or to repeal it by any adequate power or authority. It applies here in the same manner, and for the same reasons, as the several recent amendments of the constitution of the United States, the act of congress of July 2, 1864, and 18 St. at Large, 374, concerning evidence, and similar acts of congress apply. To the territories, over which congress has the sole power of legislation, it applies absolutely, and without any of the limitations which exist in favor of the states, over which the legislative power of congress is restricted. The recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in Dunphy v. Kleinsmith, 11 Wall. 610, places this beyond a doubt. By the statute cited, several charges against any person for the same act or transaction, or for two or more acts or transactions, connected together by time, place, occasion, and other circumstances, as are the charges contained in the indictment under consideration, may and must be joined by different counts in the same indictment. The first exception to the indictment of the present case fails, therefore, by the highest exercise of legislative authority. It fails also by the decisions, which both sides admit to be most instructive, if not authoritative, in the present case.

Where different offenses are joined in the same indictment by different counts, the misjoinder, if there is one, must be presented to the court before trial by demurrer. People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622. If this is omitted, the verdict on either count will not be disturbed. In the futile demurrer filed, argued, and overruled in the present case, misjoinder of two different offenses in the indictment was not one of the errors specified. In People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622, already cited, it was declared by the court, SANDERSON, J., "that the objection that two different offenses are included in the same indictment must be made by demurrer before trial. Taken in the present case, on motion in arrest of judgment, it was too late, as held in People v. Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394." In the latter case it was ruled that this error, if one, must be presented on demurrer. It cannot properly be considered on motion in arrest of judgment. Such is unquestionably the law of California. Neither on this nor on the other points made by the counsel for the appeal do the cases cited by him from that state sustain him. To the same effect is Whart. Crim. Law, §§ 414, 422, referred to in the last case, cited above. Finally, we may cite, as decisive of the present case, from the Code proceedings in criminal cases as follows: "Sec. 569. Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this chapter, in respect to any pleadings or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, shall render the same invalid, unless it actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right."

The second error, as it is alleged to be in the opinion of the court, was "the delivery of an oral charge to the jury when the same should have been in writing, the defendant not having waived his right to have it so given." The departure from the law in the terms of this statement has already been referred to. The record does not show that the charge was not in writing, nor does it show a request on the part of the defendant to have the charge delivered in writing, or read from a written manuscript. The truth is, the charge was in writing when delivered, and with the evidence was occasionally referred to in its delivery, though neither was read throughout. No exception was made at the time, either to the charge or to the manner of its delivery. The reasons for a new trial were filed by defendant's counsel three days after the delivery of the charge of the judge. The second of these is as follows: "The court erred in not charging the jury, as requested by the defendant, in writing." This, however, is an exception to the charge of the judge in not affirming the written charges of the defendant, as so presented by him, and not a declaration that the charge was not itself in writing, nor the assertion that a request was made that the charge should be delivered in writing, or otherwise than it was. That the charge was in writing when delivered is nowhere denied. No request was made to read it, nor does the record or any contemporaneous act show it. The error assigned was suggested by some cases decided in California under legal provisions radically different from those of Arizona. Our law on this subject has been cited, and may be recited here. It is as follows: "The charges of the court to the jury shall be in writing, signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the defendant consent in open court for the charges to be delivered verbally." The law of California on the same subject is as follows, (Criminal Practice Act, § 362, cl. 6): "The charges shall be reduced to writing before it is given; and in no case shall any charge or instructions be given to the jury otherwise than in writing, unless by the mutual consent of the parties." These two legal provisions are radically different, and they must necessarily give rise to judgments and decisions entirely different; and yet the decisions made in California, under a law thus shown to be wholly different from our own, are all that are invoked in fixing the law of Arizona. Its letter, its contexts, its reason, are all abandoned for judgments made there, under a Code whose mandates are so different from that which prevails here. Are we here to administer law of California or the law of Arizona?

If the law of Arizona is to be administered as a whole, no exception can be made to the charge of the judge, whether oral or written, after it is delivered, and the jury has retired. If the law of Arizona is not to be administered as a whole, what part of it is to be disregarded or expunged by those who have been sworn to its observance as we have been? Section 402 of our Law of Proceedings in Criminal Cases reads as follows: "On the trial of an indictment, exceptions may be taken by the defendant to a decision of the court upon matter of law in any of the following cases: (1) In allowing a challenge to the panel of the jury, or to an individual juror, for an implied bias. (2) On admitting witnesses or testimony. (3) In admitting or rejecting witnesses or testimony, or in declaring any question of law not a matter of discretion, or in charging or instructing the jury upon the law on the trial of the issue." All these exceptions may be made by the defendant alone. "Exceptions, however, may be taken by the prosecuting officer on behalf of the territory to a decision of the court, upon matter of law, in any of the cases specified in the third division of the preceding section." There is but one other class of exceptions known to our criminal practice arising before the jury retires; and that is the class of exceptions which occur on written charges, presented by either party, to be allowed or disallowed by the judge, and to be by him indorsed. These are made part of the record by section 407 of the title last above cited, and as such they go up on appeal, without being embodied in any bill of exceptions. Returning to section 402 of the same title, what part of it can be disregarded or expunged by this or any other court of Arizona? This court, however, it is submitted, proposes, in its written opinion in the present case, to disregard the first clause of it, which reads, "On the trial of an indictment," and which fixes the time and occasion when exceptions are to be made. Unaided and unexplained by any other rule, this clause would seem to have been embodied in our Code for some purpose, and that the one which it literally expresses. There are two well-known rules, one of construction, and the other of positive practice, which aid us to determine this. One is, that of every law all its parts are to be so construed as to co-operate in its general design. The other is as old, perhaps, as trial by jury, and it is this: Exceptions to the charge of the judge shall be made before the jury leave the box, or not at all, that the error which the exception suggest, if any, may be corrected at the time. Neither party nor counsel is allowed to conceal his exception, and then take advantage of it, if the result of the trial should be against him. Sections 404-406 of the same title support this conclusion, and show for what purpose the charge of the judge is required to be in writing. These sections declare that the bill of exceptions, containing so much of the evidence as is necessary to explain the law, and no more, shall be signed by the judge within 10 days after the trial, and shall be filed with the clerk as soon as signed. This shows that the only reason for requiring the charge to be in writing is to aid counsel and court to settle the bill of exceptions. If the first clause of section 402, which reads, "On the trial of an indictment," and which refers to all of the sections which follow it, especially the taking of exceptions, means anything, it is that by law no exception to the charge of the judge, after the jury has retired, can be allowed. The conclusion, therefore, is that the exception to the manner of delivering the charge was made too late, and cannot avail to disturb the judgment in the present case. In support of the same conclusion are the cases cited. People v. Chung Lit, 17 Cal. 320; People v. Garcia, 25 Cal. 531; People v. Shuler, 28 Cal. 490. The charge was in writing when delivered, and could have been produced to verify the correctness of its delivery, as well as for the purposes of exception, and settlement of exceptions, then or thereafter. I think the judgment ought not to be reversed.

(No. 14,026.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL.

Where the motion for a new trial sets out, among other grounds, irregularities in the proceedings, and the insufficiency of the evidence, the order of the trial court granting it will not be disturbed on appeal, though no errors of law were committed at the trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

John D. Ricknell, for appellant. Pepper & Lindenfeld and E. C. Bower, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by the widow and children of John Scramm, deceased, to recover damages for his death, which is alleged to have occurred on the railroad track of defendant, and to have been caused by the negligence of defendant and its employees. The jury returned a verdict for defendant, and the court below granted a new trial. From the order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial defendant appeals. Orders of trial courts granting new trials are not often disturbed, and yet when it appears that such an order was granted through misapprehension of the law, it should be reversed as readily as an order refusing a new trial. But, in the case at bar, it is impossible to know the reasons upon which the order was based. The grounds of the motion were numerous, including alleged errors in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence, and upon instructions to the jury; insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that it is against law; and misconduct and irregularity in the proceedings of the court and jury. The order of the court merely grants the motion in general terms. If it could be said that the motion rested entirely on supposed errors in giving or refusing instructions to the jury, it might be well urged that the order should be reversed; for there were certainly no errors committed in that regard against the plaintiffs. They were as favorable (if not more so) to plaintiffs as they could have been reasonably expected under the law as established in this state upon the subjects embraced in the instructions; and, if there was any error committed on this point, there was none of which plaintiffs should complain, and we see no other errors of law sufficient to warrant a new trial. But, if the court granted the motion on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict, (as it may have done,) we are not prepared to say that in so doing it grossly abused its discretion. Moreover, the point as to the irregularity of the proceedings may have had weight with the court. A number of written instructions which had been asked and refused, and had been indorsed by the judge "Not given," went to the jury with those that were given. This, of course, was irregular, and wrong; but such an irregularity would not always warrant a court in setting aside a verdict, for it might appear that it probably did no harm. In the case at bar, however, the court might have thought that harm was done. For instance, there was a contested issue of fact, whether or not there was a "crossing" at the place where the accident occurred; and on an instruction referring to that matter, the judge had indorsed "Not given, not shown to be a crossing." And the judge may have thought that this, and also the refusal of other instructions, might have been taken by the jury as the expression of his opinion on questions of fact. He is presumed to have been better acquainted with the whole case than this court, and to have known better what might have influenced the jury. While, therefore, upon the case as we see it, we may not be very strongly impressed with the conviction that it was the duty of the court below to set aside the verdict, still, we do not feel it to be our duty to set aside the order of the court. That course is rarely taken here, except when the questions raised involve issues of law alone. Order appealed from affirmed.

We concur: THORNTON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PEOPLE v. POWELL. (No. 20,698.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — JURY OF THE VICINAGE — MURDER—EVIDENCE.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 1033, as amended by Act March 9, 1887, (Sess. Laws Cal. 1887, p. 61,) providing that the state may have a change of venue in a criminal action, "on the application of the district attorney, on the ground that from any cause no jury can be obtained for the trial of defendant in the county where the action is pending," is void, being in conflict with Bill of Rights Cal. § 7, providing that "the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate," the right secured being the right to trial by a jury of the vicinage as it existed at common law.

2. On trial for murder, where there is evidence that defendant believed deceased to be armed at the time he shot him, the prosecution may prove that as a matter of fact deceased was not armed, but it cannot show that he was not in the habit of carrying arms, and had refused to go armed that day.

3. Evidence of conversations not had in defendant's presence, nor in any way brought home to him, is inadmissible.

4. Defendant may show that before the shooting he was told that deceased was a dangerous man, as the evidence tends to substantiate the plea of self-defense, but he cannot show that he was told to "look out" for deceased.

5. Private counsel may, with the consent of the trial court, assist the district attorney in the prosecution, and may make the entire argument, if the district attorney so desires, and the court assents.

6. After the homicide has been established by the state, it does not then devolve on defendant to prove by a preponderance of evidence that the killing was justifiable or only manslaughter. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

George C. Ross and George A. Knight,

for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., E. N. Deuprey, S. M. Shortridge, and E. F. Fitzpatrick, for the People.

WORKS, J. The appellant was charged by information, in the county of San Mateo, with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed in that county. He was twice tried in said county, and the jury failed to agree upon a verdict at each trial. Without any effort made to procure a third jury, the district attorney moved the court under section 1033 of the Penal Code for a change of venue to another county. The material part of the application was as follows: "Said district attorney, on behalf of the people of the state of California, hereby makes application to said court for a change of venue from said county of San Mateo, to some convenient county, of the above case of the People of the State of California v. Llewellyn A. Powell, on the grounds and for the reasons that a fair and impartial jury cannot be obtained for the trial of said case in said county of San Mateo, the same being the county where said action is now pending; and hereby states the following facts and causes for making said application, viz.: That the above-named defendant is charged, by information, filed in said superior court of said county of San Mateo, with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed in the month of November, 1887, in killing, in said county, at said time, one Ralph S. Smith; that said defendant has had two trials in said superior court, on said charge; that the first trial was had in April, 1888, and the second trial in August, 1888; that at said first trial, there were summoned from all parts of said county, to appear before said court, to serve as jurors in said case, 72 citizens, and, of said number, 67 were examined before a jury could be obtained in said case; that at said second trial, there were summoned from all parts of said county, to appear before said court, to serve as jurors in said case, 184 citizens, and of said number 173 were examined before a jury could be obtained to try said case; that said county is small in size and population, and a large number of its citizens, whose names appear upon its assessment roll, are Italians and Portuguese, and are disqualified from serving as jurors, in consequence of not understanding the English language; that also a large number of those citizens, whose names appear upon the assessment roll of said county, live in the city and county of San Francisco, and are therefore not liable to jury duty in said county of San Mateo; that said case was so horrible in its nature that it attracted the attention of the people of, and has been fully discussed in all parts of, said county of San Mateo; that said case has also been discussed, more or less, by the citizens summoned to appear to serve as jurors, as aforesaid; that there are two local weekly newspapers in said county, having a general circulation therein, and the newspapers of the city and county of San Francisco also have a wide-spread circulation throughout said county of San Mateo, and, by and through the columns of the newspapers aforesaid, the facts of said case, and the trials thereof, have been fully discussed before the citizens of said county of San Mateo. For the reasons herein set forth said district attorney says that a fair and impartial jury cannot be obtained to try said case in said county of San Mateo, and said district attorney therefore prays that said court make an order transferring said action of the People of the State of California vs. Llewellyn A. Powell, now pending in said court, as aforesaid, to some convenient county free from like objections." This application was supported by the following affidavit of the district attorney: "George H. Buck, being duly sworn, says that he is the district attorney of said county of San Mateo, and is the same person who made and signed the foregoing application; that as such district attorney he makes said application; that he has read said application, and knows the contents thereof, and that the same is true of his own knowledge, except as to the matters which are therein stated on his information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true."

In addition to this affidavit there were others by citizens of said county, in which each of the affiants, after alleging his residence in the county, and acquaintance with the people thereof, alleged that he knew the contents of the affidavit of the district attorney, and that "said affidavit is well founded and true." The assessor of the county also made affidavit that he had examined the last assessment of the county, and that there were about 600 persons among those whose names appeared on the assessment roll who had the necessary qualifications and were competent to serve as jurors of said county. The sheriff of the county also made the following affidavit in support of the application: "W. H. Kinne, being duly sworn, says that he is now, and has been for more than two years past, the sheriff of said county, and that at the two trials of the above case in said county he summoned most of the jury in both of said trials of said case; that in doing so he was obliged to and did go to and visit all parts of said county; that he was a candidate for re-election at the last election, in the fall of 1888, for the office of sheriff of said county, and during the campaign he visited all portions of said county many times; that he also saw many people of and from all parts of said county, at the county-seat, to-wit, at Redwood City, during the past year; that he has had an opportunity to and has discussed the merits of the case of the People of the State of California vs. Llewellyn A. Powell, now pending in said superior court, and that he understands the feeling of the people in regard to said case, and has often heard them express their opinion about said case; that from such expression of the people so interviewed, he says that a fair and impartial jury cannot be obtained to try said case in said county."

The defendant objected to the granting of the change of venue, and in opposition to the application therefor filed the affidavit of one of his attorneys, and 17 other citizens of the county, to the effect that they were residents of the county, and knew many of the other residents thereof, and that in their opinion a fair and impartial jury could be obtained in said county to try the defendant. The application was granted, and the venue changed to the city and county of San Francisco. When the case reached that county, the defendant objected to being tried therein, on the grounds, in substance, that the offense was charged to have been committed in the county of San Mateo; that the superior court of that county alone had jurisdiction to try the defendant; and that the court of the city and county of San Francisco had no jurisdiction in the matter; and moved that the case be remanded to the county of San Mateo for trial. The objection and motion were overruled, the defendant put upon his trial, convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to the state-prison for the term of 10 years. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and now appeals to this court. The change of venue was granted under section 1033 of the Penal Code, as amended, which provides: "A criminal action may be removed from the court in which it is pending. * * * Second. On the application of the district attorney, on the ground that from any cause no jury can be obtained for the trial of the defendant, in the county where the action is pending."

The appellant contends, first, that this section of the Code, so far as it authorizes a change of venue on the application of the district attorney without the consent of the defendant, is in conflict with section 7 of the bill of rights contained in the constitution of this state, which provides: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate." The precise point urged upon us is that the effect of this clause in the bill of rights is to preserve and continue in force the right of trial by jury as it existed at common law, and that the common-law right was to a trial by a jury selected from the vicinage or county. This calls upon us to determine—First, what the common-law right of trial by jury was; and, second, whether or not the right is the same under our constitution. We think the common-law right of trial by jury is clearly and definitely stated by Mr. Blackstone in his Commentaries (book 4, p. 350) as follows: "When, therefore, a prisoner on his arraignment has pleaded not guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon the country, which country the jury are, the sheriff of the county must return a panel of jurors, liberos et legales homines, de vicineto; that is, freeholders, without just exception, and of the visne or neighborhood; which is interpreted to be of the county where the fact is committed." And Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitation, (5th Ed., p. 392,) says: "The jury must also be summoned from the vicinage where the crime is supposed to have been committed." Again, in Story on the Constitution: "By the common law, the trial of all crimes is required to be in the county where they are committed. Nay, it originally carried its jealousy still further, and required that the jury itself should come from the vicinage of the place where the crime was alleged to have been committed." Story, Const. §§ 1769, 1779, 1781, 1791. See, also, Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 448, 5 N. W. Rep. 635. There can be no doubt that such was the common-law right of trial by jury. We are led to inquire, therefore, whether the same right is given or preserved by our constitution, and, if so, whether the section of the Penal Code under consideration is in conflict with this constitutional right. Our constitution does not define the right of trial by jury. It was a right then existing, the extent, scope, and limitations of which were well understood, and the constitution simply provides that such right shall be secured and remain inviolate. If the right at common law was as above stated, there can be no question but that an act of legislature, authorizing the trial of a defendant out of the county where the offense is charged to have been committed, is an abridgment of the right, and for that reason void. Such statutes have been almost uniformly condemned as unconstitutional in other states. Kirk v. State, 1 Cal. 344; Wheeler v. State, 24 Wis. 52; Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629; State v. Howard, 81 Vt. 414; Ex parte Rivers, 40 Ala. 712; State v. Knapp, 40 Kan. 148, 19 Pac. Rep. 728.

It is contended by the respondent that, in the states in which these cases were decided, the constitution provided in express terms that one charged with crime should be entitled to a trial by a jury selected from the county or district where the offense is charged to have been committed, and therefore the statutes referred to were in direct conflict with the express requirements of the constitution, while in this state the constitution contains no such requirement. As to most of the states, the fact contended for is true, but not as to all of them. But can this make any difference? Does not our constitution confer upon a defendant charged with crime precisely the same right, although not expressed in terms? We have seen that this was the well-understood common-law right. This court has said that it is this same right that is held inviolate by our constitution. In Koppikus v. Commissioners, 16 Cal. 254, in discussing the effect of this constitutional provision, this court said: "The provision of the constitution that 'the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate forever,' applies only to civil and criminal cases in which an issue of fact is joined. The language was used with reference to the right as it exists at common law. It is true that the civil law was in force in this state at the time of the adoption of the constitution, but its framers were, with few exceptions, from states where common law prevails, and where the language used has a well-defined meaning. The people who, by their votes, adopted the constitution, at least a vast majority of them, were also from countries where the common law is in force, and they looked upon the right secured as the right there known and there held inviolate. It is in this common-law sense that the language has always been regarded by the courts of this state. It is a right 'secured to all,' and 'inviolable forever,' in cases in which it is exercised in the administration of justice according to the course of the common law, as that law is understood in the several states of the Union." See, also, Cassidy v. Sullivan, 64 Cal. 286. It is true, the question before the court, in the cases cited, was as to the class of cases triable by jury; but the language used would have been just as appropriate and applicable if the question now before us had been under consideration. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, in discussing the effect of such a constitutional provision as ours, says: "Accusations of criminal conduct are tried at the common law, by jury; and wherever the right to this trial is guaranteed by the constitution, without qualification and restriction, it must be understood as retained in all those cases which were triable by jury at common law, and with all the common-law incidents to a jury trial, so far, at least, as they can be regarded as tending to the protection of the accused."

Many of the incidents of a common-law trial by jury are essential elements of the right. The jury must be indifferent between the prisoner and the commonwealth; and to secure impartiality challenges are allowed, not only for cause, but also peremptory, without assigning cause. The jury must also be summoned from the vicinage where the crime is supposed to have been committed; and the accused will thus have the benefit, on his trial, of his own good character and standing with his neighbors, if these he has preserved; and also of such knowledge as the jury may possess of the witness who may give evidence against him. He will also be able, with more certainty, to secure the attendance of his own witnesses." Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 390-393. This same doctrine, and the reasons for upholding it, are more fully stated by the same learned author and judge in the case of Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 448, 5 N. W. Rep. 635, in which it is said: "The constitution of the state provides that 'the right of trial by jury shall remain, but shall be deemed to be waived in all civil cases, unless demanded by one of the parties in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.' Article 6, § 27. The right is to remain. What right? Plainly the right as it existed before,—the right to a trial by jury as it had become known to the previous jurisprudence of the state. Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1. The right is not described here; it is not said what shall be its incidents; it is mentioned as something well known and understood, under a particular name; and by implication, at least, even a waiver of its advantages is forbidden. If the accused himself cannot waive them, plainly the legislature cannot take them away. The next section of the constitution repeats the guaranty of this method of trial 'in every criminal prosecution,' and nothing is better settled on the authorities than that the legislature cannot take away a single one of its substantial and beneficial incidents; (Opinions of Justices, 41 N. H. 550;

Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116;) and even the accused cannot waive any one of the essentials. Work v. State, 2 Ohio St. 296; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128; Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 351; Allen v. State, 54 Ind. 461. Now that in jury trial it is implied that the trial shall be by a jury of the vicinage is familiar law. Blackstone says that the jurors must be 'of the visne or neighborhood, which is interpreted to be of the county where the act is committed.' 4 Comm. 350. This is an old rule of the common law, (2 Hawk. P. C. c. 40; 2 Hale, P. C. 264;) and the rule was so strict and imperative that if an offense was committed partly in one county and partly in another, the offender was not punishable at all, (2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 177.) This overnicety was long since dispensed with, but the old rule has in the main been preserved in its integrity to this day. It is true that parliament, as the supreme power of the realm, made some exceptions, which are enumerated by Mr. Chitty in his treatise on Criminal Law, (volume 1, p. 179,) the chief of these being cases of supposed treason or misprision of treason examined before the privy council, and which under the statute of Hen. VIII. might be tried in any county, and offenses of the like character committed out of the realm, and which by a statute of the same arbitrary reign were authorized to be tried in any county in England. But it is well known that the existence of such statutes with the threat to enforce them was one of the grievances which led to the separation of the American colonies from the British empire. If they were forbidden by the unwritten constitution of England, they are certainly unauthorized by the written constitutions of the American states, in which the utmost pains have been taken to preserve all the securities of individual liberty. It has been doubted in some states whether it was competent even to permit a change of venue on the application of the state, to escape local passion, prejudice, and interest, (Kirk v. State, 1 Cold. 34; Osborn v. State, 24 Ark. 629; Wheeler v. State, 24 Wis. 52;) but this may be pressing the principle too far, (State v. Robinson, 14 Minn. 447, [Gil. 333;] Gut v. State, 9 Wall. 35;) but no one doubts that the right to a trial by a jury of the vicinage is as complete and certain as it ever was, and that in America it is indefeasible, (1 Bish. Crim. Law, 2d Ed., § 552; Whart. Crim. Law, § 277; Paul v. Detroit, 32 Mich. 108; Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116.)" This case was decided under a constitutional provision the same, in effect, as our own, and is directly in point.

It may be added that the effect of holding this statute to be unconstitutional will be to render it necessary, in a case where no jury can be obtained in the county, that a defendant be discharged or held in confinement for an indefinite time until such changes take place in the county that a jury can be had; but we cannot take away from the defendant a right conferred upon him by the constitution, on the mere ground that such a result may follow in rare cases. The right is one which has always been regarded as of great importance, and has been preserved and continued in force by the constitution of the United States, and perhaps by the constitutions of every state in the Union. If it be allowed that the legislature can break in upon this right and take it away or abridge it on the ground and for the reason stated in the statute under consideration, it must be admitted that it may do so for other reasons, and thus the right guaranteed by the constitution will be subject to modification at the will of the legislature, and this cannot be conceded. We are convinced that the section of the Penal Code, so far as it authorizes a change of venue on the application of the district attorney, without the consent of the defendant, is unconstitutional and void; that the change of venue in this case was improperly granted; and that the court below had no jurisdiction to try the cause. But if it were conceded that the statute is valid, the result of this appeal must be the same. The application for the change of venue, and the affidavit in support of it, were entirely insufficient to bring this case within the statute, or to authorize a change of the place of trial. The application was not made on the ground that no jury could be obtained in the county, but because a fair and impartial jury could not be obtained. As to what will constitute a fair and impartial jury, there may be many different opinions. The statement that such a jury could not be obtained was the statement of a mere conclusion, and the facts did not show that no jury could be obtained. There are two modes provided by which a defendant, or the people, may avoid a trial by partial or unfair jurors, viz., challenges for cause, which exclude all persons from the jury who are legally incompetent to serve as such, and peremptory challenges, by which a party may relieve himself of jurors whom he believes will not be fair and impartial jurors. This last kind of challenge is limited, and it may happen when a party's right of peremptory challenge is exhausted there may remain on the jury persons who are not, in his estimation, or in fact, fair and impartial, but who are competent jurors. The application and the proof to support it do not show that a jury of such persons as these might not have been obtained. It is perfectly clear that the intention of the legislature was to make a distinction between the grounds upon which the people and the defendant should be entitled to a change of venue. The defendant has only to show that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county. Pen. Code, § 1033. The application before us would have been sufficient under this clause, but it is not sufficient under the clause relating to the right of the district attorney to a change of venue, which provides that the change may be had where no jury can be obtained, which is quite a different thing, as we have attempted to show. A juror is not necessarily incompetent because he is not impartial. He may favor one party or the other, and yet, if he has not formed or expressed an opinion as to the merits of the cause, he cannot be challenged for cause. For this reason, proof that a fair and impartial jury cannot be obtained is not equivalent to proof that no jury can be obtained. A statute of this kind, if valid, should be strictly construed, and, if it could be enforced at all, in our judgment, the change should not be granted until all legal means to procure a jury had been exhausted, and no jury could be obtained. It should not be allowed to rest upon the mere opinion of persons, however numerous, that a jury could not be procured. The conclusion we have reached on this point is decisive of this appeal, but there are other questions presented which may arise on another trial, and we feel it our duty to decide.

The prosecution was allowed, over the objection of the defendant, to prove in rebuttal that the deceased was not in the habit of carrying arms; that on various occasions he had so stated; and that, on the morning of the shooting, he had refused to go armed when it was suggested that he had better do so. We have looked in the transcript in vain for any evidence on the part of the defendant which could justify or call for any such evidence in rebuttal. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant believed the deceased to have been armed at the time he shot him. This rendered it competent for the prosecution to prove that as a matter of fact he was not armed at that time, but it did not justify the proof as to his general habit with respect to the carrying of weapons, or his declarations with reference to the matter, not made in the presence of the defendant, and not shown to have been communicated to him prior to the shooting. There was no evidence on the part of the defendant going to show that the character of the deceased for peace and quietness was bad; therefore, the evidence cannot be justified on the ground that it tended to show his good character in these respects. Evidence to sustain his character could not be heard unless it was attacked, (People v. Anderson, 39 Cal. 704,) and, if it could, it would not have been competent to prove it by evidence that he was not in the habit of carrying arms or that he had refused to do so. On cross examination of one or more of the witnesses for the prosecution, the defendant asked whether the deceased had not had quarrels with several persons named; and it was admitted that the deceased had so stated. There was no objection to this evidence by the prosecution. It was clearly incompetent, and, if it had been objected to, would no doubt have been excluded. It is claimed that this evidence on the part of the defense rendered the above mentioned proof competent. We do not think so. In the first place, the evidence on the part of the defense was incompetent, as we have said; but, if it were not, we do not see how the evidence offered in rebuttal that the deceased was not in the habit of going armed tended to rebut the proof that he had stated to some one that he had quarreled with certain persons. There was also evidence admitted in behalf of the prosecution of conversations between the witness Mrs. Willis and third parties, not in the presence of the defendant, and with which he was in no way connected. This evidence should have been excluded. It was admitted by the court below, upon the assurance of counsel for the prosecution that it would be brought home to the defendant, which was not done. The same may be said of the testimony of the witness Glennon, of a conversation between Mrs. Willis and himself. The prosecution having failed to connect the defendant with the subject-matter of the conversation, the defendant moved to strike out the evidence. The motion was denied. This was error. The evidence should have been stricken out. The same witness, Glennon, was also allowed to testify to a conversation with the defendant. The ill-feeling which resulted in the death of Mr. Smith, at the hands of the defendant, grew out of an article published in a newspaper, of which the deceased was proprietor. The conversation testified to by Glennon was with reference to this article, and tended to show that the defendant believed the witness was the author of the article, and abused him, and threatened to get even with him; that in the same connection he made abusive remarks about one Mrs. Willis; and that subsequently, during the same day, he returned and stated to Glennon that he had learned that he was not the author of the article, and apologized for the language he had used. This evidence was well calculated to prejudice the jury against the defendant, and was immaterial and incompetent. If it had been shown to have been communicated to the deceased, it might have tended in some small degree to excuse his conduct towards the defendant, at the time of the shooting, but it was not shown that it was communicated to him. It could hardly be claimed that the threat of the defendant to "get even" with Glennon was evidence tending to prove that he killed the deceased, or the motive of the killing. And if this was not so that part of the conversation relating to Mrs. Willis, and which the defendant moved specially to strike out, was clearly incompetent.

It is contended by the appellant that the court below excluded evidence offered by him to the effect that he was told before the shooting that the deceased was a dangerous character, and that he had better beware of him, and that this was error. The defendant claimed, and introduced evidence tending to show that, in firing the shot which caused the death of the deceased, he acted in self-defense. In connection with the evidence as to what occurred at the time of the shooting, it would no doubt have been competent for the defendant to show that before the shooting he was informed that the deceased was a dangerous man. State v. Lull, 48 Vt. 586. Where a defendant claims to act in self-defense, any evidence tending to show that he acted as a reasonably prudent man would have acted under the circumstances is competent. People v. Iams, 57 Cal. 119, 130; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 307. In this case the evidence tended to show that the defendant was attacked by the deceased, and, in the encounter that followed, wounded him. In judging whether the defendant acted with reasonable prudence and caution, and in the honest belief that he was in imminent danger of death, or great bodily injury, it was proper that the jury should know, if such were the fact, that he had been informed beforehand that the man who attacked him was a dangerous character, and so believed at the time, as such information and belief might reasonably influence the conduct of a prudent man under such circumstances. Such evidence does not rest upon the necessity of showing that the communication was brought home to the deceased, as counsel for respondent contend. The sole object of it is to show the state of mind of the defendant at the time of the shooting, and for this purpose it was proper and should have been admitted.

There may be some doubt whether the questions put to the witness were such in form as to raise the point, but the question has been presented on its merits here. The form of the questions is not objected to in the court below, nor is it here. In the effort to prove a certain state of facts, either the question put to the witness should disclose clearly what it is supposed to prove, or a proposition to prove certain facts should be submitted to the court below, and refused, in order to present the question in this court. Neither was done here, and we are led to believe, by certain questions put to the defendant, on the same subject, that the communication made to the defendant was not of the kind claimed by the appellant. It certainly was not competent to show that the defendant was warned to "look out" for the deceased, or the like. This would be quite a different thing from proving that the deceased was a dangerous man, and one who might be expected to go to extreme measures if he should attack the defendant. For these reasons, if no other error appeared in the record, the cause would not be reversed on this ground.

The rulings of the court in excluding certain questions asked the witness Mrs. Smith, widow of the deceased, on cross-examination, with reference to certain articles appearing in the paper formerly owned by her husband, after the first trial of this case, and excluding said articles when offered in evidence, were not erroneous. There was no error in allowing private counsel, employed to assist the district attorney in the prosecution of the case, to open and close the argument in the case. The court below must be left to determine upon the propriety of allowing such a course to be taken, and, so long as private counsel conduct the prosecution properly, we see no reason for holding that the entire argument may not be made by them with the consent and acquiescence of the district attorney and the trial court. The court below gave the following instruction, which is complained of by the appellant: "In this case the homicide, having been established by the state, unless the testimony of the state proves that the offense was excusable or justifiable, the burden of the proof is upon the defendant to show by a preponderance of evidence that the crime was only manslaughter, or was justifiable." This instruction was erroneous, because, the homicide being established by the state, it cast upon the defendant the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the killing was justifiable, or only manslaughter. People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. Rep. 127, 549; People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296, 22 Pac. Rep. 207; People v. Langan, 81 Cal. 142, 22 Pac. Rep. 482. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded with instruction to the court below to remand the cause to the superior court of the county of San Mateo for further proceedings.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. The second subdivision of section 1033 of the Penal Code is clearly unconstitutional. There was also error in the giving of the instruction referred to in the opinion of Mr. Justice Works. Upon the other points therein discussed, I express no opinion.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the above, except as to the instruction described in it. I am of opinion that the instruction is sound law, and that there was no error in giving it.

PER CURIAM. In this case the petition for a rehearing is denied, but the judgment is modified to this extent: The superior court will compute interest on the amount awarded to respondent from January 1, 1885, as prayed for in the complaint, instead of September 15, 1883, the date of the architect's certificate.

APPEAL—PRACTICE—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—NONSUIT.

Where a nonsuit is granted, it is not necessary that the record show on what ground the motion was made, as the ruling of the court will be upheld, if it can be justified on any ground. DE HAVEN and THORNTON, JJ., dissent.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

W. W. Allen and D. S. Smart, for appellant. George F. Hoeffler and Moore & Reed, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal, by the plaintiff, from a judgment of nonsuit. There is a bill of exceptions which contains the evidence, and from which it appears that a nonsuit was granted, but the ruling of the court is not assigned or specified as error. Such an assignment has been held to be necessary to present the question to this court. Schroeder v.

Schmidt, 74 Cal. 459, 16 Pac. Rep. 243; see, also, Polack v. Gurnee, 68 Cal. 267, 5 Pac. Rep. 229, 610; Malone v. County of Del Norte, 77 Cal. 217, 19 Pac. Rep. 422.

The assignment of error is the pleading which points out the particular question raised and passed upon in the court below, and presented to this court for review. The bill of exceptions is intended to present the facts and the exception which sustains the point made and thus reserved for our determination. Pico v. Cohn, 78 Cal. 385, 20 Pac. Rep. 706. If this were not so, this court would be compelled, instead of looking to the assignment of errors for the questions presented, to search the whole transcript to find them; opposing counsel would have no means of knowing what points would be relied upon until the briefs were filed in this court, and questions could be urged here that had never been called to the attention of the court below on the motion for a new trial. A different rule was declared in one case, in department, in which a distinction is made between a statement and a bill of exceptions in this respect. Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 18 Pac. Rep. 403. It is true, as said in that case, that the statute applies, in terms, to statements only; but this court has held, in a number of cases, that a statement and a bill of exceptions are the same, and where a bill of exceptions is used on a motion for a new trial, and is thereby made to take the place of the statement, it must contain everything necessary to present the question by a statement. Undoubtedly a bill of exceptions might be used where a statement might not be proper, and in many cases no specification of error would be necessary. But where a bill of exceptions is used as the basis of a motion for a new trial, it is a statement. The court below has a right, under the Code, to have specifically pointed out all errors relied upon in making the motion, and this court can only be called upon to pass upon such questions as have thus been specified, and relied upon in the trial court. That such was the intention of the Code we have no doubt, and it is absolutely necessary that it should be so, in order that cases may be fairly presented and properly decided. The same rule must prevail in any case where the error to be reviewed depends upon the evidence given at the trial, whether it is necessary to present the error complained of by a motion for a new trial or not. The policy of the law is that a question should be presented to the court below, and an opportunity be given to that court to correct the error, if one has been committed, before appealing to this court.

It is further contended by the respondent that, as the determination of the question whether or not the nonsuit was properly granted depends entirely upon the sufficiency of the evidence to make out the plaintiff's case, the appeal must have been taken within 60 days, and, as this appeal was not taken within that time, it was too late. Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "But an exception to the decision or verdict, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment." We think the ruling on the motion for a nonsuit was a "decision" within the meaning of this section, and although the ruling, if erroneous, has been held to be an error of law, the whole question depends, in this court, upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision of the trial court. The appeal must be taken within 60 days to be available.

The appellant contends that the judgment of nonsuit cannot be upheld in this case because the record does not show the grounds upon which the motion was made, or that any grounds were assigned. This would be so, if the nonsuit had been denied, and the defendant had appealed. But it is not so where the nonsuit was granted. The decision of the trial court will be upheld where the nonsuit is granted, if the ruling can be justified on any ground, whether made a ground of the motion or not. The reason for this is that the moving party must show error on appeal, and, in order to sustain an appeal in this class of cases, he must show that he pointed out to the court below the grounds of his motion. If he did not, the objection is waived. But this rule cannot apply where the motion is granted, as the doctrine of waiver can have no application where the decision is in favor of the moving party. But, notwithstanding our conclusion that the question is not properly presented, we have examined the evidence carefully, and are satisfied that the evidence of the plaintiff was entirely insufficient to make out his case, or to put the defendant upon her proof. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; FOX, J.

PATERSON and MCFARLAND, JJ. We concur in the judgment on the ground last stated. The decision of the department in Shadburne v. Daly is correct, in our opinion, and should be adhered to.

KIRKWOOD v. SOTO. (No. 13,894.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1891.)

COMPENSATION OF OFFICER—INCREASE DURING TERM.

Under Const. Cal. art. 11, § 9, providing that "the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election, or during his term of office," it is the compensation for services to be rendered, and not traveling and other incidental expenses of the office, that is forbidden to be raised.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county. JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Action by Kirkwood, county superintendent of schools of Contra Costa county, against Soto, auditor of the same county, to compel defendant to draw his warrant on the county treasurer for $76.75, traveling expenses incurred by plaintiff in the performance of his official duties, which never had been allowed by the county board. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Tinning, for appellant. Chase, Chase & Mellis, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The respondent was elected superintendent of schools of Contra Costa county at the general election held in 1886. His term was four years, commencing on the first Monday of January following. In due time, he qualified, and entered upon the discharge of his duties, and has ever since continued to hold the office. At the time of his election, Contra Costa was a county of the seventeenth class, and the county government act contained the following provision in regard to his salary: "Sec. 189. In counties of the seventeenth class, the county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the following salaries, to-wit: * * * (11) The superintendent of schools, eighteen hundred dollars per annum." St. 1885, p. 176. In March, 1889, section 1552 of the Political Code was amended so as to read as follows: "Sec. 1552. Each county superintendent shall receive his actual and necessary traveling expenses, said expenses to be allowed by the board of supervisors, and to be paid out of the general fund: provided, that this amount shall not exceed ten dollars per district per annum. He shall also be allowed postage and expressage, payable out of the county school fund, two dollars for each school-district: provided, that in incorporated cities each school containing three hundred pupils shall be considered equal to one school-district." After this amended section took effect, the respondent incurred, in the performance of his official duties as school superintendent in visiting schools in his county, actual and necessary traveling expenses, to the amount of $76.75. For this amount, he presented a claim to the board of supervisors, properly itemized and verified for allowance. The claim was examined and allowed by the board, and a warrant was ordered drawn on the county treasurer therefor. The appellant was county auditor at the time, and, as such, refused to draw the warrant ordered, and thereupon this proceeding was commenced to compel him to do so. After a hearing, the court below granted the prayer of the petition, and ordered a peremptory writ of mandate to issue, commanding the appellant to forthwith draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner upon the county treasurer for the amount allowed and ordered paid by the board of supervisors. From that order or judgment this appeal is prosecuted. The only contention of appellant is that section 1552, supra, is inapplicable and unconstitutional, so far as the respondent is concerned, it having been passed after he was elected to office, because, in authorizing the payment of his necessary traveling expenses, it, in effect, increases the compensation or salary allowed him at the time of his election. The clause of the constitution relied upon reads as follows: "The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election, or during his term of office." Article 11, § 9. The words "compensation" and "salary" were evidently used synonymously in the constitution, and in the county government act. Thus, in article 5, § 19, of the constitution, it is provided: "The governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, controller, treasurer, attorney general, and surveyor general shall, at stated times during their continuance in office, receive for their services a compensation for their services which shall not be increased or diminished during the term for which they shall have been elected," etc. In article 9, § 2, it is provided: "A superintendent of public instruction shall, at each gubernatorial election after the adoption of this constitution, be elected by the qualified electors of the state. He shall receive a salary equal to that of the secretary of state," etc. And, in article 6, § 17, this language is used: "The justices of the supreme court and judges of the superior court shall severally, at stated times during their continuance in office, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be increased or diminished after their election, nor during the term for which they shall have been elected. The salaries of the justices of the supreme court shall be paid by the state. One-half the salary of each superior court judge shall be paid by the state, the other half thereof shall be paid by the county for which he is elected. During the term of the first judges elected under this constitution, the annual salaries of the justices of the supreme court shall be six thousand dollars each." In the county government act the same language is used at the commencement of each section which fixes the compensation of county officers. It is: "The county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the following salaries." Since the adoption of the present constitution many acts have been passed by the legislature, after the commencement of terms of office, providing for the payment of necessary expenses incident to the offices. Among them, the following may be noted: The justices of the supreme court and the judges of the superior court, who were first elected under the constitution, entered upon the discharge of their duties, as such, on the first Monday of January, 1880. In April following, an act was passed to amend part 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and substituting a new part 1 to take the place thereof. See Amend. Codes 1880, p. 21. By section 47 of this act, it was provided that the supreme court shall hold regular sessions at the capital of the state, at the city and county of San Francisco, and at the city of Los Angeles; and that "the justices and officers of the supreme court shall be allowed their actual traveling expenses in going to and from their respective places of residence upon the business of the court, or to attend its sessions." By section 71, it is provided that a judge of any superior court may hold the superior court in any county, at the request of the judge of that county, "and, upon the request of the governor, it shall be his duty to do so." And, by section 160, it is provided that "a judge so holding a court, at the request of the governor, shall be allowed his actual expenses in going to, returning from, and attending upon the business of such court, which shall be a charge against the treasury of the county where such court is held, and paid out of the general fund thereof." The constitutionality of these provisions has never been questioned, so far as we are advised, in any court, or elsewhere, and yet, if the theory of the appellant be true, they would seem to have been subject to the same objections raised here, during the terms of the justices and judges who were in office at the time the act was passed.

The question now presented for decision does not appear to have been ever passed upon by the supreme court of this state, but a similar question was before the supreme court of Illinois, in Briscoe v. Clark Co., 95 Ill. 809. The constitution of that state provided that the county board should fix the compensation of all county officers, with the amount of their necessary expenses, "provided, that the compensation of no officer shall be increased or diminished during his term of office." The supreme court held that it was the salary of the county officer—the compensation for the personal discharge of official duty—which the board was forbidden to change. The compensation or salary was to be fixed in advance, but the expenses were to be determined by the necessity, which the business of the office should develop, and being so, the allowance for expenses could be increased. In our opinion, it was the compensation for services to be rendered, and not the incidental expenses of the office, that the legislature was forbidden, by section 9 of article 11 of the constitution, to raise. We therefore advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; GIBSON, C.

BAKER v. BRICKELL et al. (Nos. 12,992, 13,574.)<sup>1</sup>

HUSBAND AND WIFE — OCCUPATION OF GOVERNMENT LAND — BONA FIDE POSSESSOR — TRUST — ESTOPPEL.

1. In 1860 a married man went into possession of part of the government land known as the "outside lands" of San Francisco. In 1863 he died, and his wife, with their children, continued in possession, and was in possession at the passage of Act Cong. March 8, 1866, (14 U. S. St. at Large, p. 4.) relinquishing and granting the right and title of the United States in said lands to the city of San Francisco, in trust to be "disposed of and conveyed by said city, to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants on the passage of this act," on such terms as the legislature should prescribe. While the husband and wife were in possession, they executed a declaration of homestead on the land under the California homestead act of 1862, by which the homestead estate, on the death of either, vested absolutely in the survivor. Thereafter the city deeded the land to the widow, she having complied with the various ordinances and legislative acts relative thereto. Held, that as she had bona fide actual possession at the passage of the act, no trust arose under the conveyance to her in favor of said children.

2. The fact that she, as administratrix of her husband, returned said land as assets of his estate is immaterial, and does not estop her to claim it as her own.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco: JOHN HUNT, Judge.

E. J. & J. H. Moore, for appellant. Kellogg, Fox & King, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. In this case there are two appeals prosecuted by defendant Brickell, —the first (12,992) from the judgment on the judgment roll; and the second (13,574) from an order denying Brickell's motion for a new trial. They will be considered together. The action is brought to establish a trust against defendant Brickell. The lands in controversy are portions of what are known as the "outside lands" of the city and county of San Francisco, and not within that portion affected by the Van Ness ordinance. John H. Baker went into possession of the lands in suit, called the "Baker Tract" or "Golden Gate Ranch," on July 9, 1860. He purchased this and other lands within his possession from one James C. Garner. He was then a married man, and at the time above stated went into possession with his wife, Maria Baker, (who is the defendant, Maria Baker Batchelder,) and their children. John H. Baker died in March, 1863, leaving his wife surviving with six children, of whom the plaintiff was one, then an infant of tender years. The surviving wife, with her children, remained in possession of the land in controversy, and was in possession when the act of congress of March 8, 1866, entitled "An act to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco," was passed, and before and some time after the passage of this act. See this act on page 4 of 14 U. S. St. at Large. At the time of the passage of this act, the legal title to these lands was in the United States. The land granted by the act was within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, and the right and title of the United States was by it relinquished and granted to the city of San Francisco and its successors, subject to certain reservations and exceptions designated therein, "upon the following trusts, namely: That all the said land not heretofore granted to said city shall be disposed of and conveyed by said city to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants on the passage of this act, in such quantities, and upon such terms and conditions, as the legislature of the state of California may prescribe, except such parcels thereof as may be reserved and set apart by ordinance of said city for public use." A proviso follows the above which has no bearing on the case, and need not be further adverted to.

It may be remarked here that no part of the land in suit was ever reserved or set apart by ordinance, or otherwise, for public uses. Some observations are here appropriate as to the nature of the title of the city, successor to the former pueblo of San Francisco. The character of this title has been the subject of discussion in similar cases, both in the supreme court of the United States and in this court, and it may be regarded as settled law that the title of the pueblo, as well as that of the city, was not an indefeasible estate; ownership of such lands could not be strictly affirmed of either the pueblo or the city. The title amounted to little more than a restricted and qualified right to alienate portions of the land to its inhabitants for buildings, or cultivation, or both, and to use the remainder for commons, for pasture lands, or as a source of revenue, or for other public purposes. The right of this possession and use was in all particulars subject to the control of the government of the country. They were to be held by the pueblo or city in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants, and its right of disposition was subject to be modified, and even taken away by the government. On this point see Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. 326; Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. 364; Palmer v. Low, 98 U. S. 16; Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 253; Leroy v. Cunningham, 44 Cal. 599; Dupond v. Barstow, 45 Cal. 450; Low v. Lewis, 46 Cal. 549; McManus v. O'Sullivan, 48 Cal. 7, 17, 18; Randall v. Austin, 46 Cal. 54; McCreery v. Sawyer, 52 Cal. 257; People v. Holladay, 68 Cal. 442, 9 Pac. Rep. 655. The legal title to these lands passed to the United States from Mexico on its acquisition of California, and passed to the city by the act of March 8, 1866, upon the trusts above set forth, for the benefit of such of its inhabitants as were in the bona fide actual possession of the same at the date of the passage of the act just above referred to, viz., on the 8th day of March, 1866.

Now, who was in the bona fide actual possession of the land on the 8th of March, 1866? For whose benefit and behalf was the grant by congress made? Obviously, Maria Baker. She was then and before that date an inhabitant of the city of San Francisco, residing on the lands with her children. That the grant was made to the head of the family there can be no question, and Maria Baker was then the head of her family. We consider this determined in Labish v. Hardy, 77 Cal. 327, 19 Pac. Rep. 531, where a similar question was determined in similar language in a grant made by act of congress to the corporate authorities of the town of Santa Cruz. The only difference between that case and this is that in the case cited the surviving husband was held to be the grantee, and in this case the surviving wife is the grantee. The possession in both cases was that of the head of the family, the husband in one case, and the wife or widow in the other. Here the husband and father was not in being when the act of congress was passed in 1866. He had then been dead nearly three years. It goes without saying that then, being dead, he could not take title under the grant, and, therefore, on his decease the land did not become a part of his estate. It may be added here that the tenant spoken of in the act of congress may be held to signify the conventional tenant. Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 374. Here there was no contract either express or implied from which the tenancy could be inferred, nor is there any reason to hold that Mrs. Baker became the tenant, in any sense, of her husband on his decease.

To carry the act of the 8th of March, 1866, into execution, the board of supervisors passed an ordinance, known as "Order 800," which was ratified and affirmed by an act of the legislature passed March 27, 1868. Order 800 was passed by the board of supervisors on the 14th of January, 1868. See St. 1867-68, p. 379, etc. Subsequently, in 1870, another act of the legislature was passed to expedite the settlement of the land-titles in the city and county of San Francisco, etc., affirming order 800 of the board of supervisors of the city. See St. 1869-70, p. 353, etc. This enactment was made to enable the parties entitled to procure conveyances of the title to these lands from the city and county of San Francisco. Of the act of congress, and of the ordinances of the city and county of San Francisco, and of the acts of the legislature, it may be remarked that nowhere in them is the title of any other person recognized or allowed, save those who were in actual bona fide possession on the 8th of March, 1866, by themselves or their tenants, except where a possessor had been ousted from his possession, which possession he might recover by suit. As there was no evidence of ouster here by Maria Baker of any one, no question arises here as to ouster and recovery of possession by a suit at law.

By the order 800, ratified as above, it was provided that a map or plan of these outside lands should be made and adopted by the board of supervisors above mentioned; that upon the completion of the map it should be deposited for public inspection in the office of the clerk of the board of supervisors, there to remain for a period of thirty days, notice whereof should be given by publication in three of the daily papers of the city during the time that the map should so remain in the clerk's office. The occupant of any tract of land was required, by order 800, ratified as above, to present a diagram of his land, and have it delineated on the map made by the supervisors. This delineation of a tract, however, could not be made on the map unless all the taxes on it should have been paid for five fiscal years preceding the year beginning July 1, 1866. The claimant was also, before the title could be procured, required to surrender all claim to any streets and highways. By the act of 1870 (St. 1869-70, supra,) passed March 14th of that year, the claimant was empowered to file a petition for a grant from the city of the tract of land of which he was in possession, as above mentioned. By the provisions of this act the petitioner was to set forth in such petition, verified as required by the act, a claim that he or his tenants, or the persons through whom he claims or derives possession, had been, from and including the 8th day of March, 1866, and still was, in possession of a portion of such outside land, and that he, or the person through whom he claims or derives possession, has paid to the tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco the amount assessed by the Outside Land Commission upon the land described in the petition, to pay for the land reserved for public uses, provided for in section 10 of order 800, and has also paid the five years' taxes mentioned in section 4 of order 800, and all taxes levied on said lands for state and municipal purposes, then remaining unpaid. The board of supervisors was, these before-mentioned acts having been done, required to proceed to act on his petition. The claimant was required to make proof of the facts stated in his petition before a committee of the board of supervisors, styled the "Outside Land Committee." After the proofs were closed, the Outside Land Committee was required to consider the same, and to make such report and recommendation thereon as shall seem to them just and proper in the premises. The committee was required to file with the clerk of the board the testimony taken by it, and its report, which report was to be submitted to the board of supervisors for their approval, and if, in their judgment, the claim of the petitioner is well founded, the board was, by an order entered in their minutes, to adjudge and award a grant of his lands to the petitioner, less the amount reserved for public use. The board was thereupon required to give public notice of their award by notice published at least once a week for three successive weeks in a daily newspaper published in the city and county of San Francisco, which notice should specify the name of the applicant, the date and filing of his petition, and the tract of land awarded, by a good and sufficient description thereof, proof of publication of which notice was to be made in the manner then or thereafter required by law for the proof of publication in civil process. Section 2, p. 354, Act 1870. The third section of the act provides for the execution of a deed of conveyance signed by the mayor of the said city and county, and acknowledged and delivered by him to the applicant of the tract of land awarded to him, to which shall be attached the corporate seal of the city and county above named, provided the petitioner, before receiving the deed aforesaid, is required to quitclaim and personally deliver the possession of all lands claimed by him reserved for public purposes, and for the use and benefit of the city and county, provided there is no suit pending between the petitioner and some third person. A reference will be further made to this last-mentioned proviso hereafter in this opinion. By the third section it is provided that the conveyance executed under the provisions of this act shall operate as an acknowledgment on the part of the city and county aforesaid that the title to the land described in it has passed under and by virtue of order 800 and ordinance 822, and of the several acts of congress and of the legislature ratifying said order and ordinance, under the authority of which the same have been passed. The said conveyance shall likewise operate to grant, convey, remise, and release to the party, his heirs and assigns, named therein, the lands in such conveyance described, and all the estate and interest present and future of the city and county of San Francisco in and to such lands. On the 10th day of January, 1873, Maria Baker, after due and regular proceedings had under order 800, and the acts of the legislature of 1868 and 1870, was granted a conveyance in the usual form of all the lands described in the complaint as being part of the Baker ranch, which conveyance was executed to her by the authorities of the city and county, as required by the act of 1870, above referred to, and in the mode therein set forth, conveying to her the title of the city and county of San Francisco, as declared in the fifth section of the act of 1870, the provisions of which have been fully stated above. When the conveyance was made to her afterwards, it does not appear that any suit in regard to the land was pending against her. Not appearing, this court must regard it as not existing. Maria Baker intermarried with one David F. Batchelder, and subsequently she and her husband, Batchelder, executed to the defendant Brickell divers mortgages on the land conveyed to her by the deed of the city and county aforementioned, and on other lands, to secure the payment of divers sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $42,500. These mortgages were subsequently regularly foreclosed, and the land sold under a decree of foreclosure, regularly given, made, and entered, and by such decree and the sale thereunder, and the deed of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco executed to defendant Brickell, the title of said Maria Batchelder became vested in Brickell. It further appears from the findings herein that on the 23d of September, 1862, Maria Baker and her then husband, John H. Baker, executed a declaration of homestead in due form of law, embracing the land involved in this litigation. This homestead estate, under the provisions of the act of 1862, under which the declaration was made and recorded, on the death of either spouse, vested absolutely in the survivor. Such is the effect of the fourth section of the act of 1862. See Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 445-447, where the point is considered and decided. See, also, cases cited in the opinion in that case. It was not necessary that this homestead estate should be set apart by the probate court to the surviving spouse. It vested in the survivor by descent. Herrold v. Reen, supra. So on the death of John H. Baker, in March, 1863, the homestead estate vested in his surviving wife, Maria Baker. Under such circumstances the contention cannot be upheld that the possession of Maria Baker was not, on the 8th of March, 1866, bona fide. She was not only in actual possession, but she was there having title to the whole land as against any heir of John H. Baker, by the legal devolution to her of the whole land as a homestead. In such a state and condition the bona fides of her possession could not be impeached. Its bona fides were beyond a doubt.

This conclusion disposes of this case, for in no event would any trust arise here in favor of any of the children, issue of the marriage of Maria Baker and her husband John H. Baker. The plaintiff could have no claim to any portion of the land. There is nothing on which to build a trust. A trust arises from contract or from circumstances which affect the conscience of a party, and charge him with the rights of another. Here there was no contract between Maria and John H. Baker, constituting a trust, and no circumstances affecting the conscience of Maria Baker, charging her with any duty to her children in regard to the lands in suit. John H. Baker had no title to this land. His settlement and possession on it was merely permissive. He acquired no right to it by such possession. The title was then in the United States, to give it to whom it thought best; and when it did make a donation, in March, 1866, he could not be the recipient of a grant. He had then departed this life, and could take nothing by the act of congress passed on the day above mentioned. The possession on that day was that of his wife, the then head of the family, Maria Baker. She owed no duty to her children save support, maintenance, and education,—none in regard to this land. Independent of the homestead which had arisen under the act of 1862, which, as we have seen, passed to her on the death of her husband, we think she was on the 8th day of March, 1866, in the actual bona fide possession of the land, but when the homestead right is taken into account, there can in our judgment be no question or doubt as to the bona fides of her actual possession. She was, therefore, the grantee under the act of congress of the land in question. The grant to Maria Baker was a pure donation, and how any trust in favor of any other person could arise out of it, we cannot surmise. Nor are we without authority to sustain this conclusion. In Labish v. Hardy, 77 Cal. 327, 19 Pac. Rep. 531, a like question came before this court for discussion, and its determination was in accordance with what is stated herein. In that case the decision was in relation to the provisions of an act of congress of July 23, 1866, relinquishing and granting the lands within the limits of the town of Santa Cruz to the corporate authorities thereof, in trust, and with authority to convey them to the parties in the actual bona fide occupancy thereof at the date of the passage of the act. On May 13, 1871, the corporate authorities of the town conveyed the premises to William H. Hardy, father of appellant, and husband and grantor of respondent. The appellant claimed that the rights and equities acquired by her parents through occupancy and possession of the premises constituted community property, one-half of which belonged to her mother, and at her death, by the law then existing, descended to and vested in her children. The mother of appellant died in 1856, ten years prior to the passage of the act of congress in July, 1866. The court, per SHARPSTEIN, J., said: "The beneficiaries under the act of congress were clearly those in the bona fide occupancy of the land in the town of Santa Cruz at the date of the passage of said act, which was ten years after the death of appellant's mother. An occupancy which terminated ten years before the passage of the act would not be a bona fide occupancy at the time of its passage. We are unaware of any law under which a bare occupancy of any public land of the United States vests in the occupant any right or equities in or to the land so occupied. We think no property was acquired in the premises in controversy by either of the parents of appellant prior to the passage of the act of July 23, 1866." This judgment was concurred in by five of the justices of this court, and there was no dissent. It is clearly correct and meets our approval.

The other circumstances, viz., the facts that Maria Baker qualified and was appointed as administratrix of John H. Baker, and put the land in suit on the inventory returned by her to the probate court as assets of her intestate's estate in the administration of the estate, are entirely immaterial. We are aware of no law by which a person appointed administrator loses his land by so acting. There is no estoppel on Maria Baker to claim her own property under such circumstances. She no doubt acted in this matter through ignorance of her rights, or, if advised at all, from having been improperly counseled. It is useless to dwell on the points adverted to in relation to the administration, which are totally immaterial, and cannot in any proper view of them affect the decision of this case. The judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. So ordered.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

CHESTER v. FIELD et al. (No. 13,816.)

EJECTMENT—QUIETING TITLE—JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS.

1. Upon a complaint containing the usual allegations in ejectment, and all that are necessary to quiet title, and a prayer that defendants be required to set forth their claims; that said claims be adjudged to be invalid, and plaintiff's title declared to be good; that plaintiff be restored to possession, and defendants be barred forever from asserting any claim to the land, and "for such other and further relief as shall be meet in the premises," judgment would not be given without evidence, even if there was no answer.

2. A specific denial of plaintiff's right of possession, which would be bad on special demurrer for uncertainty, is sufficient to raise an issue as to some portion of the property, and to defeat a motion for judgment on the pleadings, even if such motion were ever good in ejectment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. GOTTSCHALK, Judge.

A. Everett Ball, for appellant. Edward Field, in pro. per., and Henry C. Dibble, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The complaint contains the usual allegations in ejectment, and all that are necessary to quiet title. At the trial, and before any evidence was introduced, the plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, claiming that the answer raised no material issue. There was no demurrer to the answer. The motion was properly denied. If the action be considered as an action of ejectment, there is a specific denial of plaintiff's alleged right of possession. The denial, it is true, covers all the parcels described in the complaint, and would not stand the test on demurrer for uncertainty, but it is sufficient to raise an issue as to some portion of the property, and to defeat a motion for judgment on the pleadings, assuming that such a motion would be good under any circumstances in an action of ejectment.

The prayer of the complaint is that the defendants be required to set forth their claims; that said claims be adjudged to be invalid, and plaintiff's title declared to be good; that plaintiff be restored to possession, and defendants be debarred forever from asserting any claim to the land, and "for such other and further relief as shall be meet in the premises, and costs of suit." Upon the allegations of the complaint and this prayer the court would not have given judgment without evidence, if there had been no answer at all filed. The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

ACCOUNTING—FINDINGS OF FACT—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE AFTER VERDICT—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In an action for an accounting by defendant of cattle delivered to him by plaintiff's intestate, the issue as to the number of cattle delivered to defendant is immaterial where it appears that defendant has made a complete settlement with deceased and with plaintiffs.

2. Each party moved for judgment on a special verdict, but the court did nothing until three months thereafter, when it permitted defendant to introduce further evidence, without showing cause therefor by affidavit. Plaintiffs also introduced such evidence as they wished. Held, that there was no abuse of discretion.

3. Where one of plaintiffs' counsel objected to evidence of statements made by plaintiffs' witness inconsistent with his testimony, on the ground that there was no foundation laid to impeach his testimony, and plaintiffs' leading counsel then said, "if it was not after he testified, he cannot be impeached in that way," the objection does not go to the proving of what witness said after he testified.

4. The findings as to settlements being controlling, any error in the admission of evidence tending to show the number of cattle delivered to defendant was harmless.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

James H. Budd and F. D. & G. W. Nicol, for appellants. F. W. Street, E. A. Rodgers, and J. C. Campbell, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The first count of the complaint in this action alleges that the decedent in his life-time verbally contracted with the defendant to deliver to the latter a large number of stock cattle, which the defendant was to herd, pasture, feed, and care for, in consideration of which the defendant was to have one-half of the increase of said cattle, but was to return, or account to the decedent for, all the cattle originally delivered and one-half of the increase at the expiration of the contract. The contract did not fix or state the time during which the defendant was to keep the cattle, but it is alleged that he kept them until William Clavey died, June 25, 1885. Nor is the date of the contract alleged, but it appears that it was made in 1875. It is further alleged, on information and belief, that the deceased delivered to the defendant, under the contract, "about one hundred and forty head of stock cattle," which defendant kept according to the contract, and "that the increase of said cattle, while in possession of the defendant under said contract, amounted to many hundreds." It is further alleged, on information and belief, that during the life-time of William Clavey there was no accounting between him and defendant in regard to the cattle; and that no accounting or settlement has been made between plaintiffs and defendant in regard to the cattle since the death of William Clavey. In the second count it is alleged, on information and belief, that during the life-time of the deceased he and defendant entered into a verbal contract, "by the terms of which they were to purchase large tracts of land in Tuolumne county, the same to be held by them in common." That under said contract "Clavey furnished to defendant large sums of money with which to purchase and pay for his (Clavey's) interest in the aforesaid land;" and that defendant, "with said money, and money of his own, and under said agreement, did purchase large tracts of land, the deeds and conveyances of which were taken in the name of defendant, and in trust, however, for the joint benefit of himself and said Clavey, each of whom owned an undivided half thereof." That the defendant still holds the title to said lands, and "refuses to account to plaintiffs therefor, or for the rents and profits of the land, or for the money invested therein by Clavey, and refuses to make any statement of his trust under said contract, all of which has been demanded by plaintiffs. The prayer of the complaint is—First, that defendant account for the cattle under the contract first alleged; and, second, that he account for all money received by him for the purchase of land under the contract, alleged in the second count, and for all lands purchased therewith, and for the rents and profits thereof. The answer of the defendant admits a contract in regard to the cattle, but with the additional terms that the defendant was authorized to deal with, sell, and dispose of the cattle and the increase as his own, during the time he should keep them, and account to Clavey for the proceeds of such sales; and that defendant was not to be liable for loss of cattle by death or otherwise; and, also, that defendant was to hold said cattle as security for all debts due the defendant from Clavey. And denies that Clavey delivered to defendant more than 77 head of cattle under the contract. Denies that there had been no accounting and settlement with Clavey and the defendant; but alleges that at divers times he had accounted to and settled with Clavey, during his life-time, all matters pertaining to the cattle contract, and that in March, 1887, he had accounted and settled with the plaintiffs for all the cattle and increase thereof that remained in his possession after the death of Clavey. The answer also denies all the material allegations of the second count. Twenty-five special issues framed by counsel for the respective parties were submitted by the court to a jury, and on April 7, 1888, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs upon all the issues except one, as to which the jury failed to agree. Thereupon each party asked for judgment on the special verdict; but no further action appears to have been taken by court or counsel until July 14, 1888, when defendant's counsel asked permission to introduce further evidence, which was allowed by the court against the objection of plaintiffs' counsel. After hearing the additional evidence the court set aside the special verdict, and upon all the evidence made written findings in favor of the defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The court found the cattle contract to have been as stated in defendant's answer, and that defendant received only 77 head of cattle under the contract; and further found, in regard to the cattle transaction, as follows: "(6) That during the life-time of Clavey, defendant and said Clavey had frequent settlements and accountings in regard to the cattle so received, and the increase thereof, and that at each of said settlements defendant fully settled with said Clavey for all of the cattle sold and the increase of said cattle; (7) that on or about the 10th day of March, 1887, defendant delivered to plaintiffs herein, the administratrix and administrator of the estate of said William Clavey, deceased all of the cattle that remained in defendant's possession, whether the same were original stock cattle, or the increase of said stock cattle, and the plaintiffs herein received the same; (8) that at the time of the commencement of this action, defendant did not have in his possession any of the original stock cattle received from William Clavey, nor any of the increase of the original stock cattle so received, nor any of the proceeds of the sale of said cattle or the increase thereof, but had fully accounted to said Clavey during his life-time for the increase of said cattle, and the proceeds from the sale of the same, and had turned over to said plaintiffs all of the cattle that they were entitled to receive under the terms of said contract." Upon all the issues in the second count, the court found in favor of defendant.

1. Many of the findings are attacked on the ground that they are not justified by the evidence. But I think all the findings, except that as to the number of cattle delivered to defendant under the contract, are sustained by a preponderance of evidence; and the finding as to the number of cattle delivered is supported by the positive testimony of the defendant, and of the witness Richards, opposed to the positive testimony of John Loney and the rather indefinite testimony of McFarland.

for the plaintiffs. There was an attempt by each party to discredit the witnesses of the other as to the number of cattle; but there is nothing in the record from which it can be seen or determined here that the court did not justly estimate the credibility of the witnesses. Besides, if the sixth, seventh, and eight findings as to settlements with the deceased and plaintiffs are justified by the evidence, as I think they are, they are controlling, and render the issue as to the number of cattle immaterial.

2. It is insisted by appellants that the court erred in hearing additional evidence three months after the verdict of the jury was rendered, and in disregarding the verdict of the jury. When the verdict was rendered, each party moved for judgment upon it, and it does not appear why the court did not further act in the case until three months thereafter; yet it does not appear that the delay was objected to by the appellants. If the court disagreed with the verdict of the jury, there should be no question that it had the power to disregard and set it aside of its own motion, since, until adopted by the court, it was only advisory. Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 Pac. Rep. 625; Sweetser v. Dobbins, 65 Cal. 529, 4 Pac. Rep. 540, and other cases. The only remaining question under this head is whether the court erred in permitting the defendant to introduce further evidence without showing cause therefor by affidavit. It was undoubtedly within the discretionary power of the court to permit further evidence, under the circumstances disclosed by the record. Foot v. Richmond, 42 Cal. 441; Barry v. Bennett, 45 Cal. 80; Keys v. Warner, Id. 60; Association v. Willard, 48 Cal. 615; Cousins v. Partridge, 79 Cal. 224, 21 Pac. Rep. 745; Bank v. Wolff, 79 Cal. 70, 21 Pac. Rep. 551, 748. And no abuse of that power appears. Both parties were permitted to introduce additional evidence without any apparent restriction; and both parties did introduce additional evidence. There is no complaint that the plaintiffs were surprised, or were not allowed ample opportunity to procure and introduce evidence in rebuttal or in chief; nor does it appear that plaintiffs failed to procure any additional evidence desired, which would have been available under other circumstances. Conceding that the court might have denied the motion to admit further evidence without any apparent abuse of discretion, as in the case of Kobler v. Wells, 26 Cal. 613, cited by respondent, it does not necessarily follow that it was an abuse of discretion to grant the motion; for, in cases where the decision is governed entirely by the discretion of the court, it may often happen that a decision in favor of either party would not appear to be an abuse of discretion. To say that the law allows no latitude for the exercise of discretionary power is to deny that the power is discretionary. The only limitation that the law has placed upon the exercise of discretionary judicial power is that it must not be abused. While it may be difficult to define exactly what is meant by abuse of judicial discretion, and whatever it may imply as to the disposition and motives of the judge, it is fairly deducible from the cases that one of its essential attributes is that it must plainly appear to effect injustice.

3. On the trial before the jury, McFarland testified for the plaintiff as to the number of cattle delivered to the defendant. On the trial before the court, three months later, the defendant offered to prove by his witness, Preston, that, after McFarland had testified, he made a statement, in regard to the number of cattle, inconsistent with his testimony before the jury. Thereupon the following objection by counsel, and ruling by the court, were made: "Mr. Nicol. I object upon the ground that no proper foundation has been laid to impeach his testimony. Mr. Budd. If it was not after he had testified, he cannot be impeached in that way. Mr. Campbell. It was after. The Court. Answer the question. Mr Budd. Plaintiff excepts." The witness then testified to a statement by McFarland made after he had testified before the jury, inconsistent with his testimony before the jury. Counsel for appellants contend that the admission of Preston's testimony was error. I think, however, that the objection, as modified by Mr. Budd, who appears to have been the leading counsel for plaintiffs, was no objection to proving what McFarland said after he testified before the jury; and that the objection must have been so understood by the court and counsel for defendant.

4. The deposition of J. W. Tullock, assessor of Stanislaus county, was offered in evidence by defendant to show how many cattle were assessed to Clavey in 1874. The plaintiffs objected to questions numbered 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11. Their objection was sustained as to 9 and 10, but was overruled as to 7, 8, and 11. Those questions were as follows: "No. 7. State whether or not the assessment list of that year contains certain cattle belonging to the said Clavey? No. 8. State just what the assessment book shows with reference to these cattle, with regard to number, value, and quality? No. 11. State whether or not the 124 head of cattle above referred to include all the cattle which were assessed to William Clavey in 1874." The answers to these questions appear to have been read by the witness from page 22 of the assessment roll of 1874, showing that 124 head of cattle and no more had been assessed to Clavey that year, and that "124 head of stock cattle had been removed to Tuolumne county." The grounds of the objections were that No. 7 was incompetent, irrelevant, and not the best evidence; the same as to No. 8, and also that it does not appear who made the assessment, or that Clavey signed or had anything to do with it; and that No. 11 did not ask for the best evidence. It is claimed by appellants' counsel that the court erred in overruling their objections to the questions numbered 7, 8, and 11. If there was error in any of these rulings, it was harmless. The evidence objected to tended to prove only that Clavey owned no more than 124 head of cattle at the time of the assessment in 1874; and, therefore, could not have been applied to any other issue than that as to the number of cattle delivered to defendant. It had no bearing whatever upon the issues as to settlements, and could not have influenced or contributed to the findings upon these issues. These findings are controlling, and dispose of the case in favor of the respondent without regard to the number of cattle delivered.

5. Several other exceptions to rulings of the court were taken, but they appear to be either grounded upon misapprehension of the facts or unimportant in view of the settlements found. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PEOPLE ex rel. BOARD OF STATE HARBOR COMMISSIONERS V. ROBERTS. (No. 12,989.)

WHARFAGE TAXES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Wharfage charges imposed by the board of harbor commissioners on the owner of a barge and lighter, which were kept within a slip constructed, repaired, and dredged by the board, are valid, and not in violation of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, which prohibits a state from levying duty on tonnage without the consent of congress.

2. Where a lighter actually received the support of a wharf in discharging into and loading from a vessel tied to the wharf, the fact that the vessel lay between the wharf and the lighter, and that the owner of the vessel had paid regular wharfage rates, does not affect the right of the board of harbor commissioners to collect wharfage rates from the owner of the lighter.

3. While Act Cal. March 17, 1880, which amends Act March 15, 1878, so as to exempt vessels engaged solely in domestic commerce from the wharfage tax, to which vessels engaged in interstate commerce still continue subject, may be invalid, in so far as it discriminates against vessels engaged in interstate commerce, yet the board of harbor commissioners, which is the agent of the state, with only such powers as are conferred on it by the legislature, cannot disregard the amendment, and collect wharfage taxes from vessels engaged solely in domestic commerce.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Rosenbaum & Scheellne, for appellant. T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was brought on behalf of the people on relation of the harbor commissioners to recover a certain sum, claimed to be due to plaintiff for wharfage. The defendant's barge and lighter part of the time were attached to the wharves by hawsers and lines fastened to mooring piles, which had been placed there for that purpose by the respondents, and part of the time they were not attached to the wharves, but were fastened by lines to the sides of other vessels, which were moored up against and fastened to the wharves. Appellant contends—First, that his vessels did not use the wharves, and, therefore, the charge is one upon tonnage and in conflict with section 10, art. 1, of the constitution of the United States; second, that appellant is exempt from the charge made, because his vessels are engaged in transferring merchandise between different points within the state.

There is no merit we think in the first contention. The court found that the appellant did use the wharves, and that finding is not challenged, but it also found that appellant's vessels were not in all cases attached directly to the wharves. The barge and lighter were, however, within the slips which were constructed, kept in repair, and dredged by the respondents; and appellant could not have made use of them unless they had been so repaired and dredged. Under these circumstances, wharfage charges are valid, and the constitutional provision relied upon by appellant is not violated. People v. Gas-light Co., 54 Cal. 248; People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 502;<sup>1</sup> State Tonnage Tax Cases, 12 Wall. 219; Cannon v. City of New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577; Benedict v. Vanderbilt, 1 Rob. (N. Y.) 194. Furthermore, the barge and lighter were, when within the slips, actually receiving the support of the wharves in discharging into and loading from vessels which were tied thereto. They were practically tied to the wharves, although there was a vessel between them and the wharf itself, and the fact that the owners of the vessels lying next to the wharf had paid regular wharfage rates does not affect the right of the harbor commissioners to collect from the defendant. Vicksburg v. Tobin, 100 U. S. 430.

We are of the opinion that appellant's second contention is sustained by the act of the legislature, approved March 17, 1880, amending section 6 of an act entitled "An act concerning the water front of the city and county of San Francisco," approved March 15, 1878. This amendatory act provides that "no wharfage shall be collected on any merchandise or other article loaded on any vessel or railroad car, in the city and county of San Francisco, for the purpose of being transported to any port or place in the state of California, nor on any merchandise or other article loaded on any vessel or railroad car, at any port or place in the state of California, and arriving in the city and county of San Francisco." It is claimed by respondents that this act is unconstitutional, and they rely upon the decision of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Guy v. Baltimore, 106 U. S. 434, in support of this proposition. We do not think that case is in point. It was held in that case that a state could not employ its property for public use so as to hinder, obstruct, or burden, interstate commerce in the interest of commerce wholly internal to that state; could not build up its domestic commerce by means of unequal and oppressive burdens upon the industry and business of other states. In that case an ordinance of the city of Baltimore required vessels laden with the products of other states to pay, for the use of the public wharves of that city, fees which were not exacted from vessels landing thereat with the products of Maryland. It does not follow that because vessels plying between San Francisco and ports outside of this state are exempt from wharfage, under the decision in Guy v. Baltimore, the defendant's vessels should not be exempt therefrom. Application of the rule contended for by respondent, would be a discrimination against domestic vessels. The power to collect wharfrage is derived from the legislature, and the board of harbor commissioners is the agent of the state, with such powers, and no others, as are conferred upon it by the legislature. The court found that "both said lighter and said barge were engaged in transporting freight between different points in the state of California." Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the defendant.

We concur: WORKS, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

SUKEFORTH v. LORD. (No. 13,363.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1891.)

PLEADING—AVERMENT OF FRAUD—INSUFFICIENCY—WAIVER—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

1. Failure to demur to a general allegation of fraud, or to object to evidence offered at the trial, is a waiver of the insufficiency of the pleading. Distinguishing Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. Rep. 404, and overruling Sukeforth v. Lord, 23 Pac. Rep. 296.

2. The fact that the verdict is against the party alleging the fraud does not deprive him of the benefit, on appeal, of the waiver by his adversary of the insufficiency of the plea.

3. The fact that no such objection appears in the statement, on motion for new trial, which contains all the evidence, is a sufficient showing that no such objection was made.

4. In an action for wrongful attachment, the answer denied generally plaintiff's ownership, and then alleged that, by a conspiracy between a debtor of defendant and plaintiff, such debtor conveyed the property in question to plaintiff, with intent to defraud his creditors. Held, that the allegation of fraud so qualifies the denial of ownership that a demurrer on the ground that fraud is not sufficiently alleged goes to the whole answer.

5. Where the record shows that counsel stated to the court, just as the jury were retiring, that he wished an exception to all the instructions given for the other party, and refused for himself, and that the court told him to have them entered, the exception is sufficient as to the written charges, though neither the minutes of the court nor the reporter's notes show that any exception to instructions was reserved or entered. Overruling Sukeforth v. Lord, 23 Pac. Rep. 296.

6. Where a creditor attaches property transferred by his debtor to another, on the ground that the transfer is fraudulent, and is sued by the transferee for its value, which is admitted to be a certain sum, it is error to instruct that the jury may find for plaintiff for a sum less than the admitted value.

7. It is error to refuse to instruct that a transfer by an insolvent may be vitiated by constructive as well as actual fraud.

8. It is likewise error to refuse to instruct that the acceptance by a creditor of an insolvent debtor of an amount of property largely in excess of his demand is a circumstance from which fraud may be inferred.

9. An agreement between the creditor accepting the property and the debtor that the surplus proceeds shall be refunded to the debtor is a circumstance tending to show that the transfer was made with intent to hinder and defraud creditors, and it is error to refuse an instruction to that effect.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 23 Pac. Rep. 296.

George A. Rankin, (T. C. Coogan, of counsel,) for appellant. Cross & Simonds, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to recover damages on account of the seizure by defendant, under a writ of attachment, of certain goods claimed by the plaintiff. The case was under the following circumstances: On the 15th of August, 1888, L. M. Sukeforth, who, for a number of years theretofore, had carried on a certain carpet business at Nevada City, being largely indebted and insolvent, sold, transferred, and delivered to the plaintiff, who is his brother, for a nominal consideration of $1,500, his entire stock in trade, all his outstanding bills and accounts, and all other property exempt from execution which he then possessed. Among his creditors, at the time of this transfer, were Sloan & Co., wholesale carpet dealers, who caused a suit to be instituted upon their claim, and, in said suit, caused an attachment to issue, which was levied by the defendant, as sheriff of Nevada county, on the stock of carpets, etc., then in the possession of the plaintiff, and claimed by him as vendee of his brother. Thereupon, this action was commenced against the sheriff, who defends upon the ground that the sale from L. M. Sukeforth to the plaintiff was fraudulent and void as to creditors. The case was tried by a jury, who found for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. At the trial in the superior court all questions of fact were eliminated from the case by the mutual admissions of counsel, except the single one of fraud in the sale, and all the assignments of error, which we are asked to consider, relate exclusively to that matter.

A preliminary objection is made by the respondent to any consideration of the errors assigned, upon the ground that the answer of the defendant was insufficient to raise the issue of fraud. The allegations of the answer upon this point are as follows: "That the defendant is informed and believes, and, upon such information and belief, so avers the fact to be, that, on or about the said 15th day of August, 1888, while said L. M. Sukeforth was so as aforesaid engaged in business, and while he was so aforesaid indebted, he, said L. M. Sukeforth, and the plaintiff, who is his brother, conspired together for the purpose and with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said L. M. Sukeforth out of their just debts and demands against him, said L. M. Sukeforth; and with such purpose and intent, the said L. M. Sukeforth made a pretended, false, and fraudulent sale of the property mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and of all other property, save such as is by law exempt from execution, owned by said L. M. Sukeforth, to the plaintiff, and, with such purpose and intent, the said plaintiff received said pretended, false, and fraudulent conveyance; and thereupon said plaintiff took possession of said property, and so held the same, and not otherwise."

If there had been a demurrer to the answer, it would probably be held, on the authority of Pehrson v. Hewitt, 79 Cal. 598, 21 Pac. Rep. 950, and other cases cited by respondent, that these allegations were insufficient as a plea of fraud. Or, if evidence tending to prove the supposed fraud had been objected to at the trial, upon the ground of immateriality, the objection would probably have been sustained, unless the answer had been amended. But there was no demurrer to the answer, and at the trial evidence was offered and admitted without any objection whatever, which tended in the strongest manner to establish every fact necessary to invalidate the sale on the ground of fraud. The question therefore is whether a party, who has treated an answer containing a general allegation of fraud as sufficient to raise the issue by going into a trial of all the questions involved without any objection, can make the point here for the first time, that there is no such issue in the case. We think there can be no manner of doubt that, if the verdict and judgment in this case had been in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff had been appealing, he would not have been heard to allege the defect in the answer, which he relies on here to prevent a consideration of the errors assigned by the defendant. In King v. Davis, 34 Cal. 106, the plaintiffs were appealing, and in this court objected to the answer on precisely the ground taken by the respondent here. But the court said: "The point made by the appellant, that the answer does not make an issue of fraud, cannot be considered by us further than to say that it comes too late. The answer contains a general allegation of fraud, and the appellant went to trial upon the issue thus joined, without making any exception to the answer on the score of insufficiency. Nor was any objection made by the appellant to the testimony introduced by the respondent in support of the issue of fraud; on the contrary, that issue was assumed to have been properly made, and was tried upon its merits. Under these circumstances, an objection to the answer that it does not contain a statement of the particular facts and circumstances constituting the alleged fraud, cannot be entertained by us." This proposition, that the failure to allege the particular facts constituting fraud, or estoppel, or other special defenses pleaded in general terms, may be waived by failure to demur, or to object to the evidence offered at the trial, has been affirmed over and over again in a long series of cases running through our reports from the first volume down to the case of Hughes v. Wheeler, 76 Cal. 230, 18 Pac. Rep. 386. We refer to the following, among many others: Lee v. Figg, 37 Cal. 335; Hutchings v. Castle, 48 Cal. 155; Bull v. Ford, 66 Cal. 176, 4 Pac. Rep. 1175. Against this long list of cases is cited the recent decision of department 1 of this court in Albertoll v. Branham, 80 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. Rep. 404, which is supposed to establish a different doctrine. If that case could not be distinguished from this, it would be sufficient to say that it is not law. A decision of one department of this court cannot be held to have overruled a long line of cases decided by the whole court, especially when they are not even named, or otherwise referred to, in the department decision, and were evidently not considered. But the truth is that case differed from this, and from the cases above cited, in the important particular that the evidence of fraud was objected to at the trial, though the report does not show it. By reason of this fact, probably counsel for defendant did not make the point that there had been any waiver of defects in his plea of fraud, and did not cite any of the cases holding the doctrine above quoted from King v. Davis. His whole contention was that his plea was sufficient, and that was the only question which the department decided. Therefore, the rule of King v. Davis is still unquestionably the law of this state, as it unquestionably ought to be. But the respondent contends that it does not apply to this case, because—First. The answer was in such form that he could not have demurred to it on any ground allowed by the statute, and, therefore, he waived nothing by failure to demur. Second. The record does not show that he failed to object to evidence of fraud. Third. The defect in the plea was not cured by verdict, as in King v. Davis, and other cases in which the verdict was in favor of, and not against, the plea, as it is in this case.

With respect to the first point, respondent says the plea of fraud was not separately stated, but was coupled with a denial of plaintiff's ownership, which made the answer good against the general demurrer to the whole answer, and a demurrer to the plea of fraud impracticable. We think, however, that the plea of fraud is separately stated in the answer, and might have been separately demurred to. But, if it was not separately stated, it must be regarded as qualifying the denial, in general terms, of plaintiff's ownership, and showing that such denial meant nothing more than that the plaintiff was not owner of the goods, because the transfer from L. M. Sukeforth was void as to creditors, by reason of fraud. In which case, assuming that the fraud was insufficiently pleaded, the whole answer was demurrable, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, or that it was ambiguous, uncertain, and unintelligible. Code Civil Proc. § 444.

As to the second point. It is true, as contended by respondent, that there is no express statement in the record to the effect that he failed to object to the evidence of fraud, but we do not deem such an express statement necessary, if the fact can be clearly inferred from the statement, as we think it can. The defendant, in moving for a new trial, specified in his statement the particular grounds upon which he relied, and every specification of fact or law showed that he relied upon having proved every fact necessary to establish a fraudulent sale. He also set out the evidence to sustain his specifications, all appearing to have been received, without any objection, upon the ground that fraud had not been pleaded. If any such objection had been made, it was the right of the respondent to amend the proposed statement so as to show it, and undoubtedly he would have done so. The fact, therefore, that no objection appears to have been made is proof that there was none. To hold otherwise would destroy all the advantage of the doctrine of waiver; for, in all cases where the party had not been warned of the defects of his plea by demurrer or objection to evidence, he would be wholly unaware of the necessity of making it appear by his statement or bill of exceptions that he had not been warned, and the court would merely have saved him from one snare in order to involve him in another.

As to the third ground for denying the defendant the benefit of the doctrine of waiver, we think that the fact that he is appealing is rather in his favor than otherwise. In King v. Davis, as in all the cases in which the plaintiff was appealing, the only consequence of a reversal of the judgment on account of the insufficiency of the plea would have been a retrial of the cause upon amended pleadings; but to affirm the judgment on that ground, when the defendant is appealing, would leave him without remedy, or hope of redress. Therefore, when he is appealing in a meritorious case, in which he might prevail on a new trial under correct rulings, it would be even more unjust to allow plaintiff to object to his plea in this court for the first time than it would have been to allow the objection in the cases cited. For these reasons we conclude that the defendant is entitled to have his appeal considered on its merits.

His first proposition is that the evidence showed, without substantial conflict, that the transfer of the property in controversy by L. M. Sukeforth to plaintiff was fraudulent and void as to creditors, and that the superior court erred in not granting a new trial on that ground. It is certain that many facts were established, without any conflict in the evidence, from which the jury would have been justified in inferring a fraudulent intent upon the part of plaintiff and his brother in making and accepting the transfer; but we are not willing to say that such inference was absolutely necessary. It is, however, certain that the case was such as entitled the defendant to have the issue of fraud submitted to the jury upon instructions fully and fairly stating the law applicable thereto. This we think was not done, the court having given instructions that should have been refused or qualified, and refused instructions that should have been given. But here, again, we are met with the technical objection that the errors of the court in giving and refusing instructions cannot be reviewed, because they were not excepted to in time, or at all. The objection is based upon the following statement in the record: "After the officer had been sworn to take charge of the jury, and as the jurors were retiring, but before they were out of the court-room, counsel for the defendant stepped up to the side of the bench, and said to the court: 'I would like an exception entered to all the instructions given by the court, at the request of the plaintiff, to all the instructions asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, and to all instructions given by the court on its own motion.' The court said: 'Have any exceptions entered you desire.' Counsel said: 'Shall I have the clerk enter them?' The court replied: 'If you choose to do so.' Neither the minutes of the court, kept by the clerk, nor the reporter's notes of the trial, show that any exception to instructions was reserved or entered." This shows very clearly that a sufficient exception was taken to the written requests to charge given and refused, (McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 249; Shea v. Railroad Co., Id. 429,) though it was probably insufficient as an exception to the oral charge of the court, (Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 130, and cases there cited.) We will, therefore, consider only the exceptions to the written charges.

It was error to give plaintiff's instruction No. 15, which was as follows: "If you find a verdict for the plaintiff in this case, your verdict will be for the value of the property converted by the defendant at the time of the conversion, not exceeding the sum of $4,000, together with interest thereon from August 25, 1888, to this date, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum." The property taken by defendant was alleged in the complaint, and admitted by the answer, to be worth $4,000, and a verdict for the plaintiff could not properly have been rendered for less than $4,000, and interest. Under this instruction, the jury were allowed to find, and they did find, a verdict for less than $4,000. This does not look like an injury to the defendant, but he complains that he was injured by the instruction in this way. If the jury had been compelled to find for the plaintiff, for $4,000, or not at all, they would have found for defendant, but, being allowed to find a smaller verdict for plaintiff, they eased their consciences by a sort of compromise between what they wished and what the law demanded. We scarcely think that this would have been a ground for reversal, but as the case is to be remanded for a new trial on other grounds, and as the defendant deems himself injured by this instruction, we feel constrained to pronounce it erroneous.

It cannot perhaps be said that the first, eleventh, and thirteenth instructions are positively erroneous. They are all to the effect that a transfer of property by a debtor to one creditor in preference to others is not necessarily fraudulent. It would have been better, however, in view of the facts of this case, to have added the qualification that such transfer must be made in good faith.

The instructions asked by defendant, and numbered 4, 6, 11, and 16, were all correct and pertinent, and the refusal to give them was error, and error clearly prejudicial to the defendant. By the first, (No. 4,) the defendant sought to impress upon the jury the view that a man is guilty of fraud in doing what the law deems fraudulent, although he may not be conscious that he is committing any wrong. By the second, (No. 6,) the court was asked to instruct the jury that the acceptance by a creditor from an insolvent debtor of an amount of property largely in excess of his demand is a circumstance tending to prove a fraudulent intent. By the third, (No. 11,) the court was asked to charge as follows: "If a debtor, who is insolvent, transfer to one of his creditors all his property, except such as is exempt from execution, with an understanding or agreement between himself and his creditor that the latter will dispose of the property so transferred, and, after paying himself, refund whatever remains to the debtor, such an understanding or agreement would be a circumstance tending to show that the transfer was made with intent to delay and defraud creditors. And, where the value of the property so transferred is grossly in excess of the creditor's claim, that is a circumstance tending to show that such an understanding exists." The fourth (No. 16) contains a correct statement as to the necessity in most cases of relying upon circumstantial or presumptive evidence to prove fraud, and of the amount of proof required to establish it satisfactorily. From the character of the evidence in this case, it was important that the jury should be correctly informed on all these points, and, for the error in refusing these instructions, the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed. We see no error in the other rulings complained of. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT—POWER OF SUPREME COURT.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 652, providing, "if the judge in any case refuses to allow an exception in accordance with the fact, the party desiring the bill settled may apply by petition to the supreme court to prove the same," does not apply to a case where the trial court in settling the bill of exceptions makes amendments in the statement of the proceedings and evidence.

In bank.

Wilson & Wilson and A. L. Rhodes, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This proceeding is in the form of an original petition to this court in which it is stated (substantially) that the petitioner, Vance, was a defendant in a certain action in the court of respondent; that, judgment having been rendered against him in said action, he presented to the respondent, judge of said court, a draft of a bill of exceptions, which, it is averred, contained a true statement of the proceedings and evidence in said action; that the said judge changed the said draft by striking out certain things from its statement of said proceedings and evidence, and inserting certain other things therein, and settled said bill as so amended by him; and that the amendments made by said judge were incorrect and untrue. The prayer of the petition is that this court "will allow and settle said bill of exceptions * * * as set forth in the printed pages of this petition." The printed pages of the petition contain the entire draft of the bill of exceptions, which purports to state all the proceedings and evidence in the action referred to; and the written part shows the amendments made by the judge before the settlement. The amendments do not appear to us to be material, and yet they may have some importance which does not appear here.

If this proceeding can be maintained at all, it must be by virtue of section 652, Code Civil Proc. The language of that section is as follows: "If the judge in any case refuse to allow an exception in accordance with the fact, the party desiring the bill settled, may apply by petition to the supreme court to prove the same." Now, it seems quite apparent upon the face of this language that the petition must be based upon the refusal of the judge to allow an exception which is "an objection upon a matter of law to a decision made * * * by a court, tribunal, judge, or other judicial officer," (Code Civil Proc. § 646;) but, in the petition now before us, there is no averment or showing or pretense that the respondent refused to allow any exception whatever, or that the proceedings or evidence about which the dispute occurs had any reference whatever to any exception which he refused to allow. The petitioner, therefore, clearly fails to bring himself within the language of the section. It is argued, however, by petitioner, as it has been argued by counsel in other recent cases, that there should be no "narrow" construction given to section 652, but that this court should construe it to extend to every imaginable case where, in a statement on motion for a new trial, or (which is practically the same thing) in a long bill of exceptions covering the whole trial, there is a dispute between the attorney and the presiding judge as to what evidence had been introduced, or what in other respects had occurred at the trial. This is an attempt, without warrant in the canons of construction, to assume that the legislature meant more than it said. No interpretation can justly be called "narrow" which follows statutory language which is itself ex industria narrow. When section 652 was enacted, the general statutory law, in accordance with the inherent distinction between trial and appellate courts, was that the judge of the trial court alone should make that record which otherwise would not be record, by settling statements and bills of exceptions; and that the appellate court should act upon records as they came to it. If the legislature had intended to entirely overturn that ancient rule, and to send the appellate down into the trial court to construct for the latter an entire history of a trial there, it certainly would not have confined itself to the "narrow" language which it employs. But it evidently approached the subject with the greatest caution. It said nothing about statements on motion for new trial, or about what evidence, or what history of proceedings generally, should go into statements or general bills of exceptions; nor did it undertake to give this court general power to reconstruct such statements or bills, or determine what evidence should go into or be stricken out of them. It refers solely to a case where the judge is charged with having refused to allow an exception; that is, where a party claims that he made an "objection upon a matter of law to a decision made" by the court, and took an exception to the decision, and the court refuses to certify in a bill or statement that such an exception was taken, or that such an occurrence took place. In such a case the party may prove, if he is able, in this court, that he did take such exception, and may prove, no doubt, in that connection, sufficient surrounding facts to show what the point of exception is. If he succeeded in making his proof, his exception will be here put into a bill, certified by this court through its chief justice, and filed with the clerk below, where it will take its place among the other things which constitute the record. But when the Code speaks of an exception which the judge has refused to allow, it necessarily refers to an exception which the judge had the power to allow, and section 652 has no application except where a judge has refused to allow such an exception. If it be an evil that a statement of what evidence was introduced, made by a judge who presided over the trial, and who acts in his judicial character, and under his judicial oath, cannot be overcome by the contradictory statement of somebody else, why it must be put into that large class of evils (real or imaginary) which this court has no jurisdiction to remedy. These views are in accordance with Landers v. Landers, 82 Cal. 480, 23 Pac. Rep. 126. They are also expressly held in the recent case of Hyde v. Boyle, 24 Pac. Rep. 1059, (decided November 7, 1890,) although in the latter case it does not appear that the opinion was concurred in by a majority of the court. And, for the reasons above stated, the application in the case at bar must be dismissed.

It may be noticed that counsel for respondent raises here, for the first time, the point that section 652 is unconstitutional, for the reason that by it the legislature undertook to confer upon this court powers, and to impose upon it duties, not embraced in any of the categories of jurisdiction enumerated in that part of the constitution by which the court is created. But, as the case is already disposed of, we do not care to consider the constitutional question at this time. The prayer of the petition is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

HORN v. REITLER.

PLEADING—AMENDMENT—REFUSAL OF NONSUIT.

1. After a judgment has been reversed by the supreme court upon appeal, and the cause remanded for a new trial, the trial court may permit the pleadings to be amended whenever the ends of justice will be subserved thereby.

2. An application to amend under such circumstances is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its decision thereon will not ordinarily be disturbed.

3. Error in overruling a motion for a nonsuit, when such motion is based upon the failure of evidence to establish plaintiff's cause of action, will not avail the defendant upon appeal, provided the omitted evidence be supplied at a subsequent stage of the trial.

Appeal from district court, Jefferson county.

Suit by appellee, Reitler, as administrator of the estate of Robert Standerling, deceased, to recover certain cattle claimed by appellee, Horn, under the following written instrument: "Bailey, Colo., April 11, 1884. I hereby assign, transfer, and sell to P. C. Horn twenty-five (25) head of cattle branded 'S' to secure him for his bond, given for me in my suit against J. Carrothers in justice's court, before C. M. TAYLOR. If said costs are paid by me this bill of sale shall be void. ROBERT STANDERLING. W. W. HOOPER." In the district court plaintiff had judgment. The remaining facts sufficiently appear in the following opinion of the court, or will be found in connection with the former opinion, therein referred to.

S. T. Horn and H. C. Cassidy, for appellant. Robt. E. Foot, for appellee.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Upon the previous appeal in this case, the facts, as they then appeared upon the record, were fully set out in the statement preceding the opinion, and will not be here repeated. See Horn v. Reitler, 12 Colo. 310, 21 Pac. Rep. 186. Upon the evidence introduced at the first trial, the district court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. On review in this court, this action of the trial court was held to be erroneous, and the judgment for this reason reversed. It was then said that, under the pleadings and admissions at the former trial, the material issues to be determined were: "Did Standerling make a sale of the cattle to Horn with a condition of defeasance for a valuable consideration? * * * And did Horn acquire rights thereunder which had not been divested at the time of the commencement of the action?" The case having been remanded, a new trial was had in the district court at the November, A. D. 1889, term thereof, resulting again in favor of appellee, Reitler, as administrator of Standerling. To reverse this judgment, the cause is again brought to this court by appeal.

The first error assigned by appellant relates to the order of the court allowing plaintiff to file an amended replication. In this amended pleading, plaintiff admits the giving of the bill of sale with the condition of defeasance as set forth in defendant's answer, and alleges, by way of discharge and avoidance thereof, that the bond mentioned in said instrument was the usual cost-bond provided by statute, and that all costs in the suit mentioned which Standerling was by law required to pay had been paid by him; that he (Standerling) was the plaintiff in the suit in which the bond was given, and recovered judgment therein; and that no costs were found or adjudged against him; and that Horn, with full knowledge of all these facts, fraudulently and secretly confessed judgment for certain alleged costs in other cases, not covered by the bond. Facts are also alleged connecting the purchaser of the cattle with such fraudulent acts. The amended pleading appears to have been necessary to enable the plaintiff to fully and thoroughly present upon the trial his defense to the new matter set up in the answer, and was properly allowed. See Horn v. Rettler, supra. It is not claimed that defendant was surprised at the nature of the matters pleaded therein, and, if he had shown such surprise, this would more properly have furnished a ground for a continuance than a valid objection to the allowance of the amendments. It is the policy of the Code to allow amendments to pleadings whenever the ends of justice will be subserved thereby, and it has been repeatedly held by this court that such amendments may be permitted in the discretion of the court after one trial has been concluded and a new trial ordered. Such applications are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its decision thereon will not ordinarily be disturbed.

At the last trial, plaintiff rested his case, in the first instance, upon evidence of his ownership of the cattle on April 11, A. D. 1884, and defendant's refusal to surrender the same upon demand. At this point, a motion for a nonsuit was interposed by the defendant, based upon the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant a verdict for plaintiff. This motion being overruled by the court, an exception to such ruling was duly reserved, and error assigned thereon. The reasons given by the court for overruling the motion for a nonsuit were, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff having offered proof to show that he was the owner of the cattle on the 11th day of April, 1884, and it standing admitted by the replication that a conditional sale to the defendant was made of the property upon that day, it was incumbent upon defendant to show that the sale had become absolute. If the defendant desired to have this ruling of the court reviewed upon appeal, he should have stood upon his motion, and refused to introduce further testimony. This he did not do. Both parties thereafter proceeded with the trial in the order designated by the court, and the issue as to whether or not the bill of sale at any time became absolute was fully tried, and determined against appellant. The defendant thus waived the right to have the ruling of the court upon his motion for a nonsuit, based upon the absence of testimony, (which was afterwards supplied,) reviewed. Error in overruling a motion for a nonsuit, when such motion is based upon the failure of evidence to establish plaintiff's cause of action, will not avail the defendant upon appeal, provided the omitted evidence be supplied at a subsequent stage of the trial. Railway Co. v. Henderson, 10 Colo. 1, 13 Pac. Rep. 910; Gardiner v. Schmaelzle, 47 Cal. 588; Association v. Willard, 48 Cal. 614.

It is unnecessary to consider in detail

the remaining assignments of error. The case appears to have been fairly tried in accordance with the views expressed in the former opinion of this court. It was then determined that the conditional bill of sale was, in effect, a chattel mortgage, and, by the pleadings as amended, the case was made to turn upon whether or not Horn became liable upon his bond to the payment of costs in the case of Standering v. Carrothers. The issue was submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and decided against the appellant. The evidence seems to fully warrant the verdict. The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

ON REHEARING

(Jan. 10, 1891.)

PER CURIAM. Upon petition for rehearing, counsel for appellant urge with renewed zeal that the denial of the motion for a nonsuit by the court below was fatal error. The Code (section 166) provides that, if plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury, a judgment of nonsuit may be rendered upon motion of defendant. If the case proved by plaintiff be clearly insufficient, the court would certainly, upon defendant's motion, be justified in rendering a judgment of nonsuit. This is the doctrine announced in Behrens v. Railroad Co., 5 Colo. 400, upon which counsel place so much reliance. But it does not necessarily follow that, if the court refuse defendant's motion for a nonsuit, when plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury, the error will be such as to cause a reversal of any judgment which may thereafter be rendered in favor of plaintiff; for, if defendant elects to proceed with the trial, he does so at the risk that the defect in the proof of plaintiff's case may be supplied either by evidence given in behalf of defendant or by evidence permitted to be given by plaintiff in his original case. See Code, § 187; City of Denver v. Dunsmore, 7 Colo. 328, 3 Pac. Rep. 705; also Railway Co. v. Henderson, 10 Colo. 1, 13 Pac. Rep. 910, (cited in the original opinion.) Undoubtedly, if the defect in the proof be not afterwards supplied at the trial, the error in refusing the nonsuit is not cured; and, if repeated by a final judgment in favor of plaintiff, the judgment may be reversed, either for the original or repeated error. The other matters urged in favor of a rehearing do not require discussion. The petition for rehearing is denied.

OHIO CREEK ANTHRACITE COAL CO. v. HINDS.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—PLEADING AND PROOF—APPEAL—PRACTICE.

1. The fact that the manager of a corporation, in settling accounts between the corporation and his mother, who was engaged in boarding its officers and employees, included debts due from himself as charges against her, does not justify the corporation, after he has ceased to be its manager, to charge her with his debts without her consent, even though it is done under his direction.

2. Where the itemized statement of the account sued on gives as a single item a balance agreed on at a certain date, and the evidence sustains the item, the admission of evidence of prior balances struck between the parties is not inconsistent with the statement.

3. Where an answer is filed and the action contested, plaintiff may, where the evidence justifies it, recover judgment for a larger amount than that prayed for in the complaint.

4. Where a judgment for plaintiff is erroneous only because of the disallowance of a single item in the counter-claim, the cause may be remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the amount due after deducting said item, without a new trial.

Appeal from Gunnison county court.

Louis Boisot, for appellee.

HELM, C. J. In 1885, the appellant company was organized as a successor to the Mount Carbon Anthracite Coal Company, which at the same time ceased to exist. The husband of appellee was a director, also a member of the executive committee, while her son was the superintendent and general manager of both companies. In the spring of 1885, appellee took charge of the company's boarding-house, under an arrangement by which she was to receive from it $26 per month for each employe boarded. During the succeeding two years, she obtained, from time to time, groceries and other merchandise, as well as cash, from the company. The keeping of her accounts, and the making of her settlements, appear to have been left almost entirely to the supervision of her son. He frequently had personal obligations of his own charged to his mother's account, and, while he remained, no objection was made because of the items thus entered against her. On the 1st of June, 1887, the son terminated all connection with the company, and soon afterwards left the state. He, however, directed that all claims thereafter made by his creditors against him be charged to his mother's account. Subsequent to the date last mentioned, bills aggregating a large amount, for which the son was responsible, were thus debited. In September of the same year, the present action was brought by appellee to recover a balance due her. The company pleaded a set-off or counter-claim, exceeding in amount the sum demanded in the complaint. All of its alleged counter-claim accruing subsequent to the 1st of June, 1887, was disallowed at the trial, and appellee recovered judgment for $1,902.

The practice of the son in occasionally charging personal items of his own to appellee's account while he was the company's superintendent and general manager, in and of itself, did not warrant a continuance thereof after his connection with the company had ceased. Nor did this practice, coupled with the fact that, while such superintendent and general manager, he attended to the settlement of her accounts, establish such an agency as enabled him to bind her by an express contract to operate after his departure. The evidence indicates that he arranged with the book-keeper to close his personal account on June 1st, when he left, and to charge against appellee his personal debts thereafter accruing and presented to the company, either by himself or his creditors; but there is nothing to show that appellee assented to this arrangement, or even knew of its existence, and she expressly denies her son's authority to make it. While he was managing the company's business, and settling its accounts with her, it may have been a matter of mutual convenience to adjust certain personal items in connection therewith in the manner adopted. The son was, to some extent, acting as the agent of both parties. For a portion of the time, he kept the company's books, and always, to a greater or less extent, regulated its charges, and attended to their monthly liquidation. It requires no argument to show that the habit of sometimes settling, in connection with appellee's account, items purely personal to the son, grew out of and was mainly dependent upon the son's official connection with the company, and the consequent business relationship arising between the parties; but, when the business status thus created was wholly changed by the son's absolute withdrawal from all relationship with the company, the mother should have been consulted before an attempt was made to hold her for his future debts.

Prior to the commencement of the trial, appellant made demand, under section 63, Civil Code, for an itemized statement of the account sued on. Appellee's response to this demand contained, among other items, the following: "To board of defendant's officers and employes, as per balance struck and agreed upon on or about July 1, 1887, $1,506.01." At the trial, appellee was permitted to state that the books of the company were balanced at the end of each month, and incidentally to give the different balances thus found for the months beginning with October and ending with July. These prior balances need not have been mentioned, but the reference thereto does not sustain counsel's objection. Appellee testified that, on the 1st of July, the balance found showed an indebtedness to her of $1,506.01. In this regard she was corroborated by McDougal, her attorney. The testimony thus given directly sustains the statement rendered. No attempt was made to relate the different items constituting this particular balance. Therefore no response on our part is necessary to counsel's argument predicated upon the hypothesis that, under the general statement mentioned, appellee was permitted to enumerate different specific items, of which appellant had received no sufficient notice.

Nor was there error in rendering judgment for a larger amount than that prayed for in the complaint. An answer being filed, and appellee's claim being contested at the trial, she could recover such a sum as the evidence showed she was entitled to, regardless of the amount designated in this part of her pleading.

But among the items in the counter-claim disallowed by the court was one for $207.89, paid by the company to an employe of appellee. Appellee expressly admits that she requested the book-keeper to pay this claim. We cannot account for the court's failure to allow this credit, save upon the ground of inadvertence or mistake. For error in this particular, the judgment will be reversed, but it is deemed unnecessary to readjudicate the entire controversy. The cause will be remanded, with directions that the court below enter a new judgment for the amount due after deducting the sum mentioned. Remaining objections are not considered of sufficient importance to require notice in this opinion.

SOUTH BOULDER & R. C. DITCH CO. v. MARFELL et al.

IRRIGATION—OPTION CONTRACT—FORFEITURE.

1. A contract by which a ditch company agrees to furnish a consumer with a certain amount of water "year after year, so long as [he] shall pay the annual rental therefor," is a mere option which may be terminated by the consumer at the end of any year.

2. Causing the county commissioners to fix a rate for water from the company's ditch, and declining to pay more than such rate, is a termination of such contract, though the contract itself is not returned or canceled.

3. A provision in such contract that, upon failure to pay the annual rental, the consumer "forfeits and relinquishes all rights and claims whatsoever in and to the use of said water from said ditch," applies only to rights given by the contract, and does not waive the consumer's statutory right to obtain water from the company's ditch under an order of the county commissioners.

4. A proviso in such order that it shall not affect existing contracts does not exclude from the privileges of the order consumers who have signed such option contracts, and then terminated them by applying for the order.

5. Under the statutory provision allowing an application for such an order to be made by "any party or parties interested in procuring water," it is not necessary that all consumers using or seeking water from a particular ditch should join in the application.

Appeal from district court, Boulder county.

This cause was tried on an agreed statement of facts. Appellees, including Mitchell, were consumers of water from appellant's ditch. Mitchell made with appellant the following instrument of writing: "State of Colorado, County of Boulder—ss.: This agreement, made and entered into this fifth day of June, 1886, by and between the South Boulder and Rock Creek Ditch Company, of the one part, and Joseph Mitchell, of the other part, witnesseth: That the said company, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar, to it paid by the said Joseph Mitchell, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and for the additional annual rental of one hundred and fifty dollars, to be paid by the said Joseph Mitchell, agrees that, after reserving for its own special use one thousand inches of water out of the amount decreed it, to furnish to the said Joseph Mitchell, out of the overplus to which it is entitled by virtue of said decree, one hundred inches of water, according to the company's system of measurement, (provided always there is sufficient water in the South Boulder creek to furnish the same according to the decree rendered and priorities of ditches taking water therefrom,) upon the following conditions:

The company is to keep the ditch in good repair, and of sufficient dimensions to carry the amount of water decreed it, and to furnish to said Joseph Mitchell the said one hundred inches of water year after year, for and during the irrigation season of each and every year, so long as the said Joseph Mitchell shall pay the said annual rental therefor. And it is expressly agreed to, by and between the parties hereto, that the said Joseph Mitchell purchases and takes said interest in and to said water according and subject to the customs of consumers of water from said ditch; and that, in the event of his failure to get his full quota of water, or any part thereof, as aforesaid, by reason of a scarcity of water in said creek, and reservation of water by said company, and the respective interests of prior claimants, he will make no claim to or for a pro rata distribution of what water may be running in said ditch at such time, but will concede to all claimants and consumers of water from said ditch prior to him in point of time the full amount of their respective claims, (priorities to be numbered according to dates of agreements, and such agreement to be executed in duplicate.) And upon the failure of the said Joseph Mitchell to pay said annual rental as aforesaid, he will forfeit and relinquish all rights and claims whatsoever both against the said company and in or to the use of said water from said ditch. In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto affixed their names the day and date above written. THE SOUTH BOULDER AND ROCK CREEK DITCH COMPANY. By A. C. GOODHUE, its President. JOSEPH MITCHELL. Witness: MARY E. MILLER, Sec'y." The agreements made by the other appellees with appellant are precisely similar in general terms to the foregoing, and therefore it was deemed unnecessary to set them out in the record. Appellees received water for the year 1886, paying therefor the amount specified in the writing; but in January, 1887, they, with other landowners under appellant's ditch, petitioned the county commissioners, in accordance with the statute in that behalf enacted, to establish an annual rate of charges for the delivery of water from appellant's ditch. In pursuance of this petition, the commissioners fixed such rate at $1 per cubic inch. Appellees tendered this amount for the year 1887, but appellant refused to accept less than $1.50 per inch, as provided in the alleged agreement. Appellees paid the sum thus demanded, taking receipts, however, showing that 50 cents per inch thereof was paid under protest, and providing for refunding the same, if, in an agreed case to be brought, appellant's right thereto should be judicially denied. The present action being prosecuted in accordance with the above stipulation, judgment was duly rendered by the court below for the amount thus claimed by appellees.

HELM, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The determination of this controversy depends upon our construction of the instrument executed by the carrier (appellant) with its consumers. For present purposes, it is only necessary to consider the following principle features of the writing in question: First, the affirmative promise by appellant to deliver to its consumer a certain quantity of water annually, upon the annual payment of the specified consideration therefor; and, second, the nature and extent of the penalty affixed to the consumer's failure or omission to make this payment and receive the water. It will be observed that, in consideration of the sum of $1, the receipt whereof is acknowledged, and the yearly payment of an "annual rental" of $150, appellant promises to deliver to its consumer named in the instrument before us, for use during each irrigating season, 100 inches of water. This arrangement is to terminate at no particular time. It continues at the consumer's pleasure. There is no promise on his part to take the water for any specified period, or at all. If he declines to pay the price, and exercise the right conferred, no liability attaches for even nominal damages, and no cause of action against him, as for breach of contract, accrues. The undertaking of the company is somewhat similar to the "options," so common in this state, for the purchase of land, the consideration for which is usually a cash forfeit paid in advance. The option in the present case, however, is unlike the options mentioned, in that it provides for a continuous series of transactions. As above suggested, it runs for as many years as the consumer pays the sum named, and uses the water; it terminates whenever he fails or refuses to make the specified payment. The instrument provides substantially for a series of annual contracts. In legal effect, it extends on behalf of appellant an annual proposition, which when accepted by its consumer, becomes a contract for the current season. It is apparent from the foregoing that, in our judgment, appellees might terminate the arrangement at will. And when, in January, 1887, they caused the county commissioners to fix a rate for the delivery of water from appellant's ditch, and declined to pay the price named in the writing, they unquestionably evinced their intention to waive the option and relinquish the privileges connected therewith. It would, perhaps, have been more courteous had they first delivered up to appellant the copy of the instrument in their possession, and given formal notice of their intention to depend in future upon the statutory adjudication; but appellant received due notice of the proceedings before the commissioners, and the action of appellees in the premises was a legal abandonment of all privileges theretofore enjoyed under the agreement.

We turn to the remaining feature, above mentioned, of the writing under consideration. The provision is that, upon a failure to pay the annual delivery charge specified, the consumer "forfeits and relinquishes all rights and claims whatsoever, both against the said company and in and to the use of said water from said ditch." We deem it unnecessary to consider in the present opinion the question of public policy argued in this connection by counsel for appellees. Whether appellees could, by contract forever relinquish rights relating to water conferred upon them by the constitution and statutes we need not determine. The instrument itself, in our judgment, does not indicate any such intent. It contains no declaration that, upon a failure to accept the annual proposition, and make the annual contract, the consumer abandons all right to obtain, in any manner, water from the carrier's canal. In the absence of an express declaration or clear implication to the effect that such omission or failure should produce a forfeiture of constitutional and statutory rights existing, collateral to those provided for in the agreement, such collateral rights would, in any event, unquestionably remain undisturbed. The simple and obvious meaning of the provision is that the "rights and claims" intended to be forfeited are those mentioned by the instrument itself, viz., the consideration advanced, and the privileges therein expressly enumerated. The "said water," the use of which is relinquished, is the 100 inches specifically covered by the option. Under all the circumstances, the phraseology employed fairly admits of no other construction.

When the written instrument was executed, the statute authorizing, in pursuance of constitutional mandate, the fixing of a maximum rate by the county commissioners, embodied a proviso declaring that such action should not affect existing contracts between the carrier and consumer, or the reciprocal rights and duties of the contracting parties. The order of the county commissioners appearing in the statement of facts before us contains a similar proviso. It is ably argued by counsel for appellant that these provisos apply to appellees, and that consequently appellees belong to a class expressly excepted from the statute, and from whom the privilege of invoking action by the county commissioners, or receiving the benefit of such action, is therefore expressly withheld. To the correctness of this construction we cannot subscribe. Our view is that the legislative proviso in question, and that of the commissioners as well, relate to existing, definite, and valid contracts, binding upon both parties. They do not contemplate mere options, such as the one before us, nor compel the consumer, who is a party thereto, to make the yearly contracts provided for, or give up all claim to water from that particular canal. To say that these options were included in the excepting clause adopted by the commissioners would be to charge them with stultifying their own action; the proviso would nullify the order, so far as appellees are concerned, and the commissioners would be convicted of the absurdity imputed to them by counsel. Such a view is not called for by the letter of either the statute or order, and a reasonable interpretation fairly excludes it from the spirit of both.

We shall not discuss separately and at length the remaining specific objections presented on this appeal. In response thereto, the following brief suggestions are deemed sufficient. The inadequacy of the annual water-rate fixed by the county commissioners is a subject not properly before us at the present time. This action is simply to recover back the 50 cents per inch above such rate, paid by appellees under protest. The inadequacy of price does not appear to have been adjudicated in the court below; and, even could such matters be reviewed, a point upon which we here express no opinion, there is no data before us to furnish ground for the requisite examination. The law does not require that all consumers using or seeking water from the same carrier shall join in the petition to have the commissioners establish a maximum rate. Such application may be made by "any party or parties interested in procuring water," etc. The failure, therefore, of senior consumers from appellant's ditch to unite with appellees in the petition is a matter of no legal significance. Nor does the action of the commissioners in pursuance of the statute prevent consumers from making special contracts with the carrier regarding the rate, or from continuing under agreements already existing. If it be a fact that, by repudiation of the option, appellees forfeited the right to claim as former users from appellant's ditch, their attitude in invoking the decision of the county commissioners does not necessarily affect the questions now to be determined, for the statute permits parties having land under the carrier's canal, who have never previously been consumers therefrom, to petition for the establishment of a maximum water-rate; and take advantage thereof, if the carrier's diversion be not exhausted. In view of the foregoing discussion, it is unnecessary to further answer the objection that the action of the board of county commissioners in fixing a rate for appellees impairs the obligation of a contract. Unless we have failed to accomplish our purpose, we have shown that the writing relied on constituted an option merely, and there was, properly speaking, no contract binding upon appellees to be violated. The record does not apprise us that senior consumers from appellant's ditch suffered either actual or legal injury by the proceedings now presented for review. And it would be an unwarranted, as well as an uncalled-for, step on our part to discuss or determine questions based upon the assumption that such injuries necessarily resulted. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

COMET CONSOLIDATED MIN. CO. v. FROST.

SUMMONS—FORM—EFFECT—SERVICE ON CORPORATION.

1. A summons issued and signed by plaintiff's attorney, under Act Colo. April 7, 1885, is not "process" within the purview of the constitutional provision requiring all process to run in the name of the people, although its service is the statutory method of beginning a suit.

2. A summons which requires the defendant to answer the complaint that "will be filed in the clerk's office on the second Monday after service" thereof, fixes that day as the time when defendant must answer, and not as the time when the complaint will be filed.

3. Under the provision of the Colorado Code that service upon corporations "shall be made by delivering a copy of the summons to the president or other head of the corporation, or to the secretary, cashier, treasurer, or general agent thereof, but if no such officer can be found in the county, service may be had on any stockholder," service upon the vice-president of a corporation is sufficient, even though the return does not show that the president could not be found in the county.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Arapahoe county.

RICHMOND, C. Defendant in error, plaintiff below, instituted this action to recover the sum of $6,687.77, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the 17th day of December, 1885, evidenced by a promissory note. The proceedings in this case were based upon the act of 1885 entitled "An act to amend an act providing a system of procedure in civil actions in the courts of justice of the state of Colorado, approved March 17, 1877." In pursuance of this act a summons was issued, signed by the attorney of plaintiff, addressed to the defendant and served upon J. Granville Sharp, vice-president of the defendant company, in Denver, Arapahoe county, Colo. On the 28th day of December, 1885, a complaint was filed which is in the following words and figures: "State of Colorado, county of Arapahoe—ss.: In the district court. Henry C. Frost, Plaintiff, vs. The Comet Consolidated Mining Company, Defendant. The plaintiff complains of the defendant and alleges that on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1885, at Denver, in the county of Arapahoe and state of Colorado, the said defendant by its promissory note of that date, by it duly executed, for value received, promised to pay, to the order of said plaintiff, one day after the date thereof, the sum of six thousand six hundred and eighty-seven 77-100 dollars, with interest at ten percent. per annum until paid, and delivered said note to the plaintiff, who is now the holder and owner thereof; that although said note is long since past due, and although often requested, the said defendant has not paid the same, nor any part thereof. Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment against said defendant for the sum of six thousand six hundred and eighty-seven 77-100 dollars, with interest thereon at ten per cent. per annum from the 17th day of December, 1885, until paid, and costs of this suit. GEO. C. NORRIS, Attorney for Plff." Thereafter, on the 25th day of January, A. D. 1886, in vacation, judgment of default, and final judgment, was entered by the clerk of said district court for the full amount claimed, together with interest and costs. To reverse this judgment plaintiff in error prosecutes this writ. Appellant contends: First. That the summons heretofore recited is not in conformity with the constitution of the state of Colorado, in this, that it does not run in the name of the "people of the state of Colorado;" that it is a "process" coming within the provisions of the constitution. Second. That the summons was served on the 24th day of December, 1885; that complaint was not filed until the 28th day of December; that under and by the terms of the summons, defendant was not expected to answer until the 4th day of January, 1886, and in support of this contention it is insisted that the summons stated that the complaint would be filed in the clerk's office on the second Monday after service of summons, if served in Arapahoe county. Third. That the summons was served on the vice-president of the company, and that the return on the summons does not show that the president was not then in the county of Arapahoe, and state of Colorado. The foregoing are the principal points discussed by plaintiff in error.

As to the first point raised, that the summons is such a process as must be issued in the name of the people of the state of Colorado, we are strongly inclined to follow the conclusion of the supreme court of Florida in Gilmer v. Bird, 15 Fla. 411. In this case the identical question here presented is discussed at some length,—that is, “that the summons, as authorized by the Code, is a ‘process’ within the meaning of the constitutional provisions which require the style of all process to be the ‘State of Florida;’ that the summons had no such style; that this was essential to the validity of the judgment, there having been no appearance.” And the court said: “But is a notice given by an attorney of the institution of a suit in a form similar to a summons, but not issuing out of a court, a ‘process’ within the meaning of the constitution? Baron COMYS, in giving the definition of the term ‘process,’ says it imports the writs which issue out of any court to bring the party to answer, or for doing execution. There is no definition of ‘process,’ given by any accepted authority, which implies that any writ or method by which a suit is commenced is necessarily ‘process.’ A party is entitled to notice and to a hearing under the constitution before he can be affected, but it is nowhere declared or required that that notice shall be only a writ issuing out of a court.” In Porter v. Vandercook, 11 Wis. 70, it was held that “the summons provided for by the Code is not a ‘writ’ or ‘process’ within the meaning of the constitution, art. 7, § 17, and need not be in the name of Wisconsin,” nor tested in the name of the presiding judge, nor sealed with the seal of the court.” In Hanna v. Russell, 12 Minn. 80, (Gil. 43,) the court said: “But we think a ‘summons’ is not ‘process,’ within the meaning of section 14, art. 6, of our state constitution. It is merely a notice given by plaintiff's attorney to the defendant that proceedings have been instituted, and judgment will be taken against him if he fail to defend. This notice is not issued out of or under the seal of the court, or by the authority of the court or any judicial officer. The fact that the court acquires jurisdiction by its service does not prove it ‘process,’ for it is competent for the legislature to provide that the court shall acquire jurisdiction by the service of the complaint without a summons, or in any other manner by which the defendant may be notified that proceedings have been instituted against him.” In Bailey v. Williams, 6 Or. 71, it was held that “a summons used to bring a defendant into the circuit court is not ‘process,’ and need not run in the name of the state.” In Nichols v. Plank-Road Co., 4 G. Greene, 44, it was held that “the notice provided by the Code is not a ‘process,’ and need not be in the style of the ‘State of Iowa.’” This seems to be the generally accepted conclusion of all courts having a similar Code practice and a similar provision in the constitution, and is, in our judgment, a satisfactory determination of this question.

The contention of appellant that the summons stated that the complaint would be filed in the clerk's office on the second Monday after service of summons in the county of Arapahoe, is without foundation. The summons does not so state. The language of the summons requires him to answer the complaint which will be filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of the second judicial district of the state of Colorado on the second Monday after service thereof, fixing, in the language of the Code, the time when it was the duty of the appellant to answer the complaint, not fixing the time when the complaint would be filed in the district court. Immediately upon the service of the summons it was within the power of the appellant, defendant below, to appear and demand a copy of the complaint. This he could have done at the time of the service or any time thereafter before the second Monday. The summons was served on the 24th; the complaint was filed on the 28th of December; all of which in our judgment was in strict conformity with the provisions of the Code. The second objection, therefore, in our opinion, is wholly untenable. Judgment was not taken until after the second Monday after the service of the summons, the second Monday occurring on the 4th of January, and judgment was rendered on the 5th of that month.

The third objection, that the summons was served on the vice-president and not upon the president, and that the return of the officer or person serving the summons does not show that the president was not within the county, is equally untenable. The provision of the Code providing for service upon corporations is as follows: “If the suit be brought against a corporation, service shall be made by delivering a copy of the summons to the president or other head of the corporation, or to the secretary, cashier, treasurer, or general agent thereof; but if no such officer of the corporation can be found in the county, service may be had on any stockholder of such corporation.” The language of this provision admits of service upon any of the officers enumerated therein, president or other head of the corporation, the secretary, cashier, treasurer, or general agent. Certainly the vice-president comes within the provisions of this section. If service had been made upon a stockholder we are clearly of the opinion that ere a judgment of default could have been entered the return should show that none of the officers above enumerated were within the county where service was to be had. Service upon the vice-president, in our judgment, was amply sufficient, and no certificate is necessary by the party making the service to the effect that the president did not reside in the county. The Illinois case cited by plaintiff in error is not in point, because the statute referred to in that case is not similar to the provisions of our Code above recited. It was within the power of plaintiff in error to have met all of these questions in the court below by motion to vacate the judgment if the company had a meritorious defense to the action. This it did not see proper to do, and for this reason we are not inclined to favorably consider such objections here. The other errors assigned not having been urged need not be considered. The judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

REED and BISSELL, CC., concur.

(No. 2,618.) BOARD COUNTY COM'RS LINCOLN COUNTY v. SAME. (No. 2,619.) BOARD COUNTY COM'RS KIOWA COUNTY v. SAME. (No. 2,640.)

COUNTIES—APPORTIONMENT OF DEBT—INTEREST.

1. Where a new county is created out of a county having a debt, under an act providing that the commissioners of the new and of the old counties "shall have full power and authority to adjust and settle all matters of revenue proper to be done on account of the formation of said county, and also to apportion the indebtedness of said counties," the new county is liable for its share of the existing debt, without making any deduction on account of cash in the treasury of the old county, or of unpaid taxes due to it.

2. Such new county is liable in present to the old county for its share of the debt, though part of the debt is not due.

3. Claims against the old county which are the subject of pending litigation, and the validity of which is denied by said county, cannot be included in the debt to be apportioned.

4. Under Act Colo. March 22, 1889, fixing the rate of interest, in the absence of special agreement, at 8 per cent., a judgment fixing the rate of interest in such case at 10 per cent. is erroneous.

Appeal from district court, Bent county.

These three cases were consolidated for the purposes of the argument in this court, and will be disposed of together. The cases, which are numbered respectively 2,618, 2,619, 2,640 here, were tried below upon an agreed statement of facts, and involve the same questions of law. The controversies arose over the adjustment of certain matters of revenue between the counties of Cheyenne, Lincoln, and Kiowa, appellants, and the county of Bent, appellee, consequent upon the creation by the seventh general assembly of the former, in part, out of the territory up to that time included in the latter. The counties of Prowers and Otero, also formed out of the county of Bent at the same legislative session, do not appear to be in any way interested in the present controversy. The agreed statement of facts in cause No. 2,619, in so far as the same is material to the present controversy, is, in substance, as follows: First. It appears from the assessment roll of said Bent county for the year 1888 that the taxable property of said county for said year amounts to the sum of $7,800,149. Second. The value of taxable property in said county of Bent included within the boundaries of the present county of Kiowa for said year is $1,244,381. Third. The value of taxable property in said county of Bent included within the present county of Lincoln for said year is $402,692. Fourth. The value of taxable property in said county of Bent included within the present boundaries of the county of Cheyenne for said year is $1,390,838. Fifth. The books and accounts of the county of Bent show the total gross indebtedness or liabilities of Bent county on the 13th day of April, 1889, to be the sum of $181,403.96, and that said total amount includes certain items the validity of which as a charge against said defendants is controverted by the above-named defendants. At this point, these controverted claims are set forth, and numbered respectively from 1 to 7, the claims above numbered 3, 4, and 5 being now in suit in the district court of Bent county, Colo., in three certain actions therein pending, entitled "The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company v. The Board of County Commissioners of Bent County;" "The Prairie Cattle Company v. The Board of County Commissioners of Bent County;" and "J. C. Coad v. The Board of County Commissioners of Bent County,"—all of which said actions are being defended by said Bent county; and the files in said causes may be referred to and are made a part of this stipulation for the purpose of enabling the court to determine whether said claims legally constituted part of the indebtedness or liabilities of said Bent county on said April 13, 1889. Sixth. That on the 13th day of April, 1889, the cash in the hands of the county treasurer of Bent county to the credit of the several funds amounted to the sum of $22,705.67. Seventh. That on the 13th day of April, 1889, there was due to said Bent county delinquent and unpaid taxes for the year 1887, amounting to the gross sum of $7,270.66, and for the year 1888 taxes amounting to the gross sum of $35,297.96. Eighth. And it is further stipulated and agreed that the 13th day of April, 1889, shall be taken as the date of the settlement or apportionment between the county of Bent and all of the three above defendant counties. Ninth. The defendants above named conceded the correctness of the amount of the gross indebtedness or liabilities of Bent county as above specified on the 13th day of April, 1889, with the exception of the items hereinbefore numbered respectively 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and the plaintiff, Bent county, asserts that all said items, controverted as aforesaid by defendant counties, are proper to be estimated in arriving at the total amount of the gross indebtedness of Bent county on said date. Tenth. The defendant counties above named claim that, in making the apportionment of their proportion of the indebtedness of Bent county, on the date above specified, there should be deducted from the gross amount of the indebtedness of said Bent county (1) the sum of $22,705.67, cash in the hands of the treasurer of said county, and (2) the amount of delinquent taxes due said Bent county on said date, amounting, in the aggregate, to the sum of $42,568.62, which said claim, upon the part of the defendant counties, is controverted by the plaintiff county claiming that said defendant counties are not entitled to any part of the cash in the hands of the treasurer of Bent county on said date, nor to any part of the delinquent taxes due to Bent county on said date.

Upon the statement of facts, and the exhibits mentioned therein, the court made certain findings. Of these the following were specifically excepted to: "Fourth. The court further finds that all the cash in the hands of the treasurer of Bent county to the credit of the several county funds on the 13th day of April, 1889, amounting to the sum of $22,705.67, belongs to and is the property of said Bent county, and not subject to apportionment between it and said county of Cheyenne. Fifth. That all delinquent taxes unpaid and owing to the said county of Bent on the 13th day of April, 1889, amounting to the sum of $42,568.62, belong to and are the property of said Bent county, and not subject to apportionment between it and said county of Cheyenne." The court further found that the plaintiff, Bent county, was not entitled to include as part of the liabilities or indebtedness of said county, and to collect from the defendant county, its proportion of the claim specified in subdivisions 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7 of paragraph 5 of said agreed statement of facts, and disallowed the same, to which said finding and disallowance the plaintiff county, by its attorney, excepted. And thereupon the court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, in accordance with said findings, for the sum of $21,567.31, with interest thereon at 10 per cent. per annum from April 13, 1889, and costs of suit. Similar judgments, but varying in amounts, were entered in each of the other cases.

A. B. McKinley, W. T. Rogers and M. B. Gerry, for appellants. Caldwell Yeaman, for appellees.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The district court found that the cash in the hands of the treasurer of Bent county at the date of the creation of the new counties, and the delinquent taxes at that time due Bent county, belonged to, and were the exclusive property of, said county, and judgment was entered accordingly. Appellants question the correctness of these findings and judgment. They say the new counties are entitled to have deducted from the gross indebtedness of Bent county an equitable share of the cash fund, and a ratable proportion of the delinquent taxes, and that the balance then remaining represents the indebtedness which is to be apportioned under the statute. And the failure of the court below to so decide is the basis of the assignment of error in this court. In the case of Washington Co. v. Weld Co., 12 Colo. 152, 20 Pac. Rep. 273, it is said: "In the absence of a restrictive constitutional or statutory provision on the subject, when a new county is created by segregating a portion of the territory belonging to an existing county, the old county retains all assets previously owned by it, including rights of action, funds, and other personal property; also all real estate held in proprietary right, save such, if any, as may be within the territory taken away. It likewise remains bound by its existing contracts, and is subject to the burden of discharging all existing obligations and liabilities. The new county receives none of the assets, and assumes none of the burdens." The reasons for these conclusions, as well as the authorities relied upon in support thereof, are given in the opinion. In that case the counties of Washington and Logan had been carved out of the territory formerly included in the county of Weld, and it appeared that at the time of the creation of the new counties there was a surplus fund of $60,000 in the treasury of Weld county. The new counties claimed the right to share in this surplus, which claim was denied. The court, being of the opinion that there was nothing in the constitution nor in the act creating the new counties changing the common-law rule, decided that the new counties were not entitled to any part of the surplus funds of the old county. The correctness of these conclusions is not disputed by appellants, but a distinction between the case then before the court and the present cases is attempted to be made. Such distinction finds no substantial foundation in any dissimilarity between the statute then under consideration and those now controlling. The statutes are practically the same. And it is not claimed that the constitution has since been changed. The distinction relied upon grows out of the fact that in the former case there was a surplus and no liabilities, and in the present there is both a surplus and liabilities. The argument is that the indebtedness of the old county to be apportioned between it and the new counties is not the sum of $120,955.01, as found by the court below, but this sum less the cash in hand and the amount of the delinquent taxes. We cannot accept this view. The term "indebtedness" has a fixed and well-understood meaning. "Indebtedness" is defined by Anderson in his Law Dictionary as "the condition of owing money; also the amount owed." "Indebtedness. The state of being in debt, without regard to the ability or inability of the party to pay the same." Bouv. Law Dict. It is unnecessary to multiply authorities to show that "indebtedness" is not synonymous with the term "net wealth," as claimed by counsel. By a familiar canon of constructions, we are required to presume that the word "indebtedness" is used in the statute in its popular sense. Moreover, in the present instance, we have convincing proof that the legislature which created appellant counties had in view the distinction between "indebtedness" and "surplus," from the fact that it was repeatedly called upon to legislate in reference thereto in the creation of the numerous counties brought into existence at the same session. Among the new counties formed by that legislature were Yuma, Morgan, Phillips, and Sedgewick. In each of the various acts creating these counties the legislature made specific provision for these very matters, the omission of which from the acts controlling the present controversy is made the more noticeable. The nature of these provisions will be more fully shown later, in connection with the claim for a division of, or a credit for, the delinquent taxes. In the absence of legislative provision therefor, we can see no reason for making a distinction between cash in the treasury where there is an indebtedness and such cash where there is no indebtedness. In either case, the statute being silent, under the decision in Washington Co. v. Weld Co., supra, the fund remains the property of the old county. In reference to the equities of the claims of the old and new counties to this fund, judicial opinions are not in harmony. Should it be conceded, however, that the greater equities are in favor of the new counties, the result cannot be changed for this reason. The courts cannot undertake to add provisions not found in the statute for the purpose of preventing an apparent hardship. Cooke v. School-Dist. No. 12, 12 Colo. 453, 21 Pac. Rep. 496, 719; Hampshire v. Franklin, 16 Mass. 85; Laramie Co. v. Albany Co., 92 U. S. 307.

The reasons for disallowing the new counties a share in the surplus fund in the treasury of Bent county apply with reference to the uncollected taxes. Undoubtedly it was competent for the legislature to have given the new counties the taxes previously assessed upon the property within the territory set off to them, but, in the absence of legislation changing the rule, it has been repeatedly held that the old county alone retained the right to the taxes assessed previous to the division. This applies as well to taxes upon property set off to the new county as to those levied upon property remaining within the boundaries of the old county, and, when collected, they will belong to the latter. It is claimed, however, that in the present instance the statute is not silent. Authority to apportion the delinquent taxes is sought in the following provision of section 10 of the act creating Cheyenne county: "The board of county commissioners of the said counties of Bent, Elbert, and Cheyenne shall have full power and authority to adjust and settle all matters of revenue proper to be done on account of the formation of said county of Cheyenne, and also to apportion the indebtedness of said counties of Bent and Elbert, as specified in section nine (9) of this act." And similar provisions are to be found in the acts by which the counties of Lincoln and Kiowa were created. Should we assume that the legislature intended by these provisions to provide for a division of the delinquent taxes, the act is fatally defective, because no basis for such distribution is provided. A careful consideration of the act in connection with other acts passed at the same time by which other counties were created, leaves no doubt, however, that the authority conferred upon the county commissioners "to adjust and settle all matters of revenue proper to be done" has no reference to the delinquent taxes due Bent county. In the acts by which the counties of Yuma, Morgan, Phillips, and Sedgewick were respectively created, the same delegation of power to the commissioners to settle all matters of revenue, etc., is to be found. And yet in each of these instances the section conferring such power is immediately preceded by a section providing for the distribution of the cash on hand in the treasury of the old county, and the delinquent taxes thereafter to be collected. In the act creating the county of Phillips out of the county of Logan the section is as follows: "Sec. 12. All moneys now in the treasury of said county of Logan, and all moneys which may hereafter come into the treasury of said county from the taxes of the year 1888 and previous years, together with all moneys arising from the redemption of lands sold for taxes of the years 1887 and 1888, and bid in by the said county of Logan, and from all other sources of revenue, shall be apportioned between the counties of Phillips and Logan, in proportion to the valuation which the taxable property of that portion of Logan county which is now included within the boundaries of Phillips county bears to the taxable property of Logan county, as shown by the assessment rolls for the years 1887 and 1888." If the argument of appellants to the effect that the cash on hand and the delinquent taxes are to be apportioned under the provision for the adjustment of revenue is to prevail, it will, in effect, render section 12 in the Phillips county act, and similar sections in other acts, entirely superfluous and idle. To this conclusion we cannot yield our assent. In our opinion, the legislature was acting advisedly in these matters, in the belief that section 12 was necessary in cases where a division of the funds and delinquent taxes became proper. We cannot, therefore, disturb the findings and judgment of the district court by which it was determined that the delinquent taxes, as well as the cash in the treasury of Bent county, remained the property of that county after as well as before the division.

The court below entered judgment against appellant counties for their respective proportions of the indebtedness of Bent county, although a portion of this indebtedness had not at the time matured, and this is assigned for error. There was no error in this. The debt was fixed by the legislature so far as the new counties are concerned, and a judgment in present might properly be entered under the statute.

In determining the amount of the indebtedness of Bent county for the purposes of the apportionment, the district court disallowed a number of claims filed against Bent county. The rejection of such claims is made the ground of appel-lee's cross-errors. The majority of these claims did not constitute an indebtedness against Bent county at the time of the taking effect of the act creating the new counties, and were therefore properly rejected; the acts creating the new counties providing only for the apportionment of "the present indebtedness." And, as to the claims for excess of taxes paid to Bent county by the Pueblo & Arkansas Valley Railroad Company and others, there is no sufficient data before this court upon which the claims can be allowed. It appears that these matters, as well as the claim of J. C. Coud, were at that time in litigation in independent suits, and we are referred to the pleadings in those actions for further information. An examination of these pleadings shows the causes to be at issue for trial, certain facts being alleged upon the one side, and denied upon the other. In this state of the record, the claims were properly disallowed by the district court.

The only substantial error appearing upon this record is in reference to the rate of interest as fixed by the court below. Under the act of March 22, 1889, which went into effect 90 days thereafter, the rate of interest, unless otherwise agreed, is fixed at 8 per cent. per annum. For error in this regard, the judgment will be reversed, with directions to the district court to modify the same by fixing the rate of interest in accordance with the statute.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. June 24, 1890.)

COUNTY COURTS—JURISDICTION IN OKLAHOMA.

Section 9 of the organic act of Oklahoma territory declares that the judicial power shall be vested in "a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace." Section 11, among other things, extends Const. Neb. art. 6, §§ 15, 16, and Comp. Laws Neb. c. 20, relating to "probate courts," to Oklahoma until after the adjournment of the first session of its legislature, and provides that the "county courts" and justices of the peace shall have the jurisdiction authorized by that chapter, except that justices' jurisdiction shall not extend to cases involving over $100, and "county courts," shall have jurisdiction in all cases involving more than $100. Const. Neb. art. 6, § 15, provides for the election of county judges, and section 16 gives them general probate jurisdiction, "and such other jurisdiction as may be given by general law;" but provides that in civil actions their jurisdiction shall not extend to cases involving more than $1,000. Comp. Laws Neb. c. 20, § 2, on probate courts, gives the county judges concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in all civil cases not involving more than $1,000 exclusive of costs. Held, that congress intended to establish "county courts" in Oklahoma with the same probate and civil jurisdiction as the county courts in Nebraska, and therefore a county court has jurisdiction of a civil suit for a money demand of $310.

County No. 1. Application for writ of prohibition.

Horace Speed, for applicant. H. S. Cunningham, John Fastor, T. H. Soward, and T. A. Sears, for defendants.

GREEN, C. J. This is a petition for a rule on Charles A. Berger, as county judge of the first county of the territory of Oklahoma, to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue against him as judge of the county court of said county, prohibiting him taking jurisdiction in a certain suit pending in said county court wherein the defendant W. W. Barberick is the plaintiff and the petitioner William M. Allison is the defendant. The defendants waive the service of the rule to show cause, enter their appearance, and interpose a demurrer to the petition. The petition alleges "that on the 13th day of June, 1890, one W. W. Barberick appeared before Charles A. Berger, then claiming to act as a county judge in said territory, and filed a complaint against this petitioner, charging that this petitioner is personally indebted to said Barberick in the sum of, to-wit, $310, which sum was justly due, and for which sum demand had been made, and payment thereof refused, and praying judgment against this petitioner in the sum of, to-wit, $310; that thereupon said Charles A. Berger issued under his hand as county judge within the territory of Oklahoma a paper purporting to be a writ issued by him as such county judge, in the name of the territory of Oklahoma, and directed to the sheriff, or any constable of said county, commanding that this petitioner be notified that he had been sued by said Barberick in the county court for the first county, and that unless this petitioner answer by the 7th day of July, 1890, the petition of said Barberick, now filed in the office of said court, would be taken as true, and judgment rendered accordingly, and directing the summons be returned on or before June 26, 1890; that upon the back of such paper, purporting to be a writ, is the statement, in writing, that if this petitioner fail to appear and answer judgment will be taken for $310 with interest thereon, which said statement is signed by said Charles A. Berger, subscribing himself as county judge. Petitioner would further show that such complaint, writ, and proceedings thereon do not arise out of any matter pertaining or properly belonging to a probate court, but are wholly matters which, if cognizable in any court, are merely founded upon a money demand for indebtedness, and are only cognizable in the district court of this territory. Petitioner therefore asserts that said Berger has no authority to issue such writ or paper as a county judge, and is not, speaking with propriety, a county judge, but is the judge of the probate court within and for the first county of said territory, having the powers and jurisdiction of a probate court, and not the powers and jurisdiction of a county court. This petitioner therefore prays that this court issue a rule requiring said Charles A. Berger to show cause, if any he can, why the writ of prohibition should not issue from this court, directing that he shall proceed no further in the cause or matter hereinbefore stated, and, until such showing is had, this petitioner prays a rule requiring said Berger to proceed no further in such cause or matter; and that upon the hearing, the court make the rule of prohibition absolute and perpetual." The petition is duly verified by the affidavit of the petitioner, and the questions arising upon the demurrer have been ably and fully argued, both for and against the awarding of the writ of prohibition: and the jurisdiction of this court to award a writ of prohibition, in a proper case, has not been questioned.

The contention on behalf of the petitioner is that, under the organic act and laws of the territory of Oklahoma, there is no such court as a county court, and no such officer as a county judge having jurisdiction in actions at common law, or having any jurisdiction other than that which properly pertains to and is exercised by a probate judge and a probate court; and the whole controversy turns upon the construction to be given to the act of congress organizing the territorial government of the territory of Oklahoma. The provisions of the fundamental law which is the constitution of the territory of Oklahoma, so far as they relate to the county judge and the county court whose jurisdiction is challenged, may readily be brought together, and are found in sections 9 and 11 of the organic act, and in those parts of the constitution and laws of the state of Nebraska which are extended to and put in force in the territory of Oklahoma. Section 9 provides "that the judicial power of said territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace. The supreme court shall consist of a chief justice, and two associate justices, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum. They shall hold their offices for four years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and they shall hold a term annually at the seat of government of said territory. The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of the probate courts and justices of the peace, shall be as limited by law: provided, that justices of the peace, who shall be elected in such manner as the legislative assembly may provide by law, shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy, when the title or boundaries of land may be in dispute, or when the debt or sum claimed shall exceed one hundred dollars; and the said supreme court and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction, and authority for redress of all wrongs committed against the constitution or laws of the United States, or of the territory, affecting persons or property." Section 11 provides "that the following chapters and provisions of the Compiled Laws of the state of Nebraska, in force November first, eighteen hundred and eighty-nine, in so far as they are locally applicable, and not in conflict with the laws of the United States or with this act, are hereby extended and put in force in the territory of Oklahoma, until after the adjournment of the first session of the legislative assembly of said territory: * * * Sections fifteen and sixteen of article six of the constitution of said state, and of chapter twenty of said laws, entitled 'Courts—Probate.'" "The supreme and district courts of said territory shall have the same powers to enforce the laws of the state of Nebraska, hereby extended to and put in force in said territory, as courts of like jurisdiction have in said state, but county courts and justices of the peace shall have and exercise the jurisdiction which is authorized by said laws of Nebraska: provided, that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in said territory shall not exceed the sum of one hundred dollars, and county courts shall have jurisdiction in all cases when the sum or matter in demand shall exceed the sum of one hundred dollars." Sections 15 and 16 of article 6 of the constitution of the state of Nebraska provide: "Sec. 15. There shall be elected in and for each organized county one judge, who shall be judge of the county court of such county, and whose term of office shall be two years. Sec. 16. County courts shall be courts of record, and shall have original jurisdiction in all matters of probate, settlements of estates of deceased persons, appointment of guardians, and settlement of their accounts, in all matters relating to apprentices, and such other jurisdiction as may be given by general law. But they shall not have jurisdiction in criminal cases in which the punishment may exceed six months' imprisonment, or a fine of over five hundred dollars; nor in actions in which title to real estate is sought to be recovered, or may be drawn in question; nor in actions on mortgages or contracts for the conveyance of real estate; nor in civil actions where the debt or sum claimed shall exceed one thousand dollars." Section 2 of chapter 20 of the Compiled Laws of the state of Nebraska, entitled "Courts—Probate," provides: "County judges, in their respective counties, shall have and exercise the ordinary powers and jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and shall, in civil cases, have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in all civil cases, in any sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, exclusive of costs, and in actions of replevin, where the appraised value of the property does not exceed that sum; and the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, relative to justices of the peace, shall, where no specified provision is made by this subdivision, apply to the proceedings in all civil actions prosecuted before said county court."

It will be readily perceived that in the organic act, and in the parts of the constitution and laws of the state of Nebraska which are extended to, and put in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, the designations, "probate courts," and "county courts," and "county judge," and "probate judge," are used; and in this apparent confusion, and indiscriminate use of names, we are required to ascertain, if possible, the intention of the law-making power, and such intention must control in the construction of these seemingly conflicting provisions. Such is the well-settled and well-defined rule of law for the construction of legislative enactments, and written constitutions, in all cases of doubt or uncertainty in the language used; and we are required also to examine all the provisions of the organic act, and the provisions of the constitution and laws of the state of Nebraska, which are extended to, and put in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, and which are in pari materia, and, from a view of the whole, to arrive at the true intention of each part, and of the whole of such parts. Cooley, Const. Lim. 68-70; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 194. That congress did not intend to create two courts, one called a "probate court," and the other a "county court," in each organized county of the territory of Oklahoma, having exactly the same jurisdiction in probate matters, and the one presided over by a judge called a "probate judge," and the others, by a judge called a "county judge," can admit of no doubt; for to do so would be an act of stupidity and imbecility on the part of congress, and we cannot adopt a construction of the organic act that will lead us to such a conclusion. But it is clear from a consideration of the organic act, and the provisions of the constitution and laws of the state of Nebraska, which are extended to, and put in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, that congress did intend to create a court in each organized county of the territory, having and exercising the same jurisdiction in probate, civil, and criminal matters that the court, known as the "county court," in the state of Nebraska, has and exercises under the constitution and laws of that state; and that the judge of such court should be known as and styled a "county judge."

At the time of the framing and passage of the organic act, congress must have known, and did know, that there was no court in the state of Nebraska constitutionally styled a "probate court;" for, by the first section of article 6 of the constitution of that state, from which article sections 15 and 16 are taken, it is provided that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, county courts, justices of the peace, and in such other courts, inferior to the district courts, as may be created by law for cities and incorporated towns. And, as congress intended to extend a part of the laws of that state to, and put them in force in, the territory of Oklahoma, sections 15 and 16 were selected, which provide for a county judge and a county court, so that there might be perfect harmony between the court and the law of the court, until after the adjournment of the first legislative assembly. This view of the case is sustained by the provision in the last paragraph of section 11 of the organic act, that the "supreme and district courts of said territory shall have the same power to enforce the laws of the state of Nebraska, hereby extended to, and put in force in, said territory, as courts of like jurisdiction have in said state." And any other view than that congress intended to create the office of county judge and a county court, in each of the organized counties in the territory of Oklahoma, renders absolutely nugatory the provisions of sections 15 and 16 of article 6 of the constitution of the state of Nebraska, and they have been extended to and put in force, as a part of the territorial law, for no purpose whatever. As section 9 of the organic act, in distributing the judicial power of the territory of Oklahoma, provides that it shall be vested in a "supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace," it is contended, with much earnestness and ability, that there can be no such court as a county court, for the reason that the courts named absorb the whole judicial power, and that there is no residue of judicial power to be vested in a county court, and that all other courts are excluded by those named, by an application of the maxim, expressio unius, est exclusio alterius; and, in support of this proposition, the case of Ferris v. Higley, 20 Wall. 375, is cited. That was a case arising in the territory of Utah, and involved the single question whether or not the probate court had jurisdiction in that particular case. The organic act of that territory provided that "the judicial power of the territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace." A statute of the territorial legislature enacted that "the several probate courts, in their respective counties, have power to exercise original jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and as well in chancery as at common law, when not prohibited by legislative enactment; and they shall be governed in all respects by the same general rules and regulations, as regards practice, as the district courts." It was held that this act of the territorial legislature was in conflict with the organic act, and, therefore, void. But no act of the legislative assembly of the territory of Oklahoma is involved in this controversy, as all the provisions of the organic act emanated from congress; and the power of congress to enact the different provisions of the organic act of the territory of Oklahoma has not been and cannot be called in question.

But it is claimed that there is an irreconcilable conflict between the provisions of section 9 and section 11, in this: that section 9 provides for a probate court, while section 11 provides for a county court; and that, in this instance, the provisions of section 9 must control, as having been first agreed to by congress. If such conflict be conceded,—and as to whether there is such a conflict or not we express no opinion,—then the provisions of section 11 must control the provisions of section 9, so far as they are in conflict, as having been last agreed to by congress; and this is a rule of construction clearly stated in the authorities. Mr. Sedgwick says: "So again it is said if the latter part of a statute be repugnant to the former part thereof, it shall stand, and, so far as it is repugnant, be a repeal of the former part, because it was last agreed to by the makers of the statute. And this principle has been declared by the supreme court of New York. So, in Pennsylvania, it has been said that, in cases of irreconcilable repugnancy, the rule is to let the last part determine the intention of the law-giver." St. & Const. Law, 353; Harrington v. Trustees, 10 Wend. 547; Packer v. Railroad Co., 19 Pa. St. 211.

As to the jurisdiction of the county court, it is objected that, as to all sums and matters in demand which exceed $100, by the provisions of the last paragraph of section 11 of the organic act, its jurisdiction is absolutely unlimited; and this fact is emphasized to show that congress did not intend to create such a court. This objection arises from a misapprehension of the provisions of the law in relation to the jurisdiction of the county court. If there were no other provision than that contained in the last paragraph of section 11, its jurisdiction as to all sums and matters in demand in excess of $100, would seem to be unlimited, but when the provisions of section 16 of article 6 of the constitution of the state of Nebraska, and section 2 of chapter 20 of the Compiled Laws of that state, which are extended to and put in force in the territory of Oklahoma, are considered, the jurisdiction of the county court will be found to be limited to the sum of $1,000, exclusive of costs.

One other point has been urged as bearing upon the intention of congress to create a county court, and that is that no provision is made for a review of the judgments of the county court by appeal to the district court. An examination, however, of a few sections of the Compiled Laws of the state of Nebraska, which are in force in the territory of Oklahoma, will disclose the fact that ample provision has been made for an appeal from the county court to the district court. Section 2 of chapter 20 provides that "county judges, in their respective counties, shall have and exercise the ordinary powers and jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and shall in civil cases have concurrent jurisdiction with the district court in all civil cases in any sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, exclusive of costs; and, in actions of replevin, when the appraised value of the property does not exceed that sum, and the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to justices of the peace, shall, where no specified provision is made by this subdivision, apply to the proceedings in all civil actions prosecuted before said county court." And when we turn to the provisions of the Civil Code referred to, we find the following: "In all cases, not otherwise specially provided for by law, either party may appeal from the final judgment of any justice of the peace to the district court of the county where the judgment was rendered." Section 1006. And the following sections provide the time within which an undertaking must be filed, and the amount and conditions of such undertaking, and for the certifying and filing of a transcript of the proceedings in the district court. We have no hesitancy in reaching the conclusion that an appeal will lie from all judgments of the county court in civil actions to the district court of the territory of Oklahoma, as that court, by the last paragraph of section 11 of the organic act, is given the same power and jurisdiction to enforce the laws of the state of Nebraska, which are extended to and put in force in this territory, that courts of like jurisdiction have in that state. As the county court, therefore, has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit mentioned in the petition, the demurrer is sustained, and the rule to show cause is discharged, and the writ of prohibition is denied.

TERRITORIES—CRIMINAL LAW.

Section 10 of the organic act of Oklahoma provides that persons charged with any crime in the territory may be arrested by the United States marshal, or any of his deputies, but in all cases the accused shall be taken for preliminary examination before a United States commissioner, or a justice of the peace for the county. Held, that a United States commissioner had authority to commit petitioner upon a charge of assault to the custody of a United States marshal, notwithstanding section 11 of the organic act puts in force in Oklahoma the Nebraska laws providing for the arrest and commitment of persons charged with crimes and offenses.

C. B. Freeman and C. W. Kerns, for petitioner, Horace Speed, for the Territory.

SEAY, J. This is a case in which the petitioner, A. H. Halley, presented a petition to the Honorable E. B. GREEN, a judge of the first judicial district of the territory of Oklahoma, in which he alleges that he is unlawfully held and restrained of his liberty, at the city of Guthrie, in said territory of Oklahoma, by W. S. Lurty, the United States marshal of said territory, by virtue and authority of a commitment issued by W. M. Allison, a United States commissioner, in and for the first judicial district of said territory; that said petitioner was apprehended on a warrant issued on a complaint made before said commissioner by one E. M. Bamford, charging the petitioner with having unlawfully and feloniously assaulted him (said Bamford) with the intent to inflict upon him great bodily injury, contrary to the statute, and against the peace and dignity of the United States; that the petitioner was, on the 13th day of June, 1890, examined before said commissioner and held to answer said charge of assault with intent to do great bodily injury before the district court, at Guthrie, on the first Monday in September, 1890. Petitioner then alleges the illegality of his imprisonment to consist in this, to-wit: That the crime charged is an offense against the laws of Nebraska extended over this territory by the act of congress giving it a territorial government, and is not an offense known to or against the laws of the United States; that said W. M. Allison, commissioner, as aforesaid, had no "power or authority or jurisdiction" over said offense, and that said Lurty, United States marshal, had no authority, under said warrant, to restrain said petitioner of his liberty. Whereupon said judge caused a writ to be issued to said Lurty, United States marshal, commanding him to bring the body of said petitioner before said judge at Guthrie, on the 17th day of June, together with the cause of his detention and restraint. In obedience to said writ, said marshal brought said prisoner before said judge, making return that he held said petitioner in default of bail by virtue and authority of a commitment from United States Commissioner Allison as heretofore stated. The supreme court, of which said judge is chief justice, then being in session, the case was by him adjourned into the supreme court for hearing. See section 368, c. 34, p. 1068, Comp. St. Neb. There is no question of fact, nor plea of not guilty, nor excuse, nor extenuation set up in the petition for the crime charged. It is contended for the petitioner that the United States commissioner had no authority to hear or commit, and the United States marshal had no authority to hold or restrain the petitioner for a crime committed under the laws of Nebraska, which were put in force here by the organic act of the territory, but that the authority is conferred exclusively on what counsel calls the "local territorial courts and officers."

The question presented is one of power of jurisdiction, and is the only question to be decided in this case. It involves the legal relations of territories to the parent government. A territory is merely an inchoate state. Its people are not sovereign. Its organic act takes the place of a constitution. "The government of the territories belongs primarily to congress," and "during the term of their pupillage as territories they are mere dependencies of the United States. * * * All political power exercised therein is derived from the general government." Territories are spoken of by Judge BRADLEY as "dependencies," and "the extent of their power depends upon the organic act in each case." Snow v. U. S., 18 Wall. 317. This was a case in which the legislature of Utah, under authority of the territorial organic act, had created the office of attorney general for Utah territory, and a question arose between that officer and the United States attorney for said territory as to who should appear and prosecute crimes committed against the territorial laws. Judge BRADLEY, who delivered the opinion, said this was an anomalous case; that, "strictly speaking, there is no sovereignty in a territory of the United States except the United States itself. Crimes committed therein are committed against the government and dignity of the United States. It would seem that indictments and writs should regularly be in the name of the United States, and that the attorney of the United States was the proper officer to prosecute all offenses." But after stating that the practice had been different, and that "there is no necessary conflict between the organic act and the territorial laws of Utah, he concludes that as the practice has been supported by long usage, and as the entire matter is subject to the control and regulation of congress," it is his duty, under the circumstances, to declare the territorial act valid. This had the effect to oust the United States attorney general from prosecuting crimes committed under territorial laws. In Hussey v. Smith, 99 U. S. 20, the court held that while the marshal, created by the territorial laws, had the right to serve process, and make sales of land, under judgments of the court, held under the territorial laws, yet, when such process was served and sales made by the United States marshal, his acts were upheld on the ground that he was a de facto officer, and his acts, as such, were as valid and binding as if he had been an officer de jure. The court says: "An officer de facto is not a mere usurper, nor yet within the sanction of the law, but one who, colore officio, claims and assumes to exercise official authority; is reputed to have it, and the community acquiesces accordingly." So under the authority here quoted even if the acts of the marshal and commissioner complained of were only acts of officers de facto, the promotion of good government, in the punishment of crime, would induce us to sustain those acts. But we hold that they acted as de jure officers.

It seems from the scope of the argument in this case that some fear is entertained that the court may drift too far towards centralization, and claim more power for federal officers and United States courts than is consistent with the full recognition of the rights of the people to control their own local affairs, in their own way. On this point, it is enough to say that we give hearty assent to the doctrine laid down by Chief Justice CHASE, in Clinton v. Englebrecht, 13 Wall. 434, in which he uses the following comprehensive language: "The theory upon which the various governments for portions of the territories of the United States have been organized has ever been that of leaving to the inhabitants all the powers of self-government, consistent with the supremacy and supervision of the national authority, and with certain fundamental principles established by congress." If, after what has been said, any one should doubt the authority of the commissioner to examine and bind the prisoner, or the marshal to imprison and restrain him of his liberty, let him examine section 10 of the organic act,—the constitution of the territory. That section provides that "persons charged with any offense or crime in the territory of Oklahoma, * * * may be arrested by the United States marshal, or any of his deputies, wherever found in said territory; but in all cases the accused shall be taken for preliminary examination before a United States commissioner, or a justice of the peace of the county." Observe the language: "Any offense or crime in the territory of Oklahoma." We cannot conceive how the jurisdiction of the commissioner or marshal can be longer questioned.

But it is said that section 11 of the organic act puts the chapter of the Nebraska statutes concerning crimes in force here. So it does, "so far as they are locally applicable, and not in conflict with the laws of the United States and this act." While it may be conceded that under the Nebraska statute the petitioner might have been arrested by a sheriff, and taken before a justice of the peace for preliminary examination, and if held to answer an indictment might, in default of bail, have been remanded to the custody of the sheriff, to be by him safely kept, till the grand jury examined and disposed of the case, this would in no wise affect the power ex-exercised by the commissioner and marshal in this case, under the authority conferred on them by the tenth section of the organic act. For the foregoing reasons, the petitioner is remanded to the custody of Warren S. Lurty, United States marshal for the territory of Oklahoma, to be by him dealt with according to law. The other justices concur.

1. A writ of mandamus cannot be issued when the motion is not based upon an affidavit as required by Code Civil Proc. Neb. § 649, which was extended to Oklahoma by section 11 of the organic act.

Mandamus.

Huston & Hamilton, for plaintiff. Horne Speed and H. S. Cunningham, for defendant.

CLARK, J. The plaintiff complained that on the 22d day of May, 1890, she was arrested by the United States deputy-marshal on a warrant issued by William M. Allison, a United States circuit court commissioner, district of Kansas, and exercising jurisdiction in the territory of Oklahoma, charging her with converting the sum of $310 in money, which she had in her possession as bailee, the same being the property of one W. W. Barberick; that said United States officers took from her the said sum of $310, which was delivered to the defendant, Allison; that on the 27th day of May, 1890, the said defendant William M. Allison, sitting as an examining magistrate, found that there was no probable cause to believe that this plaintiff was guilty, and thereupon dismissed said criminal action and discharged this plaintiff; and that said defendant, William M. Allison, although requested to deliver said money to the plaintiff, Nettie Collett, refused and still refuses so to do. The plaintiff prayed for an alternative writ of mandamus requiring said defendant to pay the same over to the plaintiff in this action, or show cause why he does not do so. This is one of those extraordinary remedies resorted to in cases where the usual modes of procedure cannot furnish the desired relief, and should be commenced in the name of the sovereign power on complaint of the aggrieved party. The statute requires that the motion for a writ must be based upon an affidavit. Comp. St. Neb. p. 945, § 649. The petition in this case cannot on this hearing be treated as an affidavit. The verification does not arise to even that degree of proof.

The statute further prescribes that this writ may not be issued in any case where there is a plain and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law. Page 945, § 646. This is the general rule recognized by all courts. Not only does the petitioner fail to negative the idea that the plaintiff has any other mode of redress, but it is apparent that she has an adequate legal remedy by an action at law against the defendant, William M. Allison, when an issue can be joined and tried by a jury. State v. Mayor, etc., 4 Neb. 260; State v. School-Dist., 8 Neb. 98. The petition is therefore denied.

1. Comp. Laws Ariz., (Crim. Code § 363,) requiring, in criminal cases, that the charge "shall be in writing signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the defendant consent in open court for the charges to be given verbally," is not complied with by charging orally, and filing after verdict what purports to be a copy of the charge given.

2. Accused is not put twice in jeopardy by a new trial granted on a reversal of a judgment on his application.

Appeal from district court, Pima county. Coles Bashford, for appellant. J. E. McCaffry, for the Territory.

PER CURIAM. At the October term of the district court, sitting in and for the county of Pima, the defendant and appellant was indicted and tried and convicted of the crime of murder, committed by killing one Felipe Garcia, on the 6th day of June, A. D. 1870, and was thereafter sentenced to be hanged. Subsequently an appeal was taken to this court from the judgment, and the warrant for the execution of the accused stayed. No exceptions to the proceedings before, at, or after the trial are noted in the transcript. No motion was made for a new trial, and no statement upon the appeal accompanies the judgment roll. Accompanying the judgment roll is what purports to be the written charge of the court, but it is conceded that the charge to the jury was given orally, and not read to the jury, and that the written charge attached to the judgment roll was not placed with the papers until some time had elapsed after the trial. It is not signed by the judge, nor does it appear to be filed with the papers in the case, as required by section 363<sup>2</sup> (Comp. Laws) of proceedings in criminal cases. The minutes of the court before us do not show that the defendant waived a written charge, and it is conceded that such waiver was not made by the defendant at the trial. The defendant's counsel asks us to set aside the judgment for this and other causes noticed in his brief.

It is unnecessary, as we think, that the court should examine and pass upon the points insisted on as error. We have before held that the failure of the judge to give his charge to the jury in writing, unless such written charge be waived by defendant, as provided by the statute, is error, and entitles the accused to have the judgment set aside; and we have seen no good reason to depart from the decision we have so made.

The question has been raised before us, and elaborately argued by counsel, whether, upon the reversal of the judgment in this case, the defendant is entitled to be discharged, or whether a new trial should be awarded, and it has been argued that he is shielded from being again tried for the offense of which he was convicted by the provision contained in article 5 of amendments to the constitution of the United States. It is unnecessary to review the authorities upon this point, or even the cases cited by counsel. The majority of the court are of the opinion that when a conviction has been had in a criminal case, and judgment has been rendered, and the judgment is reversed on application of the accused, on the ground of error at the trial, he is not shielded by the constitutional provision cited from being tried anew for the same offense; in fact, that no trial such as the law contemplates has been had, and that he has not been in jeopardy in the sense in which the term is used in the constitutional provision cited. We are of the opinion that judgment in the case should be reversed for the cause hereinbefore expressed, and a new trial had in the district court of the county from which the appeal was taken, and it is so ordered.

INSTRUCTIONS—ORAL CHARGE.

It is error to deliver the charge to the jury orally, without the consent of the accused, though it had been reduced to writing before delivery, and is filed with the papers in the case some days after the trial, under Comp. Laws Ariz., (Crim. Code, 368,) providing that the charge shall be in writing, signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the accused consent in open court to the charge being given orally.

Appeal from district court, Pima county.
J. E. McCaffry, Atty. Gen., for the Territory.

TWEED, J. The defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of robbery in the district court for Pima county at the October term for the year 1871. The appeal is from an order of that court overruling a motion for a new trial, to which order the defendant, by his counsel, excepted. The error complained of, or so much thereof as we deem it necessary to consider, appears in the statement signed by the judge who tried the cause, and is to the effect "that the charge of the court to the jury was delivered orally," the defendant not having waived in open court his right to a written charge. It appears from the record that a written charge, purporting to be the charge given by the court, was filed some days subsequent to the trial. Upon the argument of the cause before us, it was, we think, claimed that the charge was in fact reduced to and was "in writing" when delivered, but it was conceded, that the charge was not read to the jury. The case stands in this regard precisely as did the case of Territory v. Duffield, 1 Ariz. 58, ante, 476, which has been decided at this term. Since the opinion in that case was prepared, his honor, the chief justice, has submitted to us a dissenting opinion therein. We have examined this dissenting opinion carefully, and with great deference to the learning and judicial experience of the chief justice, but it fails to convince us that the conclusions arrived at by him are correct. That portion of section 368 of proceedings in criminal cases governing this matter reads as follows: "The charges of the court to the jury shall be in writing, signed by the judge, and filed with the papers in the case, unless the defendant consent in open court for the charges to be given verbally." Comp. Laws, p. 137. The provision is a most important one to a party charged with crime. It enables him, upon a motion for a new trial or upon appeal, to reproduce the exact language of the charge, and to assign error, if the charge is legally objectionable, with a degree of precision and accuracy impossible to be attained when the charge is given verbally. Nothing is left to the recollection of the court or the counsel in the cause. If a rigid adherence to this provision of our statute should defeat the ends of justice in any particular case, it is to be regretted; but, however this may be, the rights which it secures to a defendant in a criminal action may not be denied him. The filing with the papers in the case of a written charge conforming as nearly as possible, according to the recollection of the judge, to the charge verbally given, is in no sense a compliance with the law. Exactness, certainty, entire and complete accuracy, as to the whole charge, is what the law aims at, and this in the interest of the accused; and it seems to us that this certainty cannot be so well attained in any other manner as by reading the charge to the jury, and we have no doubt that this is what the law requires to be done. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

St. at Large, p. 145, § 19,) provided that the act should not be construed to prevent trade or intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of citizens of the United States. The act of 1834, § 29, provided that the repeal of the act of 1802 should not affect it so far as it related to Indian tribes east of the Mississippi river. The organic act of New Mexico provided that the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable should have the same force and effect in the territory as elsewhere in the United States, and this provision was, by Organic Act Ariz. § 2, made applicable to that territory. Held, that section 19 of the act of 1802 was extended to the territory of Arizona by its organic act.

REAVIS, J., dissenting.

C. W. C. Rowell, for appellant. J. E. McCaffry, for respondent.

TITUS, C. J. This proceeding was instituted July 29, 1871, by petition and information, in the district court of the first judicial district of Arizona, for the condemnation of certain merchandise therein described, alleged to have been forfeited, and seized as such June 20, 1871, near the reservation of the Pima and Maricopa Indians, by Capt. Frederick E. Grossman, special Indian agent, on a charge of illegal traffic with the said Indians. On the 21st of October last, William Richard & Co. were, on their petition and claim as sole owners, permitted to defend the said property from the decree of condemnation thus prayed for; and they having filed their bond for $7,000, the value of the property, with sufficient sureties, the case proceeded. The property in contest, including a barrel of whisky, was alleged in the information to have been seized on the Indian reservation above mentioned. This allegation, however, was afterwards found to be erroneous, and was abandoned, as appears by the stipulations filed and of record in the present case, which stipulations admit the conclusions of fact on which the judgment of the court below was prayed; it being therein stated by the attorney for the United States, as well as by the attorney for the claimants, "that the place of business of William Richard & Co., wherein the goods against which this action was brought were seized, was and is off the limits of the described Indian reservation, very close to the southern boundary of said reserve,—in fact, within a few feet of the line; and that the lands outside the said Pima and Maricopa reservation are open to survey and pre-emption, including the place of seizure." The deposition of the said Capt. Grossman, referred to in the stipulations filed, was agreed in open court, on the hearing below, to be dispensed with as containing nothing but what was and is of judicial notoriety, "except that the articles alleged in the information and the said deposition mentioned as on storage shall be, for the purposes of this trial, considered as in transitu only." It may be added as of public notoriety here that the lands thus described in the records as "outside of the Pima and Maricopa reservation," and "including the place of seizure," have been partially surveyed, and are now occupied, cultivated, and improved, under the authority of the United States, by American and Mexican residents, either citizens, or seeking and awaiting citizenship under our laws; that the lands recently proposed to be annexed to the said reservation alone contain, as appears from authoritative reports made by congress, 25 of these American and Mexican residents, and that the whole valley of the Gila river, including the place of seizure, round it, and outside of the reservation, is better settled with permanent residents, excluding Indians, than any other rural portion of Arizona. The store of the claimants, where the merchandise in controversy was seized, is near the principal highway from Tucson to Fort Yuma; and it is also matter of public notoriety here that claimants carry on an active trade, not only with the residents on Gila river, but also with travelers by the said road.

On the part of the United States, it was alleged upon the hearing of this case in the court below—First, that all the territory of the United States west of the Mississippi river, with little, if any, exception, is Indian country; second, that no one can lawfully trade therein with an Indian or Indians without a license from some Indian superintendent or agent; and, third, that the claimants, William Richard & Co., having traded with the Pima and Maricopa Indians without such license, the merchandise seized as above stated and described is forfeitable, and ought to be condemned. The district court, after argument upon record of the case, refused the decree of condemnation prayed for. An appeal was taken from its judgment to this court on behalf of the United States, and the errors alleged in the judgment of the court below on the argument of the appeal, though not formally presented in this court, were the denial of the three propositions above cited, and the omission of that court to certify that there was probable cause for the seizure of the property in controversy.

It has been conceded by all, in every stage of this case, that congress has power to dispose of and make all useful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property, and regulate commerce with the Indian tribes of the United States. Congress has, to a considerable extent, exercised both these powers. It is not necessary to inquire whether congress has exhausted the whole of these two classes of powers in its legislation thereupon; it is quite sufficient for the present case to determine whether or not it has passed any law which authorizes us to condemn the property in controversy. No other class of ordinary federal legislation is so full of pains, penalties, and for feitures as that which regulates trade and intercourse with the Indians; aposteriori, therefore, this court cannot be too cautious in declaring where and to whom it applies. Throughout this whole case the United States has relied on the congressional act of June 30, 1834, (4 U. S. St. at Large, 729,) especially its first section, as entitling it to a decree for the forfeiture of the property in controversy. That section is as follows: "That all that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the states of Missouri and Louisiana, or the territory of Arkansas, and also other parts of the United States east of the Mississippi river, and not within any state to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, for the purposes of this act [shall] be taken and deemed to be the Indian country." This provision must be regarded as a description, by the highest legislative authority, of what an Indian country is. Its special purpose is declared, as in and by no other, to be "for the purposes of this act" itself, so it says,—however, whenever, and wherever it applies and extends. This declaration shows the place of operation of every pain, of every penalty, of every forfeiture, of every license, and of every prohibition which the law authorizes concerning trade and intercourse with Indians. And in this statute, as well as in those since enacted, the limitation "Indian country," as here declared, is the place, and no other, to which all their consequences, whether lenient or severe, are applied. A brief analysis of this provision will show us what it comprehends. Its purpose was, obviously, to declare what an Indian country should be thereafter. The limitation employed is, "to which the Indian title has not been extinguished." This was and is the badge of law to show an Indian country to all mankind. The territory, then and since, that could abide this test was the Indian country, and no other. Section 2 of the same act proceeds to apply this test. It is as follows: "No person shall be permitted to trade without license with any of the Indians." Where? In the Indian country. Section 3 allows an Indian superintendent or agent to refuse license to a person of bad character, because it would not be proper for him to reside—where? In the Indian country. Section 4 forfeits the goods of the man who, without license, resides as a trader, or introduces goods, or trades—where? In the Indian country. Such is the limitation throughout this whole act. All its penal consequences are referred to the Indian country. The same limitation is preserved in later acts. The act of June 14, 1858, (11 St. at Large, 363,) authorizes the marshal to employ a posse comitatus, not exceeding three persons, in any of the states, respectively, to assist in executing process by arresting and bringing in prisoners from the Indian country. The act of March 15, 1864, § 1, (13 St. at Large, 29,) makes it penal for any person to sell, exchange, give, barter, or dispose of any spirituous liquors or wine to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or to introduce the same into any Indian country.

Thus by an analysis of our laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians the conclusion is reached that an Indian country, as declared by the first section of the act of 1834, is one "to which the Indian title has not been extinguished;" that there it is that a license is required to enable the citizen to trade with the Indians, and that in the Indian country, as thus described, apply the pains, penalties, prohibitions, and forfeitures declared by our acts, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians.

The venerable maxim of legal construction, expressio unius, est exclusio alterius, which thus ordains that where in a statute one or a few of a class of particulars are enumerated, it must be taken that all the rest of this class not enumerated are intended to be excluded from its operation, impels to the conclusion that in no other than the Indian country, as described by the act of 1834, is a license required to enable the citizen to trade with the Indians, and that in no other do the pains, penalties, prohibitions, and forfeitures denounced by the laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians apply at all.

On this conclusion alone the condemnation prayed for in this case might be denied. The magnitude of the question involved, however, it is submitted, requires a more exhaustive examination of the law; and, by a different mode of investigation, and of a different class of legal provisions, the judicial mind is carried to the same conclusions. The act of 1834, already examined, was the consummation of more than 50 years of tentative Indian legislation; the act of 1802 of 13 years of similar legislation, under the constitution. The act of March 30, 1802, (2 St. at Large, 145,) provides: "Sec. 19. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any trade or intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States." The same provision is found in the act of July 22, 1790, (1 St. at Large, 137,) in the act of March 1, 1793, § 13, (1 St. at Large, 331,) and in the act of May 19, 1796, § 19, (1 St. at Large, 474,) which was the last act on the subject preceding that of 1802, from which the citation under immediate consideration is taken. In reference to this provision, the act of 1834 thus provides in its repealing clause: "Sec. 29. That such repeal shall not affect the intercourse act of 1802, so far as the same relates to or concerns Indian tribes east of the Mississippi river." Why, it may be asked, was this reservation in the act of 1834 made in favor of the states and citizens east of the Mississippi river? It was because they comprised great numbers of citizens settled around Indians upon lands of their own or those of the United States, which the federal government did not mean should be embarrassed by the monopolies of license in their trade with the Indians or others. The act of 1834, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians, is to some extent the result of the then recent cases of American Fur Co. v. U. S., 2 Pet. 358; Cherokee Nation v. State of Georgia, 5 Pet. 1; and Worcester v. State of Georgia, 6 Pet.

517,—the last of which was decided in the supreme court of the United States only two years before the passage of the act of 1834. At the date of the act of 1834, there were but two organized territories east of the Mississippi river,—Michigan and Florida. In these, however, and as well in the vast domain west of that river, large and ever-increasing communities of citizens had settled and were settling around Indian settlements, on land of their own or those of the United States; and it was to prevent these, and other similar ones sure to arise, from being cramped and embarrassed in their trade and intercourse, that the Indian country was, by the act of 1834, circumscribed to territory "in which the Indian title had not been extinguished."

The protection and improvement of the Indians has been a cherished policy of the United States. Not less so has been the settlement of the public domain by citizens, its organization and development as territories, and their final admission into the Union as states, co-equal with those already there. The laws regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians are the offspring of both branches of this policy, and any construction of these laws which excludes either branch of this policy from its consideration must be vicious. The act of 1834, (section 29,) we have seen, limited, to the states east of the Mississippi river, the act of 1802, (section 19,) which allowed free "trade and intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States." The act of 1802, though thus limited, has never been repealed. After the passage of the act of 1834, the first territory established was Wisconsin, organized April 20, 1836, and the last was Wyoming, organized July 26, 1868. In the organic act of each of the 15 territories established since the act of 1834 will be found a provision substantially, if not literally, as follows: "That the constitution and the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect in said territory as elsewhere in the United States." This is the provision on the subject in the organic act of New Mexico, which, with its legislation at the date of our organic act, was, by the second section of our organic act, made applicable to the territory of Arizona. The only test provided, relative to the laws of the United States, is their applicability to the territory of Arizona. The laws of the United States which are applicable to Arizona have the same force and effect here as elsewhere. Is the nineteenth section of the act of 1802, allowing free trade to citizens of the United States settled around Indians, and limited to the east of the Mississippi by the twenty-ninth section of the act of 1834, applicable to Arizona? If so, then it must govern the present case. Still further. The act of February 27, 1851, § 7, (9 St. at Large, 587,) is as follows: "All the laws now in force regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, or such provisions of the same as may be applicable, shall be, and the same are hereby, extended over the Indian tribes in the territories of New Mexico and Utah." By the act of August 4, 1854, § 1, (10 St. at Large, 575,) the territory now comprised in Arizona was annexed to New Mexico. The law regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians was therefore the law of Arizona, so far as applicable, for more than eight years prior to its organic act of 1863, (12 St. at Large, 664,) and would have so remained after its organization as a territory, without a special provision on the subject. The question then occurs, is section 19 of the Indian intercourse act of 1802 in force in this territory? Mere inspection, it is submitted, shows it is so applicable, by all the exigencies that made it universal in 1802, and applied it east of the Mississippi river after 1834. In this territory there are settlements of citizens on land their own, or so to become, unaffected by any Indian title, and around Indian settlements. The store of William Richard & Co., where the controverted property was seized, is in one of these citizen settlements. It cannot be for the benefit of either the Indians or citizens, under such circumstances, to compel the one class to buy of some monopolist, relieved of all competition by his license, or to compel the other to purchase licenses before they can sell to an Indian or Indians, who choose to purchase where they can do so the cheapest or the best.

The conclusion therefore is that William Richard & Co. required no license to enable them to trade with the Indians outside of any Indian reservation, or land unaffected by Indian title; and that the property controverted in this case, seized, as it was, on neither, is not forfeitable by reason of their not having such license. To prevent misconception, it may not be improper to state some limitations on some of the terms used above, and some of the conclusions reached. An Indian title is one of mere occupancy, possession, or use subject to the right of pre-emption in the United States. An Indian country is a portion of territory subject to an Indian title, inhabited by Indians. A mere solitude, or a country without Indians, could hardly be considered an Indian country, even if their title, which is merely possessory, could survive the absolute absence of its beneficiaries. An Indian reservation may be defined to be a certain limited portion of our national domain, assigned by the federal government to a tribe or tribes of Indians, or some part or parts of the same, to be held by them according to the terms of the assignment. An Indian reservation and an Indian country are so far legal equivalents that the laws of the United States regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians apply alike to both. Licenses to trade in either are grantable by an Indian superintendent, agent, or subagent. The act of March 15, 1864, § 1, (13 St. at Large, 29,) makes it an offense equally penal, to sell, exchange, give, barter, or dispose of any spirituous liquors or wines to any Indian under the charge of any Indian superintendent or Indian agent appointed by the United States, or to introduce the same into the Indian country. This conclusion is supported by the following cases: American Fur Co. v. U. S., 2 Pet. 358; U. S. v. Holliday, and U. S. v. Haas, 3 Wall. 407.

To enable a person to buy or sell the live-stock of an Indian beyond the Indian country or an Indian reservation, a license is necessary. No license can anywhere legalize selling liquor to Indians. U. S. v. Holliday, and U. S. v. Haas, 3 Wall. 407. License cannot authorize the purchase, by one not an Indian, of the arms or clothing, or implements of labor, or domestic utensils, of an Indian or Indians.

It is not pretended or alleged that the claimants in the present case, or any of them, have sold, or offered to sell, liquor to the Indians, or that they have infringed any of the other provisions of our Indian intercourse laws, or that they have indulged in any unconscionable practices with the Indians, or with others. On the contrary, it is a matter of public notoriety here that they have done much to advance agriculture among the Indians, and in the neighboring settlements, by the importation and distribution of seeds, as well as by other similar services.

The certificate of probable cause in this case was withheld by the judge of the court below because nothing appeared in the case to show any probable cause for the seizure of the property in controversy. By the act of congress concerning frauds on the revenue of March 2, 1799, (1 St. at Large, 696,) it is provided (section 89) that in prosecutions for seizures under that act, "if it shall appear to the court before whom such prosecution shall be tried that there was reasonable cause for such seizure, the said court shall cause a proper certificate or entry to be made thereof," etc. If no probable cause appears in any case, such as this, for the seizure of the property in controversy, the judge is not justifiable in making such certificate or entry. No such cause appearing in the present case, the certificate was properly omitted. Nothing appearing in this case to show that the property in controversy was at any time within an Indian reservation or in an Indian country, or that there was any probable cause for the seizure of the said property, or that the claimants have, in any particular, infringed the laws of the United States regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians, or any of the said laws, the decree of the district court of the first judicial district of Arizona, made in this case, is hereby affirmed, and the certificate of probable cause is refused.

TWEED, J., concurred.

REAVIS, J., (dissenting.) I regret that I am unable to concur with the majority of the court in the opinion just read, and I proceed to give my reasons for such dissent. The grave importance of the subject-matter of the cause at bar in my judgment demands the most careful examination possible, to the end that a just conclusion may be arrived at in the premises touching the legal rights of the parties interested and to be affected by the determination of the questions at issue. In the month of June, 1871, the agent appointed by the government for the confederate tribes of Pima and Maricopa Indians seized the goods in question, which are claimed by William Bichard & Co., for an alleged violation of the intercourse laws of the United States regulating trade and commerce with the Indian tribes. The information filed in the court below recites, among other things, that the illicit trade with the Indians was and had been carried on by the claimants on the reservation set apart for the tribes mentioned; but the stipulations of counsel upon which the case comes into this court disclose the fact that claimants' place of business was off, but very near to,—say a few feet from,—the southern boundary of the reservation. There is nothing in the record, however, to show that the claimants knew before the date of the seizure that their store-house stood on the outside of the reservation boundary, nor does it appear that they became aware of its exact locality until a survey of the original lines of the reservation was had, at their own instance, after the seizure had been made. But this is not a material question for the purposes of this inquiry, and I pass it by for the present.

The points decided by the majority of the court, as I have been able to gather them from the opinion of the chief justice, who delivered the judgment of the court, are, substantially: (1) That the seizure of the goods of claimants was unlawful and unauthorized, for the reason that the place where they were stored and kept was outside of the Indian reservation; (2) that the act of 1834, in its operation, is limited to that portion of the public domain of the United States where the Indian title has not been extinguished; (3) that an Indian reservation and an Indian country "are so far legal equivalents that the laws of the United States regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians apply alike to both;" in other words, for the purposes of the intercourse laws mentioned, it is Indian country on the inside of the reservation lines, and not such on the outside, and that, whereas it would be a violation of the act of 1834 to trade with the Pima and Maricopa Indians on the inside of the lines of their reservation without a license, it would not be if the trade with the same Indians was had on the outside; (4) that the intercourse act of 1802 is in full force in this territory, and especially the nineteenth section thereof, allowing free trade and intercourse between Indians on a reservation and citizens settled on lands around them; (5) that William Bichard & Co. require no license to trade with citizens on the outside of any Indian reservation, on land unaffected by Indian title, and that the property seized is not forfeitable on account of their omission to obtain one to trade with the Indians; (6) that the certificate of probable cause was properly withheld, because nothing appeared in the case to show any probable cause for the seizure of the property.

The foregoing propositions furnished the premises from which the conclusions of the court appear to be drawn, but I shall not consider them exactly in the order I have mentioned them.

It is nowhere denied that congress has the power, under the constitution, to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes inhabiting any portion of the public domain of the United States; nor is it denied that this power has been exercised to the extent necessary to meet the exigencies of the relative situation and condition of the government and the Indians every year since the adoption of the constitution. The faith of the government has always been pledged for the protection of those tribes with whom it has entered into treaty stipulations, or one to whom its intercourse laws have been extended, regulating trade and commerce therewith. In the case of Cherokee Nation v. State of Georgia, Chief Justice MARSHALL, who delivered the opinion of the court, held that an Indian tribe or nation within the United States is not a foreign state, "within the meaning of the second section of the third article of the constitution." In the same opinion the learned jurist held that the Indians were in a state of pupillage. "Their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian. They look to our government for protection, appeal to it for relief to their wants, and address the president as their great father." It therefore follows that the relation of these tribes to the general government is marked by "peculiar distinctions," in the regulation of trade and intercourse, "which exist nowhere else." The first section of the intercourse act of 1834 defines what was known as the Indian country at that day, west of the Mississippi river. That designation, with the exception of the states of Missouri, Louisiana, and the territory of Arkansas, comprehended the whole of the possession of the United States west of the Mississippi. The territory over which that law was to have its operation had been acquired by the United States from the republic of France by treaty of cession at Paris, April 30, 1803, the sixth article of which treaty provides: "That the United States promises to execute such treaties and articles as may have been agreed between Spain and the tribes and nations of Indians, until, by mutual consent of the United States and the said tribes or nations, other suitable articles shall have been agreed upon." The act of 1834, and all subsequent treaties made with the Indian tribes inhabiting such territory, were enacted and made in pursuance of the treaty of cession of 1803, which practically recognized and secured to the Indians some sort of title to the soil, which the United States has from time to time extinguished by purchase under treaties for that purpose. The twenty-ninth section of the act of 1834 repealed the act of 1802 so far as its operation was concerned with reference to the Indians living west of the Mississippi river, but continued it in force over those east of it.

I cannot agree with the majority of my brethren of the bench that any subsequent legislation on the part of congress has resuscitated that act, so as to make it operative everywhere within the jurisdictional limits of the United States. The act of congress of 1851, extending all the intercourse acts, not locally inapplicable, over the Indians inhabiting the territories of

New Mexico and Utah, does not, by necessary implication or otherwise, revive the act of 1802 for the purposes of such extension. There is nothing in the act of 1851, or any other act on the same subject, in my judgment, to indicate such an intention on the part of the national legislature. I conclude, therefore, that the act of 1834, and the acts amendatory thereof, are the only laws in force in this territory on the subject of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes residing herein.

That portion of the territory in which is located the Pima and Maricopa reservation was acquired from the republic of Mexico by treaty in 1854, known as the "Gadsden Treaty," in which no provision is made respecting any Indian tribes who might be living here at the time. So the status of all such Indians must depend upon existing laws, in so far as the question of trade and intercourse with them is concerned. These laws have already been referred to, and the question recurs, how far are they locally applicable to the Arizona tribes, and what operation did the congress intend they should have in the matter of regulating trade and commerce with them? There is no pretense set up that these Indians occupy an analogous position, with reference to the soil of the country here, to those who resided in the Indian country designated in the act of 1834; and the question of Indian title can have no weight in the determination of the question at issue in this case. The act of 1834 is sufficiently described in its title, viz.: "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace, on the frontier;" and in the first section it expressly declares, after giving a description of certain territory, that such territory, so described, with the exceptions therein mentioned, "for the purposes of this act, be taken and deemed the Indian country." What were the purposes of that act? The question is fully answered in the title just given. The territory mentioned therein was Indian country for no other purpose than for the regulation of trade with the Indians, and its operation everywhere must be uniform to that extent.

I agree with the learned chief justice who wrote the opinion of the court in this case that we cannot very well have an Indian country without the bodily presence of Indians; and where we have such Indians, whether they have submitted themselves to the control of the government, or occupy a hostile attitude thereto, the matter of trade and intercourse with them in either capacity must be regulated by the existing laws provided for the purpose. All the decisions on the subject pronounced in the supreme court of the United States agree that the various intercourse acts passed from time to time by congress have been intended to protect the Indians against fraud and deception, and to regulate trade and commerce with the various tribes, upon the broadest principles of equity and justice. To that end, those localities inhabited by Indian tribes have been carved into convenient districts or superintendencies, and a suitable person selected by the president of the United States for each of such districts, who, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, is appointed to superintend the affairs of the Indians in the particular districts; and for each individual tribe an agent is selected in the same manner, and these officers must report to, and are directly under the control of, one of the political departments of the government, known as the "Department of the Interior," which is charged with the execution of all the laws having reference to Indian affairs. These officers are required to give ample bonds for the faithful performance of their duties, as prescribed by law, among which is the selection of proper persons to act as traders with the Indians, who are licensed for that purpose, and give bonds conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties imposed by law, and to obey all such rules and regulations in the premises as shall from time to time be prescribed by the head of the department referred to. There has been a superintendent of Indian affairs provided for Arizona, and there are agents for the confederate tribes of Pima and Maricopa Indians, with whom the illicit trade complained of in this cause was carried on; and these officers were in the active discharge of the duties of these several offices at the time the seizure of the goods in question was made. There were also at the same time licensed traders, duly appointed and qualified to trade with these Indians. These traders are called "monopolists" by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in this case, and he assumes that the act of 1834 was passed in consequence of the decisions in the cases of American Fur Co. v. U. S., Cherokee Nation v. State of Georgia, and Worcester v. State of Georgia, in none of which have I been able to find doctrines in support of the assumption. The language of the act itself makes it very clear that, while congress believes the provisions of the act of 1802 were ample for the purposes of trade and intercourse with the Indians east of the Mississippi, they were not deemed sufficient for the purpose in the case of the Indians on the west side of that river. All the states of the Union at that time, except two, lay between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic ocean, and the act of 1834 was intended to operate upon those Indians inhabiting the territory mentioned in the first section thereof.

The majority of the court hold that, inasmuch as the trade complained of, and the seizure of the goods in consequence thereof, all took place outside of the reservation, per se the trade was not unlawful, but the seizure of the goods was. Is it true that the government and the laws afford no protection to the Indians outside of the lines of the reservation? Does the authority to regulate trade, traffic, or commerce extend no further than the boundaries of such reservation? In the case of U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. 407, the supreme court said that, if commerce or traffic or intercourse is carried on with an Indian tribe, or with a number of such tribes, it is subject to be regulated by congress, although within the limits of a state. The locality of the traffic can have nothing to do with the power. The right to exercise it in reference to any Indian tribe, or any person who is a member of such tribe, is absolute, without reference to the locality of the traffic, or the locality of the tribe, or the member of the tribe with whom it is carried on. The same doctrine was held in the case of U. S. v. Haas, 3 Wall. 407.

I have no doubt of the power of the agents of the government to prevent any person from trading with Indians under their charge unless specially authorized by law to do so, and this, whether on or off the Indian reservation. Whether the goods of the offender would be liable to seizure will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case, but that such agents have the power to make such seizure for a violation of the intercourse act I have equally no doubt. In this case the certificate of "probable cause" should have been issued. Its issuance is not a matter of discretion of the court, to be exercised at pleasure; and to withhold it in this case is error. It is for the protection of an officer of the government, when acting officially, in pursuance of what he conceives to be the law, or under orders from his superior officer. In either case he is entitled to the certificate. For these reasons, I cannot concur in the opinion and judgment of the court.

BOND OF POSTMASTER—ACTION—ANSWER BY SURETIES.

1. In a suit on the bond of a postmaster, the time for answering having expired, it is not error to refuse to allow the sureties to file an answer setting up that he is entitled to a credit not given him in his account with the government, unless it appears that the sureties will be able to prove that a claim for the credit has been presented to the officers of the treasury for their examination, and by them rejected, or that defendants will have at the trial vouchers not before in their power to procure, and will then be able to show that they were prevented from exhibiting to the treasury a claim for the credit by absence from the United States, or by unavoidable accident; Rev. St. U. S. § 951, providing that, in suits by the United States against individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted, except such as appear to have been presented to the officers of the treasury for their examination, unless it is proved that defendant is, at the trial, in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting a claim for such credit at the treasury by absence from the United States, or by unavoidable accident.

2. A defendant having demurred and answered at the same time, as allowed by Practice Act Ariz. § 42, and a trial having resulted in a judgment against him, it will be presumed that the demurrer was properly disposed of, the record being silent on that point.

3. Part of the defendants only being shown to have joined issue in the case, it will be presumed that the default of the others was duly entered.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

J. A. Rush, J. P. Hargrave, and J. W. Leonard, for appellants. E. B. Pomroy, for respondent.

DUNNE, C. J. The complaint alleges, in substance: (1) That defendant Barnard was postmaster at Prescott, in said Yavapai county, at the time hereinafter stated. (2) That, February 23, 1870, defendants executed a bond to the United States, in the penal sum of $18,000, conditioned to be void, if defendant Barnard faithfully discharged all his duties as postmaster aforesaid, according to law and the regulations of the post-office department, specifying in detail many of such regulations, among them the following: "And, moreover, should faithfully account with the United States in the manner directed by the said postmaster general for all moneys, postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, bills, bonds, blanks, etc., received by him as such postmaster for the use of said office." (3) That said Barnard, between April 1, 1870, and July 31, 1871, received, as postmaster, public moneys, amounting to $1,979.69, and fraudulently converted the same to his own use. (4) That, on an accounting with the United States, July 31, 1871, defendant Barnard was found to be indebted to the United States, in the sum of $1,977.69, and, on February 24, 1872, was directed to pay the same to one A. J. Sullivan, postmaster of Santa Fe, N. M., but refused to do so, and no part thereof has been paid. Prays judgment. Filed October 24, 1872. Service of summons made on all the defendants. Return of summons filed March 25, 1873. Defendant Wormser demurred, in substance: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, nor the subject of this action, because (a) the complaint is not signed by plaintiff, nor his attorney; (b) summons has not issued upon any complaint filed in this court, or any other court known to the laws of the United States, or of this territory; (c) summons has not issued from a court having authority, nor has it been signed by an authorized clerk, nor returned by an authorized officer. (2) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Filed, March 13, 1873. Defendant Barnard, the postmaster, answered admitting office, bond, and indebtedness as charged; denies conversion of funds; alleges they were embezzled by his clerk; denies refusal to pay said Sullivan said sum, or any sum; alleges action barred, because not commenced within two years from liability. Filed July 24, 1873. Defendant Wormser, who had demurred, as aforesaid, then answered admitting office of Barnard; denying execution of the bond; on information and belief, denying indebtedness; as to alleged defalcation, alleging that he has no knowledge thereof sufficient to form a belief; also pleading two years' limitation. Filed February 24, 1873. On the 11th day of October, 1875, long after time for answering had expired, defendants Stevens, Wormser, Moeller, Bean, and Henderson asked leave to file an answer, in substance, as follows: (1) Admitting that Barnard was postmaster, as charged, February 24, 1870; but denying that he was postmaster any longer than to, and until on or about, April 1, 1871. (2) Admitting the bond. (3) Alleging that, on or about April 1, 1871, J. N. Dawly, United States special post-office agent, took possession of Barnard's office, with $1,800 worth of stamped envelopes, etc., charged to Barnard; taking and using the same for the United States, plaintiff herein. (4) Denying breach of bond by Barnard; alleging that, if he had been credited with said $1,800, as he should have been, his account would have been balanced, etc. Defendants offered to show, by affidavits, that the facts set up in said proposed answer had come to their knowledge since the time for answering had expired, and that it was offered in good faith. The United States district attorney waived affidavits, and consented that the motion be heard as though such affidavits were filed. Motion denied. Defendants excepted. Then, October 14, 1875, the cause coming up regularly for trial, judgment that, defendants failing to make oath that they were equitably entitled to credits submitted to accounting officers of the treasury, and rejected, plaintiff have judgment, with costs. Defendants appealed from the judgment.

There is nothing to show that the demurrer of defendant Wormser was ever disposed of. It is true he answered; but, under section 42 of our practice act, a party may demur and answer at the same time. It may have been error to have rendered the judgment against him, but there is no assignment of error here on that ground. We could not consider there was error in this respect without presuming, though the record be silent on the point, that the court did not, in fact, dispose of the demurrer. We cannot presume this. Also, there is nothing in the record to show that issue was joined in the case by any of the defendants, other than by Barnard and Wormser, further than the recital in the judgment, "and the said defendants being present by counsel;" but there is no assignment of error that the default of the other defendants had not been entered, or that the entry of the judgment, as against them, was irregular in any other respect than the one assigned as error. The notice in the summons is sufficiently full to warrant a judgment by default, to the extent of the judgment actually rendered; and, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the record, it will be presumed that the proceedings below were regular in all that is necessary to support the judgment.

The assignment of error in this case is as follows, as stated in the transcript: "Such appeal is taken on the following assignment of error, to-wit, that the court erred in refusing to grant leave to the defendants to file the answer referred to in the bill of exceptions." The application of defendants below, the refusal of which is assigned for error, was an application to file an answer after the time for answering had expired. The first rule governing the court in this matter is found in the sixty-eighth section of our practice act, as follows: "The court may likewise, upon affidavit showing good cause therefor, after notice to the adverse party, allow, upon such terms as may be just, an amendment to any pleading or proceeding in other particulars, and may, upon like terms, allow an answer to be made after the time limited by this chapter."

The question then is, was there good cause shown why this leave should have been granted? The question as to what would have been good cause in this case is determined by some very special provisions in the Revised Statutes of the United States. Section 957 of those statutes reads as follows: "When suit is brought by the United States against any revenue officer, or any other person accountable for public money, who neglects or refuses to pay into the treasury the sum or balance reported to be due to the United States upon the adjustment of his account, it shall be the duty of the court to grant judgment at the return-term, upon motion, unless the defendant, in open court, (the United States attorney being present,) makes and subscribes an oath that he is equitably entitled to credits which had been, previous to the commencement of the suit, submitted to the accounting officer of the treasury, and rejected, specifying in the affidavit each particular claim so rejected, and that he cannot then safely come to trial. If the court, when such oath is made, subscribed, and filed, is thereupon satisfied, a continuance until the next succeeding term may be granted. Such continuance may also be granted when the suit is brought upon a bond or other sealed instrument, and the defendant pleads non est factum, or makes a motion to the court verifying such plea or motion by his oath, and the court thereupon requires the production of the original bond, contract, or other paper specified in the affidavit. And no continuance shall be granted except as herein provided." "Sec. 958. In suits arising under the postal laws, the court shall proceed to trial, and render judgment at the return-term; but, whenever service of process is not made at least twenty days before the return-day of such term, the defendant is entitled to one continuance, if, on his statement, the court deems it expedient, and if he makes affidavit that he has a claim against the post-office department, which has been submitted to, and disallowed by, the sixth auditor, specifying such claim in his affidavit, and that he could not be prepared for trial at such term for want of evidence, the court, if satisfied thereof, may grant continuance until next term." "Sec. 952. No claim for a credit shall be allowed upon the trial of any suit for delinquency against a postmaster, contractor, or other officer, agent, or employe of the post-office department, unless the same has been presented to the sixth auditor, and by him disallowed, in whole or in part, or unless it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that defendant is, at the time of the trial, in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting to the said auditor a claim for such credit by some unavoidable accident."

If the above sections should be thought to relate more particularly to the officer himself, note the following: "Sec. 951. In suits brought by the United States against individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted on trial, except such as appear to have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury for their examination, and to have been by them disallowed, in whole or in part, unless it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant is, at the time of the trial, in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting a claim for such credit at the treasury by absence from the United States, or by unavoidable accident." These sections, of course, have no relation to what a defendant may state in his answer, if he chooses to answer. He may state what he likes in his answer, subject to the usual motions to strike out, as in other cases. They relate to granting continuance, and to what claim may be admitted on the trial of the cause. But when a defendant is in default, and asks leave to make an answer after time, one of the main things always demanded by courts is that he satisfy the court in some way that there is reasonable ground to presume that he has a valid defense to the action. Unless he raise some such presumption, there is no reason for opening the case, and delaying it. If he undertakes to show what it is he claims he can prove on the trial, and the law is clear that such a defense would avail him nothing in the trial, and there is no other cause shown for opening the case, a refusal of the judge below to permit the answer after time will not be reversed as error. It would be plain, in such a case, that the party had not shown good cause for opening the case.

Now, could the defendants have shown on the trial the facts which they say they desired to show, we are satisfied, from the rule in Giles' Case, in the United States supreme court, (9 Cranch, 212, as found in 3 Curt. Dec. 339,) that defendant could not have used this defense on the trial. In that case, the action was against Giles and his bondsmen. The defendants claimed a credit which had not been submitted to the officers of the treasury and rejected. Such a claim is not considered a good defense in the case of the principal. The question was, could the sureties avail themselves of it? Did they stand in any different position in the matter from the principal? At this point, the court says: "If, then, in a suit against Giles himself, a claim for the credits, under the existing circumstances, could not be sustained, neither can it in an action on his bond, without permitting the defendants to do indirectly what the marshal could not have done directly, and in this way avail themselves of what the law seems to regard as a default, or at least a negligence, on the part of their principal." 3 Curt. Dec. 339. And so the defendants in that case were held liable, although it was actually proven on the trial, and so found by special verdict of the jury, that the marshal had really paid the money to the United States district attorney, and it was customary to so pay it. But because he had not presented his vouchers from the district attorney to the accounting officers, and had his accounts for such payment allowed or rejected, the mere fact of paying could not avail his bondsmen on the trial. And so, in this case, even if the case had been opened, the answer permitted, and the parties had actually proven on the trial all they claim they could prove, it would have availed them nothing; the credit could not be allowed, and the court would still have been obliged to enter judgment against them. The defendants, to have been able to advance a claim for credits on the facts alleged, must have shown on the trial that the claim had been presented, and rejected, before the commencement of the suit, or that they had vouchers at the time of the trial not before in their power to procure, and that they had been prevented from presenting them by absence from the United States, or unavoidable accident. True, the time of trial had not yet arrived, and it may be that they could, on the trial, have made the showing. If they thought they could have done so, they should have made a showing that they expected to be able, when the cause would be called for trial, to show vouchers, and bring themselves within the statute. They did not do this. They did not make any showing to the court which made it reasonable to presume that on the trial they would have a valid defense. They did not, therefore, show any good reason why the court should exercise its discretion, and allow an answer to be filed after time. There was therefore no error in the action of the court denying the motion. Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

TRIAL—RECEIVING VERDICT—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL.

1. There is no error in giving additional instructions to the jury at their request, nor in receiving the verdict, in the absence of counsel and without having been called, the party himself being present, and the presence of the latter will be presumed unless his absence is shown.

2. The affidavit of a juror cannot be received to show that he did not agree to the verdict duly returned.

Appeal from district court, Pima county.

Farley & Pomroy, for appellant. Briggs & Goodrich and McCaffry & Clark, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order of the court denying a motion for a new trial. The action was for damages for personal injuries charged by the plaintiff to have been inflicted by the defendant upon the plaintiff. The complaint charges that the plaintiff was of the age of 70 years, in feeble health, and having previously lost the sight of one of his eyes before the injuries complained of were inflicted by the defendant; that the defendant made a violent assault upon his person, by means of which his remaining eye was destroyed. Plaintiff asked for damages in the sum of $12,000. The answer alleges that the plaintiff made the first assault, and denies that the defendant did in any manner wound or hurt the plaintiff. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,000.

Among other matters it is assigned as error by counsel for the appellant "that after the case had been given to the jury, and they had retired, they returned into court and asked for and received instructions from the court in the absence of the defendant's counsel; also, that the verdict of the jury was received in the absence of the defendant's counsel; and that on neither of these occasions was the counsel for the defendant called." It does not, however, appear from the statement that the defendant himself was absent on either of the occasions referred to. It was not error for the court to give instructions to the jury upon their returning into court, as stated in the transcript, in the absence of the counsel for the appellant, if the defendant was himself present, and his presence will be presumed unless his absence is shown, (Comp. Laws, p. 412, § 170.) Though the proper and better practice is, in such cases, that the counsel be called. Nor was it error to receive the verdict of the jury in the absence of counsel for the defense. There is no provision upon the subject in the civil practice act, and no authority is cited by counsel sustaining the position that so to receive the verdict is erroneous.

An affidavit of one of the jurors was incorporated in the statement on which the motion for a new trial was based, to the effect that he, the juror, did not agree to the verdict. The minutes of the court show that the verdict was in writing, signed by the foreman of the jury; that it was recorded in the presence of the jury, was then read to the jury by the clerk, and the jury asked if that was their verdict, and they said it was. It is not admissible in such a case to receive an affidavit of a juror to impeach the verdict. There was no error in the instructions given by the court; on the contrary, we think the law of the case was clearly stated in the charge of the court. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict was one of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was urged, and, as it appears to us, much the strongest, if not the only plausible ground upon which the motion for a new trial was based. The evidence, as set out in the statement, is certainly very meager upon the question as to the responsibility of the defendant for the injuries received by the plaintiff in the altercation, but we are not prepared to say that the jury might not, from the evidence, believe the defendant responsible for the injuries received by the plaintiff. The judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CERTIORARI—JURISDICTION—PRACTICE IN ESCHATE.

1. Any justice of the supreme court may issue the writ of certiorari to the district court, under Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 375, providing that the supreme court and each justice thereof shall have power to issue all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the powers conferred on the court.

2. On an information alleging the escheat of the estate of an intestate, and that it is being badly managed by the administrator, the district court has no power to order the latter to deliver the assets in his hands to a receiver appointed by the court, the district court having appellate jurisdiction only of matters cognizable in the probate court, and Comp. Laws Ariz. pp 561-563, providing that the receiver shall be the custodian of the real estate, and the rents and profits thereof, and that the administrator shall settle the estate, and, after paying the debts, shall pay to the treasurer of the territory the residue of the estate.

C. W. C. Rowell, for relator. J. P. Hargrave, for respondent.

TWEED, J. This is a certiorari granted by the supreme court, and directed to the district court, second judicial district, in and for the county of Yuma. The record or transcript in the case shows that the relator, William H. Forrest, was appointed administrator of the estate of Robert Cavennaugh, deceased, by the probate court for the county of Yuma, on the 26th day of December, 1859; that the relator qualified and entered upon his duties as such administrator, and continued to act as such administrator up to the time his petition herein was filed; that his letters had not been revoked, and no proceedings had been instituted in said probate court for their revocation; that the property of said estate consisted of certain real estate situated in Arizona City, Yuma county, and of money and other personal property of the value in all of some $12,000; that in November, 1871, and during the session of the district court, in and for said county of Yuma, an information was filed in said court by the acting district attorney of said county of Yuma, alleging the escheat of said estate to the territory of Arizona, and praying, among other things, for a decree vesting said estate in said territory. It is also alleged in the information, in very loose and general terms, that the estate was being badly managed by the administrator, and the court was asked to appoint a receiver therein. Upon this information such proceedings were had that on the 13th day of November an order was entered in said court appointing Thomas Hughes receiver, to take charge of said estate, and a further order therein made directing said administrator, "the relator herein," upon application of said Thomas Hughes, receiver, at once to turn over to said receiver all property and moneys in his hands or under his control belonging to said estate. The foregoing contains all that is material in the transcript for consideration in passing upon the question to be decided. The relator, in his petition and in his brief filed, insists that the said court acted without authority of law, and exceeded its jurisdiction in making the order, in so far as such order required the relator to turn over and deliver the personal property and effects in his hands as the administrator of said estate to the receiver.

The case was submitted to us without argument, but upon briefs filed in the case of Territory v. Meahr,<sup>2</sup> also before us by certiorari at this time. In the argument in that case, and by the brief filed by respondent, it was insisted that the writ was improperly issued, the order for the issuance of the writ having been made in that case as in this by his honor, the chief justice. We, however, are satisfied that in this regard the writ was properly issued. Section 5 of the statute conferring jurisdiction (Comp. Laws, p. 375) reads as follows: "This court [supreme court] and each of the justices thereof shall have power to issue all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the powers conferred by law, and by this and other statutes." It seems clear to us that under this section the authority given to each of the justices in the issuance of this writ is precisely the same as that given to "this court." The fact that the supreme court judges are also the district judges may be a good reason for changing the law, so that a concurrence of two should be required to grant the writ; but we think the language of the section quoted unequivocal, and in conferring upon "this court," and each of the justices thereof, the power to issue writs, it must be deemed that the legislature intended to bestow upon each of the justices all the powers conferred upon this court in this regard.

This brings us to the consideration of the question whether or not the district court exceeded its power and jurisdiction in the matter complained of by the relator. We regret that we are compelled to pass upon and dispose of the question at issue hurriedly. No term of this court can be held until next January, and it is important to litigants that the causes before us, which have been submitted, shall be passed upon and decided at this term. Under such circumstances, we cannot set out as fully as we desire to do the reasons for and the grounds upon which our decisions are made. Conceding the proceeding had in the district court to decree the escheat of the estate of Cavennaugh to have been regular, and the appointment of a receiver in such proceedings to have been necessary and proper, was there any authority in said court to compel the administrator to turn over the personalty of said estate to the receiver? We think there was not, and that the court, in making such order, acted without authority of law, and in excess of its legitimate jurisdiction. The statute relating to escheats, Comp. Laws, pp. 561-563, nowhere contemplates, even when a receiver is appointed, that he shall be the custodian of the estate beyond the realty and the rents and profits thereof, but expressly provides that the administrator shall proceed to settle the estate as in other cases; and after all just debts against the estate are paid, together with the expenses of administration, shall pay over the residue of moneys belonging to the estate, if any there be, not to the receiver, but to the territorial treasurer, who shall place the same in general fund of the territory. It is proper to add that the district court of the territory have only appellate jurisdiction of matters properly cognizable in the probate courts, and that the exercise of other than appellate jurisdiction in such matters is unauthorized by law. Our decision is, and it is so ordered, that the district court of the second judicial district in and for the county of Yuma so modify its order herein as to make the receiver so appointed the custodian only of the real property, with the rents and profits thereof, and that said order, so far as it requires the administrator, the relator herein, to turn over the moneys or other personal property of said estate to said receiver, be vacated.

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE OF CHARACTER—VERDICT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a trial for murder, the character of the deceased is not in issue, unless the evidence raises a doubt whether the accused might not have acted in self-defense.

2. The validity of a verdict in writing is not affected by a failure to record it before reading it to the jury and inquiring if it is their verdict.

3. Under a rule of court requiring instructions asked to be presented before argument, it is not error to refuse instructions not presented until after the close of the argument.

Appeal from district court, Pima county.

James W. Otis and Ben Goodrich, for appellant. Farley & Pourroy, for respondent.

FRENCH, C. J. The transcript in this case fails to comply with the requirements of the rules of this court, and especially with rules 5 and 6. Six errors are assigned. The first two assignments are the exclusion of evidence as to the character of the deceased. Unless it be shown that under the circumstances the defendant might have acted in self-defense, or unless the circumstances raise at least a doubt whether he might have so acted or not, the character of the deceased is not in issue. People v. Murray, 10 Cal. 309. The third and fourth assignments are untenable. The jury in this case presented their verdict regularly in all respects, and were required by the court to declare the same, which they did. It was a written verdict signed by the foreman. They were then directed by the court to deliver the same to the clerk for record. The clerk received the verdict, and filed it, but without entering it in the minute-book of the court read it to the jury, and asked them if it was their verdict, to which they replied in the affirmative, being the second declaration by the jury affirming their written verdict. The verdict was then perfect and complete. People v. Gilbert, 57 Cal. 96. The statutory direction as to recording had its origin in the practice of verbal verdicts. For the same reason as stated in People v. Gilbert there was no error in refusing the motion for arrest of judgment, or in refusing the motion to change or amend the minutes of the court, or in refusing to admit the testimony of the clerk or affidavits of counsel on these points. The rules of the court requiring instructions asked to be presented before the argument, the refusal to give such instructions when not so presented, or not presented till after the close of the argument, cannot be assigned as error. Walde v. Doll, 29 Cal. 555. In this court, this case was submitted without argument, and the record discloses no error whatever. The judgment must be affirmed, and it has been so ordered.

APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATORS—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT.

Letters of administration were granted to M. by the probate court. K. applied for the appointment, as administrator of the same estate, and, his application having been refused, he appealed to the district court. That court dismissed the appeal, but appointed both M. and K. as administrators of the estate, and it subsequently dismissed M. for disobeying its orders. Held, that the proceedings of the district court, after dismissing the appeal, were void, the appointment and direction of administrators belonging primarily to the probate court, and the district court having appellate jurisdiction only.

REAVIS, J., dissenting.

Clarence Gray, for appellant. William P. Miller, for the Territory.

TITUS, C. J. This is an appeal from the final judgment of the district court of the second judicial district of Arizona, upon a special proceeding therein pending. The transcript of the record filed in this court discloses the following state of facts in this case: "On the 8th of October, 1871, A. A. Mix, the appellant, was, by the probate court of the county of Yuma, appointed special administrator of the estate of M. D. Dobbins, then late of the said county, deceased. Subsequently, R. B. Kelly applied to the said probate court for appointment as administrator of the same estate. This application was rejected, and the said R. B. Kelly appealed to the district court aforesaid from the judgment of rejection by the probate court, the said A. A. Mix being made appellee. That appeal, as the records allege, was dismissed, and an order entered by the said district court, appointing both the said R. B. Kelly, and the said defendant, Mix, administrators, to act conjointly in the administration and settlement of the said estate. Such is the statement of the record as shown by the transcript. Subsequently, on the 25th of December, 1871, the said A. A. Mix was, by the order of the said district court, dismissed from the administration of the said estate for disobeying, as the record alleges, a lawful order of the said court, addressed to him, as such administrator, as appears from the record itself." Upon this state of facts the appeal is made to this court, and the order of the district court, dismissing the appellant, A. A. Mix, from the administration of the estate aforesaid, is the error alleged in the procedure of the court below.

This case, like all special proceedings, is an unusual one, and the facts disclosed by the transcript are not so full as to exclude all conjecture; enough, however, appears to show this court that the whole procedure below, from the rejection of Kelly's application for administration by the probate court to the dismissal, as it purports, of Mix by the district court, is one entire integral procedure, and must be so regarded by this court in its disposition of the case. There is nothing in the record to show that Mix was not doing his whole duty as administrator, at any time, from the beginning to the end of this proceeding. The presumption of law regarding administrators, as well as other officials, is that they do their duty until the contrary is shown. The action of the district court strongly aids this presumption; for, instead of dismissing Mix on Kelly's appeal, it dismissed the appeal itself, and appointed Mix. Had the district court stopped there, no possible exception could have been made to its action. The record, however, shows that it went much further than this, for it appointed both Mix and Kelly co-administrators, and at last dismissed Mix from the administration for disobeying one of its orders. The character of the order disobeyed is not, however, stated in the transcript, and the presumption of law would hardly be in its favor, against an administrator whose appointment and direction must come from another court, having a primary jurisdiction exclusively its own, which the district court can neither share or touch, nor question. The opinion of this court is that everything done by the district court in this case, after the dismissal of Kelly's appeal, was without authority of law, and therefore null and void; that, from all that appears from the record before us, A. A. Mix is still the sole administrator of the estate of M. D. Dobbins, deceased, and primarily amenable and accountable to the probate court of Yuma county, and no other. The order of this court, therefore, is that the district court of the second judicial district of Arizona vacate and rescind of record its several orders appointing R. B. Kelly, and dismissing A. A. Mix, as the administrators of the estate of M. D. Dobbins, deceased; that A. A. Mix, or whoever is or may be appointed administrator of the said estate by the probate court of Yuma county, be allowed to administer such estate as the law directs; and that the clerk of this court certify this order to the said district court.

TWEED, J., concurs.

REAVIS, J., (dissenting.) This cause is here on a pretended appeal from the district court for Yuma county. I cannot concur in the judgment of the court. There are two reasons why this case should be dismissed: First. It is not a case in which the law allows an appeal; second, if it were such a case, there is no appeal taken in the manner provided by law. Section 350 of the Civil Code of the territory provides that, "to render an appeal effectual for any purpose in any case, a written undertaking should be executed on the part of the appellant by at least two sureties, to the effect that the appellant will pay all damage and costs which may be awarded against him on an appeal, not exceeding three hundred dollars, or that sum should be deposited with the clerk, by whom the judgment or order was entered, to abide the event of the appeal. Such undertaking should be filed, or such deposit made, with the clerk, within twenty days after the notice of appeal is filed, or such further time as the court upon application may allow." No such undertaking has been given or deposit made, in this cause, as the law expressly requires, nor is there anything in the record to show that the time for filing such undertaking, or making such deposit has been extended by the court. For these reasons it is very clear that this case is not properly before this court, and should be dismissed.

TERRITORY v. POTTER.<sup>1</sup>

RAPE.

On the trial of a father for the rape of his daughter about 12 years old, it appeared that she made no resistance nor any outcry, and that no force was used and no threats except telling her to lie still or he would slap her. Held, that a conviction for rape could not be sustained, under Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 76, § 47, fixing the age of consent at ten years.

Appeal from district court, Pima county. M. A. Smith, for appellant. Littleton Price, for the Territory.

PINNEY, J. The defendant was tried and convicted for the crime of rape, and sentenced to the territorial prison for life; from which judgment he takes an appeal. The evidence entirely fails to sustain or make a case of rape. If true, it does make a clear case of incest. By the evidence of the daughter of the defendant, it appears that she had been sleeping with, and having connection with, her father, for about one year previous to the finding of the indictment. She testified that she was about 12 years old at the time of the alleged rape. The girl testified that she was at the house of a neighbor; that she had been staying there while her father was out in the mountains at work. In the evening after his return, he called at this neighbor's house, and she went with him to his cabin. He went to bed first, and she got into bed with him. No force and no threats were used up to this time. Some time after they had been in bed, defendant told her to lie still or he would slap her. No outcry or resistance of any kind was made on the part of the girl, and no force was used by the defendant, and no threats, except to tell the girl to lie still or he would slap her, are anywhere shown in the record. If the facts detailed in the evidence of this case be true, we can scarcely imagine a more horrible case on the part of one calling himself "father." But courts are not organized for the purpose of making laws. We can only construe them as we find them. The law presumes a female of tender years incapable of consenting to sexual intercourse; and a man who has connection with such a female, although she may have consented thereto, is guilty of rape. 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 558. What is a female of tender years and incapable of giving consent is fixed by the statutes of the different states and territories. In this territory, if she be under the age of 10 years, she is incapable of giving consent; if over that age, and of sound mind, she must resist, or be prevented from resistance by threats of immediate and great bodily harm, accompanied by apparent power of execution. In this record, there is no proof of any imbecility of mind, and the girl being over the age of 10 years, the law imposes the duty on the prosecution to show that the girl offered such resistance as was in her power to make, or that she was prevented from resisting by threats of great bodily harm. Nothing of the kind is shown. It appears that the girl has consented to all this intercourse; and consent, even if reluctant, if free, always negatives rape. For the reasons above given, the judgment and order will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. And it is so ordered.

ACTION AT LAW—ACCOUNTING—JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT.

1. The plaintiff and a firm composed of the two defendants having engaged in the business of common carriers, under a contract providing that each party should perform certain services, and that the capital should be contributed and the losses borne and the profits divided equally, the plaintiff may recover his share of the net profits in an action at law in which the parties may be examined as witnesses for each other, their books inspected, and their accounts unraveled.

2. Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 409, § 152, providing that judgment by default may be entered by the clerk if no answer is filed within 20 days after service of the summons, the clerk has no power to enter judgment by default after an answer has been filed in due time by one of the defendants, on behalf of both, in which he denies all knowledge of material allegations of the complaint, averts that his "co-defendant, a resident of San Francisco, alone can and will fully answer," and asks for further time to enable him to do so.

3. The verification of the informal answer does not in any manner impair its efficacy, though the complaint was not verified, Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 394, § 51, providing that when the complaint is verified the answer shall be verified also.

4. A motion to set aside a default, and notice thereof, are not defective because in the title of the cause as given in the motion the defendants are described as "W. B. et al." and in the notice as "W. B. and N. B.," while in the complaint they are described as "W. B. and N. B., doing business under the firm name of W. B. & Co."

Appeal from third district court.

H. H. Cartter, for the appellant. J. P. Hargrave, for the respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this case, eight days after service of summons, William Bichard, the one of the two defendants residing without the jurisdiction of this court, filed his sworn and informal answer to the unsworn complaint of the plaintiff, James P. Porter, in which he admits some of the allegations of the said complaint, denies all knowledge of its other more material allegations, avers that the other co-defendant, Nicholas Bichard, a resident of San Francisco, alone can and will make full answer to such complaint, and asks the further time of 60 days to enable him to do so. With this answer on file in the case the clerk of the district court in which the suit was brought, 20 days after service of summons on the said William Bichard, that is, on the 11th day of November, 1871, at the instance of the plaintiff's counsel, declared the defendants in default, and entered judgment against them, and in favor of the plaintiff, for the sum of $1,346, with costs of suit. Subsequently, on the 22d day of June, 1872, the district court, on motion of the defendants' counsel and argument on behalf of both parties, ordered that this judgment should be opened and the defendants allowed to answer. From that order the plaintiff appealed, and now asks this court to rescind it, and restore the judgment of the clerk, alleging the said order to have been null and void.

In addition to this averment of error on behalf of the plaintiff the counsel for the defendant, in his notice of motion to open the judgment in the court below, suggested an exception to the jurisdiction of the district court, alleging that the cause of action in the present case was so far an equitable one as to render the common-law remedy there sought inadequate to do justice between the parties. That suggestion was repeated in this court. A brief analysis of the case, however, will show that the district court, under our statutes, is entirely competent to dispose of it in justice to all the parties. The persons concerned in interest are but three,—the plaintiff and the two defendants sued as partners. Some of the relations of the opposite parties, in the case, it is true, are similar to those of partners, but the aggregate relations of the parties are neither numerous nor complex, nor does the case present for solution any equitable element. The plaintiff's claim is for the net profits of freight due him, as alleged, on a contract between him and the defendants, as common carriers, in which the services were to be performed by the respective parties, as provided in the said contract, and the capital contributed, the losses borne, and the profits divided equally between the parties. An account and discovery, in some of their simpler forms, may be required by the plaintiff of the defendants, in the solution of their controversy. The remedial powers of the district court are quite competent to do justice between the parties in this case, hardly less fully, and much more speedily and cheaply, than any mere court of equity. Issues clear and simple can always be extracted from any detail of fact by complaint and answer under our statutes, and when the issues are thus developed, the parties can be made witnesses for each other, and can be interrogated under oath as exhaustively as the same can be done on a bill in equity for discovery. Their books can be inspected and their accounts unraveled in a case such as this so fully as to satisfy all the exigencies of justice. Nothing in the case, therefore, requires this or the district court to abdicate its common-law jurisdiction, which had already attached, for the dilatory and expensive remedies of a court of equity.

The question recurs upon the validity of the order to open the judgment in the court below. The authority of the clerk to declare the defendants' default is simply clerical, involving no judgment or discretion. The statute (Comp. Laws, p. 409, § 152) provides that judgment may be thus entered if no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court. Any answer, when filed in the case, suspends the power of the clerk to declare the defendant's default and judgment, however informal, and its value as a pleading must be determined by the judge, and no one else. The answer of the defendant had, it seems, been filed by the clerk, who entered the judgment in this case, and had been on his file at least 20 days when the judgment was entered. The informal answer of William Bichard, as it appears upon the record, though not competent to form a triable issue, was certainly sufficient to entitle the defendants to further time to answer. It would have been so found on application to the court or judge for further time to answer, it would have secured the defendants leave to answer over on a judgment overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to it, and it would have entitled the defendants to a postponement of the trial in order to secure the testimony of Nicholas Bichard as a witness, on the trial of the cause at some future time. The conclusion, therefore, is that the clerk was wrong in entering the judgment of default against the defendants, with the informal answer of William Bichard on file in this case, and that the judge of the district court of the third judicial district was right in rescinding such judgment after it had been entered.

It only remains to notice two more exceptions of the plaintiff's counsel, which were adverted to in his brief, and on the oral argument of this case. One of these is that the answer of William Bichard was on oath, while the complaint to which it purports to be responsive was not so, and that it was the answer of both parties, though only made by one. The other of these minor exceptions is that the defendants in the notice of motion to open the judgment, and in the proceedings which grew out of it, were not described and entitled as in the complaint, and that hence the notice was insufficient and inoperative, and the order of the judgment null and void. In the notice of motion the defendants are described as "William Bichard and Nicholas Bichard," and in the motion itself they are described as "William Bichard et al.," instead of "William Bichard and Nicholas Bichard, partners, doing business under the firm name and style of William Bichard & Co.," as they are entitled in the complaint, and with the exception noted in the other parts of the proceedings. The title as here indicated was the mere badge of the notice, as explained and applied by the notice itself, to show who sent it, and, like all such notices, does not require the certainty of a pleading. It is always sufficient where it informs the party entitled to its receipt of the thing to be done and leads him to the place of doing it at the proper time. The title was explained by the body of the notice, and together they left the plaintiff in no doubt of what was meant. Were William Bichard et al., and lawsuits between them and James P. Porter, so numerous that the latter could possibly have misunderstood this notice? Practically this question would have to be answered in the negative if there were nothing more. But on turning to the record we find this admission on behalf of the plaintiff: "I acknowledge service of the within motion. Prescott, Dec. 14, 1871. [Signed] H. H. CARTER, Attorney for Plaintiff." Besides this, the minutes of the cases show that the counsel for the plaintiff attended at the hearing of the motion, and resisted the order. This would have cured all defects of notice, if any there were. The verification of the informal answer of William Bichard by affidavit does not in any manner impair its effect. Our Compiled Laws provide, (page 394, § 51:) "When the complaint is verified by affidavit, the answer shall be verified also." It does not prohibit such verification, nor make it detract from the statement in any other case, for the truth is the verification. adds to the sanctity of the statement, and is not matter of exception in the present case. The informal answer of William Bichard in this case thus commences: "William Bichard, for and in behalf of himself and Nicholas Bichard,"—and thus concludes: "So the defendants in this case respectively pray this honorable district court," etc. The remainder, and the whole effect, of this informal paper is to tell the plaintiff, the clerk, and the court that the absent defendant, Nicholas Bichard, could and would make full answer to the complaint in the case if time were allowed him to do so. He makes the statement and he prays for the time, as would have been obvious, without the commencement or conclusion, on behalf of both the defendants; for both, as parties to the suit, were interested in it. It is impossible to see how this can impair the effect of this informal answer, or constitute any cause for rescinding the order for opening the judgment in controversy. This court, therefore, is thus constrained to disregard all these minor exceptions. Some cases were cited in argument, but they had so little application to the present case that their discussion here would add little or nothing to its interest or instruction. They certainly ought not to vary the foregoing conclusions. The judgment and order of this court, therefore, is that the order of the district court of the third judicial district, opening the judgment of default entered by the clerk of that court in this case, be confirmed, and the case be remanded there for further proceedings thereon.

LIABILITY FOR FIRM DEBT—OBJECTIONS TO INSTRUCTIONS.

1. There being evidence tending to prove a partnership between defendant and B., it is not error to charge that the former is bound, if, when called on to pay a note signed by B. in the firm name, defendant did not deny his authority, but promised to pay the note.

2. The defendant cannot object to comments of the court on evidence introduced by him, on the sole ground that the evidence itself is irrelevant.

3. If the manner and emphasis with which a charge to the jury is delivered can be assigned as error at all, it must first be made the ground of a motion for a new trial supported by affidavits.

Appeal from district court, Maricopa county.

G. H. Oury and J. T. Alsap, for appellant. John A. Rush, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This was an action on a promissory note signed by Whitlow & Beatty. Whitlow was sued as surviving partner of the late firm of Whitlow & Beatty. The complaint alleges the partnership, and other essentials, in form not objected to by the defendant. The defendant answers, denying the partnership, execution of the note, and indebtedness. The case was heard with a jury. Plaintiff introduced evidence to show that the defendant and Beatty, whose name was signed to the note with that of defendant, had held themselves out to the public as partners; that Beatty had executed and delivered the note as a partnership note; that payment of the same was demanded of defendant; that he promised to pay, not denying the authority of Beatty to make the note. The note was put in evidence, with an indorsement of the payment of $200 thereon. Defendant introduced evidence denying the partnership, alleging that, when he promised to pay the note, he was acting as administrator of the estate of Beatty, deceased, and that he promised as administrator, not as personally liable, alleging that he did tell one of the plaintiffs, at the time of the demand, or conversation about the debt, that Beatty had no authority to pledge defendant for payment. The foregoing evidence was the testimony of defendant himself. Defendant introduced other evidence, viz., that of one Wilson, his book-keeper, to the effect that, though the payment of $200 on the note had been made by his book-keeper, it was without authority; that the mules, alleged by plaintiff to have been given to defendant in consideration of the note by delivering them to Beatty, had been bought by Beatty with $600, given him for that purpose by defendant's book-keeper, as instructed by defendant; and that, when Beatty brought them to defendant's place of business, he claimed the mules as his own property, took them off on a journey for about a week, when he returned, turned them into defendant's corral, and, in a few days, Beatty was killed. The book-keeper says he credited Beatty on his books with the mules, having charged him with the $600; that defendant took and used the mules, sold some of them, had some of them yet; that he made this credit on the books to Beatty for the mules, without any instructions from either Beatty or defendant; that Beatty had made no disposition of the mules after he had returned from the journey mentioned; and that defendant was absent from home at the time he (the book-keeper) credited Beatty on the books with the mules. The jury having been charged, found for plaintiffs. Defendant moved for a new trial, assigning error of law in the charge of the judge. Motion denied. Appeal from the order refusing new trial.

The judge charged as follows, among other charges: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, with knowledge of the existence of the said note, made no objection to plaintiffs against the authority of Beatty to make it, when called upon to pay it, but promised plaintiffs to pay it, he thereby ratified the act of Beatty, and became liable." This is assigned as error. We see no error in this charge. It was not undertaking to answer for the default of another. The charge says. If the jury believe defendant had knowledge of the note, the note is the note of Whitlow & Beatty. To have knowledge of that note is to know that it is signed in that manner; that it is the signature of a partnership. It is a firm name. There was evidence before the jury that there was such a firm, and that defendant was a member of it. It was not error to say to the jury, with the evidence before them, that, if they believed defendant had been notified that a note was out, signed, "Whitlow & Beatty," had been called on to pay it, had not denied the authority of Beatty to make the note, but, on the contrary, promised to pay it, he was then liable on the note.

The court further charged: "It is not my province to say what is proven, or what is not proven. Of that you are the sole judges. But I have the right to call the attention of the jury to important points in the testimony; the manner in which the defendant obtained the mules purchased by Beatty. According to the testimony of Wilson, it would seem that the mules were brought by Beatty to defendant's place, and claimed by Beatty as his mules, and were by him taken to McDowell, and brought back to defendant's place by Beatty on the Wednesday before his death. The witness Wilson, according to his own testimony, without one word having been said to him either by Beatty or the defendant, credited Beatty, on his account with defendant, with the mules on the day of, or day preceding, the death of Beatty; and it appears from the testimony of Wilson that defendant took possession of the mules, and has retained possession of them ever since. If the defendant was the partner of Beatty, he had a right to the possession of the mules as surviving partner, and, if he was not partner, then the mules belonged to the estate of Beatty, according to the testimony of Wilson, and should have been administered upon as the property of the estate, and used to pay the debts of Beatty." This is the second assignment of error. It is urged that it was error to comment on this testimony, because it is claimed the testimony is not relevant to the issue in the case. But all this testimony was introduced by the defendant, and admitted, without objection. Defendant cannot now object that the testimony was irrelevant. The testimony was in. It had gone to the jury, and, if it were really irrelevant, all the more reason why the judge should comment upon it, so far as to prevent the jury from being misled by it. The purport of the evidence seemed to be that, because the defendant had the mules in his possession, they were his individual property. The judge explained to them that if the defendant was a partner of Beatty, then the mere fact of his having possession of the mules would prove nothing, because, as surviving partner, he would have been entitled to the possession; that, if he was not a partner, then, according to the testimony of Wilson, the mules belonged to Beatty, and defendant, being administrator of Beatty's estate, would have been entitled to the possession of the mules, as such administrator. Certainly, it is a correct proposition of law that a surviving partner is entitled to the possession of the personal estate of the partnership, pending administration, as also that, as administrator in the case shown, if the property belonged to Beatty, defendant was entitled to the possession of it.

It is urged that he could not have been administrator and partner at the same time; but that is a collateral matter. His appointment as administrator might have been resisted in the probate court, if it were shown that he was a partner; but such a question cannot be considered here, in this case, on the present record.

It is further urged—and this seems to be relied upon as a serious ground of objection to this error—that, as stated in the words of the transcript, "this recapitulation by the court of Wilson's testimony was made with a manner and emphasis indicative that the court regarded the testimony as extremely suspicious." Whether the manner in which a judge delivers a charge, or the peculiar emphasis with which he pronounces it, can be assigned as error, is not before us. It is sufficient to say that it is not properly assigned here. The appeal here is that it was error to deny a new trial. If it was claimed that a new trial ought to have been granted for that the defendant was unfairly prejudiced before the jury by the court, it should have been charged as irregularity in the proceedings of the court, coming under the first of the seven grounds for new trials, and the application should have been supported by affidavit. This is the mode prescribed by the statute, and it cannot be properly presented or raised in any other way. A judge may have been entirely unconscious of the fact that his manner of addressing the jury was thought to unfairly prejudice them in any way in the case. If the charge is deliberately brought before him on motion for a new trial, and affidavits filed with it, showing what persons consider that his manner was unfair, and to what extent they think it was calculated to prejudice either party, he, as also the appellate court, is in a position to judge whether a new trial ought to have been granted or not. But when parties have not thought the matter of sufficient importance to present it properly, or, for any cause, have not in fact done so, the question cannot, of course, be considered on appeal. The order denying a new trial and the final judgment are hereby affirmed.

EJECTMENT—PLEADING.

Under Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 267, § 114, giving to the administrator the right to the possession of all the real estate of his intestate, his title is sufficiently alleged in a complaint in ejectment by an averment that "as administrator he is seised in fee, and entitled to the possession of the premises," though no possession, nor right of possession, in his intestate is averred.

Appeal from district court, Pima county.

TWEED, J. This was an action of ejectment to recover land in Pima county. Judgment by default was rendered by the court against defendant, from which he appeals. Some objections are made to the sufficiency of the summons by counsel for the appellant, which we think not well taken. It is strict and literal compliance with the requirements of the statute. It is objected to the complaint that it alleges no possession, or right of possession, in the intestate. The complaint, however, does allege that the plaintiff, "as administrator, was seised in fee, and entitled to the possession of the premises," etc. The statute gives to the administrator a right to the possession of all the real estate of his intestate. Comp. Laws, pp. 267, 268, § 114. And we see no reason why he cannot maintain a possessory action to recover

APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS WAIVED.

1. Where no objection was made to the issues, or to the submission on special issues, it cannot be assigned as error that they did not cover all the issues in the case.

2. The right to a statement on appeal being, by Comp. Laws Ariz. § 341, deemed waived, if not served within 20 days from judgment, no errors alleged therein can be considered if it was not served within that time.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

Materson, Howard, Southworth & Goodwin, for appellant. Hargrave and Rush & Wells, for respondent.

FRENCH, C. J. The jury in this case find, on the special issues submitted to them: "(1) That the plaintiff was not in prior possession by himself, or through his grantors, of the premises, or any part thereof, described in the complaint on and before the months of February and March, 1868; (2) that the whole of the land in controversy was included in the military reservation known as 'Ft. Whipple' on the twenty-seventh day of April, 1870."

Although the special issues submitted to the jury do not appear to have covered all the issues in the case, plaintiff made no objection to these issues as framed, or to the submission of the case to the jury on them, so far as the transcript discloses. It is alleged as one of the assignments of error that the special issues submitted to the jury did not cover all the issues in the case. But this assignment was made for the first time in making up the record long after the trial of the case, and, even here, it is not alleged that plaintiff ever objected to the submission of the case to the jury on special issues. The finding of the jury on these issues is decisive of the case, especially is the first one so decisive. We cannot reach this verdict to disturb it on the record before us. The transcript contains a voluminous statement, in which many errors are alleged but not shown, and a large mass of redundant and irrelevant matter. The statutory provisions, in regard to statement on appeal, are found in sections 340, 341, and the sections immediately following page 346 of the Compiled Laws. None of these statutory provisions have been complied with. It does not appear very clearly when the judgment was entered. But the decision was made on the 25th day of May, and the judgment was filed on the same day; the statement was served on the 23d of June following. This was not within the 20 days, and the 341st section prescribes the penalty: "He shall be deemed to have waived his right thereto." We can therefore only consider the judgment roll, which, showing no error on its face, the judgment must be affirmed, and it has been so ordered.

PLEADING—ANSWER.

In a suit for money due under a written contract, defendant may plead an equitable defense founded on a mistake in the writing, and may have it reformed; Comp. Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

Action at law by D. K. Houghtaling against N. E. Ellis and others for the recovery of money due under a written contract. The defendants pleaded that a mistake had been made in reducing the contract to writing, and asked that it be reformed. Plaintiff demurred to the answer, and the demurrer was sustained. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appealed. Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 409, § 2437, provides that "there shall be in this territory but one form of civil action for the enforcement or protection of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrongs." Clark Churchill, for appellants. Bush & Wells, for respondent.

FRENCH, C. J. In the argument of this case, it was assumed that the question was raised in this record whether in this territory an equitable defense can be interposed to a complaint setting forth an action at law, and especially whether the defendant pleading such equitable defense can properly ask that the contract on which the legal action is founded be reformed in such action. There is no doubt that a reformation of the contract on which the action is brought may be properly asked for in the answer in such action, if the action be an original proceeding in equity. This may be done even in an action for the specific performance of such contract. The matter entitling a party to amendment of his contract may be set up by way of defense to a proceeding for a specific performance of it. Woodworth v. Cook, 2 Blatchf. 151. As to the federal constitutional courts, the rule and practice is well established that the two systems of law and equity cannot be blended in the same action or proceeding. The equity jurisdiction of the purely federal courts is derived solely from the constitution and acts of congress. The equitable jurisdiction of these courts is the same in every state, and the rule of decision is precisely the same in all. Their rule of practice is not regulated, or even modified, by the state practice. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 347; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. 108, 4 Curt. Dec. 360. A great many cases to the same effect are found in the United States supreme court decisions, and none contra. The supreme court goes further still. In the case of Jones v. Mc-Masters, 20 How. 22, the court say: "It must be remembered that this is a suit at law to recover the possession of the land in dispute, and that, although it may be the course of practice in the courts of the state of Texas in a suit of this description to blend in the proceeding the principles of law and equity, in the federal courts sitting in the state, the two systems must be kept distinct and separate. This principle is fundamental in these courts, and cannot be departed from. The court, therefore, in a suit at law, should exclude the hearing and determination of all questions that belong appropriately and exclusively to the jurisdiction of a court of equity. In a case calling for the interposition of this court, and turning upon equitable considerations, relief should be sought by bill in equity." The doctrine is here clearly announced that, if a party seek equitable remedy or relief, he must do it by original bill, and not in answer to an action at law. In the United States federal courts state statutes and practice have no application. This doctrine and practice, so uniformly announced and maintained in all the United States federal courts, has, no doubt, tinged the decisions of the territorial courts in some instances. But the courts of the territories are not United States constitutional courts, but United States territorial courts, acting under the statutes of their respective territories; and the question in the case at bar is whether an equitable defense to an action at law can be authorized by territorial statutes, and, if so, whether it has been so authorized by territorial enactments in Arizona. I am of the opinion that both these questions may be answered in the affirmative. Two cases in the supreme court of Montana are cited by the respondent. But these cases do not reach the case at bar. In the summing up of the doctrine of these two cases, in the latter case, in divisions numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 on page 540, the concluding number, 5, reads as follows: "That suits in equity, where equity relief is prayed, or where an equitable defense is set up to a claim at law, must be tried as in a court of chancery, and the decree emanate from the judge sitting as a chancellor." This is precisely what is prayed for by the defendants in this case. I am of the opinion that the answer in this case is a full bill in equity in substance, and not justly subject to the objection of not containing facts sufficient to constitute a defense. If doubt be entertained as to the equitable matter solely, it sets up the legal matter, not by denial, it is true, but by averment and facts stated, such as that the consideration failed, which constitute a good defense at law. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings, and that the demurrer to the answer be overruled, and it is so ordered.

PORTER, J., concurs.

SILENT, J., dissents.

After the rendition of the foregoing opinion, a rehearing was granted, upon which the court reaffirmed its former opinion.

PUBLIC LANDS—ENTRY ON UNSURVEYED LANDS—DAMAGES FOR DETENTION.

1. Under Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 636, § 1, making any settlement, cultivation, or improvement in pursuance of an intention permanently to occupy and improve public lands as a home sufficient to give a possessory right, one who measured off, and took possession of, 160 acres of unsurveyed land, and cultivated a part, erecting a house of poles covered with brush, and posting notice of his claim, is entitled to possession of the entire tract as against one entering a month later, and it is immaterial that his claim was for a tract a mile long and only one-fourth of a mile wide, as such tract has the width of the 40-acre unit used in federal surveys.

2. Six hundred dollars' damages for detention of 80 acres one season is not excessive, when defendant cut and sold therefrom hay amounting to nearly that sum.

3. An offer to buy peace in order to avoid a lawsuit is no recognition of an adverse claim.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

J. P. Hargrave, for appellant. James Anderson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case arose in the court below on the complaint of Davis against Simmons, to recover possession of the eastern half of a tract of land in Yavapai county, the whole of which is described in the said complaint as follows: "Situate on Willow creek, commencing at a stake near a hill at the south-west corner; thence north one-fourth of a mile to a stake; thence east one mile to a stake; thence south one-fourth of a mile to a stake; thence west one mile to the place of beginning; the said ranch being about one mile west from the house of Giles & Co., and embracing not exceeding, but about, one hundred and sixty acres." The plaintiff also claims $2,000 damages for the detention of the described premises and costs. The date of the summons is June 5, 1865. The date of the answer, which is a mere general denial of the allegations of the complaint, is not given in the transcript before this court. On the trial of the cause, the parties waived a jury, and the conclusions of law on the facts found, as stated by the court, were as follows: "That judgment must be entered for plaintiff for the possession of about eighty acres of land, or so much of defendant's claim as may encroach on plaintiff's as originally stepped and staked by him, one-quarter of a mile wide and one mile long, according to the description contained in plaintiff's complaint, with damages in the sum of six hundred dollars, for the wrongful taking and detention of said lands, to-wit, about eighty acres at the eastern end of plaintiff's claims as described as aforesaid; and that execution issue according to law for the said sum of money; and that the sheriff, by a writ of restitution, put the plaintiff in possession of said lands, as aforesaid; and for all costs and disbursements in the said suit." The date of the trial and decision of the court are not given; but the transcript states that judgment was entered thereupon, with costs taxed at $89.90, May 9, 1866, which was probably meant for 1865, as appears from subsequent dates. There appear to have been no exceptions made at the trial, and no further proceedings in the case, till January 22, 1866, when the defendant gave notice of his appeal "from the whole judgment entered against him," and "which is [generally] assigned as error, as being contrary to law, and not supported by the facts found."

It is not necessary to cite all the facts here. A condensed statement of them will, however, show that they fully sustain the judgment rendered in the case. From these it appears that the plaintiff, Davis, took possession of the land in controversy about the 11th of November, 1864, measured it, put up a summer-house of poles planted in the ground, covered with brush, and placed a written notice of his claim thereupon. The plaintiff sowed a small piece of wheat November 12, 1864, and cultivated about six acres on the upper part of his claim as described. It appears that the plaintiff saw no improvement on this land as described, and did not know of the defendant's claim till about the 1st of the succeeding April. On the 2d of the succeeding January he filed with the county recorder a copy of the notice fixed to his building on the 11th of November, 1864. It appears, from the facts as found by the court, and which seem not to be denied or controverted, that on the 10th or 12th of December, 1864, the defendant took possession of the land in controversy, and so much more as formed with it a square, measured it by stepping, and planted stakes for corner marks, and soon after hauled some logs for a cabin, and broke about one acre of land on the tract in controversy. The defendant's building was not finished for a considerable time afterwards, in consequence of the snow. It further appears that the defendant, on the 4th of May, 1865, prevented the plaintiff from going or cutting grass on the land in controversy; that he cultivated a portion of it, and gathered from it about 28,000 pounds of hay, which he sold at $45 per ton. The defendant himself testifies on the trial that he saw the plaintiff's house when he first went and set his stakes on the land in controversy; and it appears that the defendant's father, for whom the land was originally taken up, had seen the plaintiff's notice. As early as January, 1865, it seems the Messrs. Steinbrook talked with defendant on the land in controversy, as to the location or building of the plaintiff thereon. The land in controversy was part of the public domain of the United States, and, at the time referred to, unsurveyed.

The essential legal requisites of a possessory right in lands here, are the intention of the occupant permanently to occupy and improve the same for his home, and the manifestation of that intention, as early as practicable, by such improvements and badges of ownership as shall make it known to others. By our act, Comp. Laws, p. 536, § 1, any settlement, cultivation, or improvement in pursuance of this intention is sufficient to secure this right. This intention of permanent occupancy as a home, and sufficient improvement to proclaim it to the world, are all that our act concerning possessory rights in public lands, or the homestead laws of the United States, require. The plaintiff's intention to occupy the land in question as a home seems to have been continued at great peril, until he was ousted by the defendant early in 1865. His simple improvements and badges of ownership were competent notice of ownership to all the world. They were quite equal to those of defendant, with the legal advantage of a whole month's priority. The conclusion, therefore, is that the plaintiff ought to have restitution of the land which he claims in the present case.

The damage of $600 is not excessive; for it appears that the defendant, in a single season, cut and sold hay of about that value from the premises in controversy.

The narrow elongation of the plaintiff's land, as described in his complaint, cannot invalidate his claim, or enable the defendant to appropriate any portion of it. Its width is equal to that of the 40-acre unit of the federal surveys; its length is not greater than the square mile from which that unit is obtained by subdivision; while, like the linear bases of the federal surveys, it extends due east and west, or as nearly so as the crude measurements of both parties, without instruments, could make it. For aught this court can determine, the plaintiff's claim may correspond to four continuous connected 40-acre tracts, yet to be indicated by those surveys, or even a slight variation, may be susceptible of easy territorial and legal adjustment.

The plaintiff's offer to buy his peace and avoid a lawsuit, for $75, was not the surrender of any legal advantage, or the admission of an adverse claim, rejected, as it seems to have been, by the defendant, to whom it was made. Part of the syllabi of some cases were cited without comment as adverse to the present case, which was submitted without oral argument. On examination, however, they do not seem to have such analogy of fact to the present case as to make them legal precedents for its determination. Surely the Arizona settler, who suffers so much peril and privation in the location of his homestead, ought not to be ousted by precedents of doubtful application, born elsewhere of the mere safety and comforts of more favored regions. The determination of fact, and the conclusions of law, in the present case, are stated by the court below in its written decision with considerable prolixity and informality, but with sufficient certainty to show that the judgment entered thereon ought to be maintained. The order of this court, therefore, is that the judgment of the district court of the third judicial district in the present case be affirmed, and that it be remanded there for execution.

ASSUMPSIT—IMPLIED PROMISE TO PAY.

No promise to pay is implied from a mere use of personal property with the permission of the owner.

Appeal from district court, Mohave county.

Davis & Henning, for appellants. Murphy & Blakely, for respondent.

DUNNE, C. J. This is an action to recover for the use of personal property, based upon the assumption that the law implies a promise to pay, from the fact of use with the permission of the owner. It is in fact for the rent of a house; but the complaint alleges that the house is personal property. It was demurred, among other things, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Demurrer sustained, and judgment for the defendant. The appeal is from the order sustaining the demurrer.

The appeal being from the judgment on the demurrer, the allegation in the complaint that the property used was personal property must, for the purposes of this hearing, be taken as true, whether in law or in fact it was really so or not. The complaint does not allege any hiring of the property, any request for its use, any contract concerning it, any promise to pay any sum for its use, nor that defendant is indebted in any sum to plaintiff, but simply alleges that defendant used the property with permission of plaintiff; that such use was reasonably worth the sum claimed; and that defendant has not paid the same, or any part thereof. This is not sufficient in the matter of personal property. We express no opinion as to whether it would be good for real property, but, if it were true of personal property, there is no end to the number of annoying actions which might be instituted and maintained. A person says to another, "My horse is in such a stable. Any time you would like to ride, go and take him;" or "I have such and such books in my library. Any time you want them, make use of them." Or, by permission of plaintiff, a person might make use of any other article of personal property. But to say that such use, by such permission, raises an implied contract to pay what such use is worth is not sustained by law. An allegation that defendant hired an article of personal property has been held to imply that the matter was a business transaction, and implied a promise to pay what the use was reasonably worth. Emery v. Fell, 2 Term R. 28. But there was no allegation here of hiring, request, contract, indebtedness, or promise to pay. Except on a contract or state of facts which imports a legal liability, a promise by defendant must be averred. Gould, Pl. 73; Candler v. Rossiter, 10 Wend. 487. The demurrer in this case was good, and was properly sustained, but, as the court sustained the demurrer on different grounds, the judgment is set aside, as may be done by Comp. Laws, p. 447, § 347. An order sustaining the demurrer is affirmed, with the qualification added that plaintiff may have the usual time to amend, to date from the notice given him by the clerk of the district court of the filing in his office of a certified copy of this opinion. All costs to abide the final result.

TWEED, J., concurs.

PORTER, J., concurred, except as to the qualification added.

COLE v. BEAN et ux.<sup>2</sup>

(Supreme Court of Arizona, Jan., 1877.)

CANCELLATION OF DEED.

On a bill to set aside a deed, judgment for plaintiff cannot be sustained, where, by the findings and decree, the instrument is found to be a mortgage made to secure a debt to third persons.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

FRENCH, C. J. Neither the judgment nor decree in this case can be sustained under the pleadings. The plaintiff, by his complaint, asks that a certain deed from plaintiff to Mary M. Bean, wife of Curtis C. Bean, be canceled and held for naught, on the grounds that he was incapacitated at the time of its execution, and that the execution of the same was procured by fraud and conspiracy; and asks also an injunction against defendants, Bean and his wife, pending the action. The answer does not properly deny some of the allegations of the complaint. But no objection to any of those imperfect denials appears to have been taken by the plaintiff, and evidence was introduced by plaintiff in support of the allegations of the complaint, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as would have been done if all the denials in the answer had been perfect. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved for a nonsuit, which the court denied. There was no error in this denial. The motion for nonsuit was frivolous. The testimony first introduced by plaintiff, in support of his complaint, was strictly and entirely correspondent to its allegations, and tended strongly to support the same, making a formidable prima facie showing in the case. But afterwards, the evidence takes another and different line, not included in the issues, or responsive to the allegations of the complaint. There must be substantial correspondence between the allegations and the evidence. But throwing all the evidence, with the objections to the same, out of the record in this case, the incompatibility of the pleadings with the findings and decree still confronts us. It was not necessary for a reversal that the evidence and the voluminous transcript in this case should have been brought up. If the pleadings, findings, and decree only had been brought here, a reversal must have resulted. Even on the judgment roll alone the error fully appears. The complaint does not support the decree. In the findings and decree, the instrument sought to be set aside by plaintiff's complaint is found to be a mortgage executed to a married woman, the wife of Bean, to secure indebtedness to other persons or parties.

Leaving out of view all questions of the conformity of the pleadings to the case made by the evidence, the pleadings, findings, and decree in this case are not only inconsistent with the issues made by the pleadings, but are also inconsistent with each other; and, viewing the findings and decree separately, and without any relation of the one to the other, each of them is inconsistent with itself. On page 116 of the transcript, the complaint in the case, and also the deed from plaintiff to Mrs. Bean, are both made a part of the findings, as follows: "Which said complaint, and said exhibit, [the deed above mentioned,] are made a part of the findings herein, and a part hereof." This is entirely inconsistent with the findings of the judge in the case. It is a part of the duty of attorneys to see that the findings are within the issues, and that the judgment or decree be supported by both the pleadings and the findings. This seems to have been either overlooked or entirely lost sight of for the time being by the learned counsel of respondent in the latter part of the proceeding in the court below. The learned judge of that court seems to have been intent on doing no injustice to any party, but substantial justice to all. The decree was not drawn in accordance with the findings, although expressly ordered by him at the close of his findings to be so made. The cause has been ably argued on both sides at the bar of this court, especially so on the part of respondent; but, on the grounds stated above, the findings must be set aside, and the judgment and decree reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, and it has been so ordered. The associate justices concurred.

EQUITY—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—CAPACITY TO CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

1. In equity, a party cannot demand the submission of issues to a jury.

3. Persons not experts may testify as to the effect of liquor on one with whom they are familiar.
4. Declarations of an agent, made after the transaction in question, are admissible if his agency continues.

Appeal from district court, Yavapai county.

Thomas Fitch, for appellant. Rush & Wells, for respondents.

FRENCH, C. J. The hearing of the appeal in this cause in the supreme court, without the usual copies being furnished, was had by agreement of the parties, and consent of the court, to save the hearing of the appeal from going over the yearly term. No copy of the transcript has been furnished since the hearing. I am therefore without a transcript of record in this case. On the decision of the case in the district court, I filed an opinion of some length, which, by statutory provision, and also by stipulation, has been embodied in the transcript, and goes with the record in this case. That is the opinion of a single district judge at nisi prius, but, after the able, elaborate, and exhaustive arguments of appellants in the supreme court, I have found nothing in that opinion which, in my capacity as one of the justices of the higher court, I wish to change. The present opinion, under these circumstances, must be somewhat summary.

At the commencement of the hearing of this case in the district court, counsel for defendant presented certain special questions, and asked that these questions be submitted to a jury. If the case were one at law, instead of equity, it would not be permissible for one party to the action to frame certain specific issues or questions.

and ask a jury to determine these against the objection of the other party to the action, and without the sanction of the court. Such a mode of proceeding would be in derogation of the rights of the opposite party, and a trenching on the powers and functions of this court. But the present is an equity proceeding purely. Our statutory enactments in this regard conform to those of California, whose courts have uniformly denied the right to trial by jury in equity cases. In the United States courts, the same rule has been established. Chief Justice MARSHALL, in Harding v. Handy, 6 Curt. Dec. 534, says: "An issue, indeed, might have been directed; but we do not think it a case in which this course ought to have been pursued. The degree of weakness, or of imposition, which ought to induce a court of chancery to set aside a conveyance, is proper for the consideration of the court itself; and there seems to be no reason for the intervention of a jury, unless the case be one in which the court would be satisfied with the verdict, however it might be found. A verdict affirming the capacity of W. C. to execute these deeds on the ninth day of May, 1805, could not, we think, have been satisfactory to the court, and it was, consequently, not necessary to refer the question of competency to a jury." It is generally impracticable for the chancellor to know or determine, before at least a partial hearing, whether a jury would be proper or not.

The objection taken to the testimony of Hattie Wells, as to Cole's condition, that is, the degree and intensity of his intoxication on the latter part of October, and first of November, and extended to the testimony of many other witnesses on this point, cannot, I think, be sustained on reason or authority. An examination of cases like the present will show that, where the question was the mental condition at a certain day, the testimony, both under and without objection, has extended back not a few days only, but for months and years.

It is also objected that testimony of persons not experts was received as to the effect of liquor on Cole. I think this testimony is proper. If the witness, from long-continued and intimate association, knows the facts from his personal intercourse, his testimony is proper. An expert can say what the general effects would be; can testify as to the effect of liquor, drugs, poison, or food upon persons generally. The expert can say, for example, that the common article of food, cheese, is a common article of diet, wholesome and agreeable to people in general, but to some persons the most detested and abhorrent, and fatal to health, and even life. The witness, who speaks from his own personal knowledge, knows to which of these classes the person concerning whom the scrutiny is made belongs. In other words, he knows the effect of that article of food upon the particular individual inquired about much better than the mere expert. So, of drugs and poisons, the witness who speaks from personal knowledge can tell the effects on the particular person more surely than the expert, who lacks these personal observations; the evidence is more direct and positive, and thus more decisive.

Elaborate objections were taken by defendants to the declarations of Mr. Bean, made after the transaction of the deed, and because these declarations, as to the transaction, were made after Bean, acting as the agent of his wife, had procured the deed in question. I am entirely clear that the objection that these declarations ought not to be received as evidence, because not made at or about the very time of the execution of the deed, dum opus ferret, cannot be sustained. Mr. Bean was the agent of his wife before these transactions, and continued to be her agent all the time, from the time of the execution of the deed up to the time of the commencement of the suit. When these declarations were made, he was in the very midst of other transactions of, and concerning, and connected with, the subject-matter of the main transaction, viz., the deed between his wife and the plaintiff. If any one thing is more clear than another, it is this: that all this business was entirely conducted and transacted by Mr. Bean, as he testifies, constantly, as the agent of his wife. The objection, therefore, that these declarations form no part of the res gestæ has no application at all on this point.

The only question necessary to consider here is, had Mr. Bean, before he made these declarations, ceased to be the agent of Mrs. Bean? Had his authority as her agent in this business ceased? The admissibility of the declarations must be determined solely by the answer to these questions. The law applicable to this point is well expressed in the case of Stewartson v. Watts, 8 Watts, 392; also found in Dunlap's Paley, Ag. (Ed. 1856,) p. 256, note. I quote from the syllabus of the case in Watts: "When some evidence of the existence of an agency has been given, it is competent to give in evidence the acts and declarations of such agent respecting the subject-matter of his authority; and whether his agency had then ceased, or was continued, must be submitted as a fact to the jury, with the direction that, if his authority had ceased, his acts and declarations are to be disregarded." It is not claimed that Mr. Bean's acts or authority as agent of Mrs. Bean had ceased at or before the time of these declarations. In fact, it affirmatively appears from the record that he continued to act as such agent. Judgment affirmed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT.

Under Comp. Laws Ariz. p. 248, § 4, making only the interest of the person causing the building to be erected, or materials to be furnished, subject to the lien therefor, it is error to decree a sale of the whole property under a lien for materials furnished to one in possession under a contract of purchase, without ordering payment of the unpaid purchase price.

Appeal from district court, Gila county.
A. C. Baker and Lemon McCabe, for appellants. William Graves, for respondent.

PINNEY, J. This is an action for the enforcing of a mechanic's lien for material furnished. Section 4 of the lien law (Comp. Laws, p. 248) provides: "The land upon which any building or superstructure shall be erected, together with a convenient space around the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of the premises, shall also be subject to the lien created by this act, if at the time the work and labor was done, or the material furnished, the said land belonged to the person who caused the said building, superstructure, or other work to be erected; but if said person owned less than a fee-simple estate in such lands, then only his interest therein shall be subject to such liens, and the liens created by this act shall be preferred to every other lien or incumbrance which shall have been attached upon said property subsequent to the time at which the work was commenced or the materials furnished; but nothing herein contained shall be construed as impairing any valid incumbrance upon the said lands duly made and recorded before such work was commenced or materials furnished." Bremen entered into an agreement on the 29th day of November, 1879, with Foreman and others, to supply boards, timber, shingles, etc., to be used in the construction and repairing of a certain mill building, and between that date and the 1st day of March, 1880, Bremen had furnished a large amount of material for the erection of a mill on some mining property which Foreman had purchased on the 11th day of October, 1879, from S. Silverburg, Hammerslag, and Collingwood. They being the owners of the mill property, the interest of Foreman in the premises rested upon an agreement for the sale and conveyance of said property. One provision in the agreement was that Foreman should expend the sum of $7,000 in making improvements upon the property to successfully operate and run a quartz-mill. Foreman was immediately put in possession of the premises under the contract. On the 24th day of December, 1880, Silverburg, Hammerslag, and Collingwood, by a quitclaim deed, conveyed to L. J. Webster the property and premises in question. The court below, after finding the facts, decreed a sale of the whole premises, including the interest of Webster as well as the interest of Foreman, and from the decree appellants appeal to this court, and assign, among other causes of error, the rendering of the decree against Webster's interest in the property. This was clearly error, for the statute expressly provides that only the interest of the party who caused the building to be erected, or the materials to be furnished, shall be subject to such liens.

The contract, in this case, for the furnishing of materials was not made with Webster or his grantors, but with Foreman and those acting with him. What, then, was the interest of Foreman in the property in question? For it is upon that interest that the material-man must rely for his remedy. Webster, standing in the shoes of his grantors, has the same rights and protection that they would have had, and his fee cannot be taken from him lawfully until the purchase money and interest thereon be fully paid him. Foreman's interest in the premises may be subject to sale in this proceeding. The lien of Bremen is on the interest Foreman had in the premises. The decree should declare the rights of the several parties as herein indicated, subject to the rights of Webster as they existed under the contract between Silverburg, Collingwood, and Hammerslag to Foreman at the time the material was furnished by Bremen, and, in default of payment to Bremen, that the premises should be sold, and from the proceeds the amount due under the contract of sale from Silverburg, Collingwood, and Hammerslag to Foreman should be first paid to Webster, and then the material-man, Bremen, should be paid the amount of the lien; and the remainder, if any, after paying these demands and the costs, should be paid to Webster.

The decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings; and it is so ordered.

TIME OF HOLDING COURTS—EVIDENCE—WATER-RIGHTS.

1. Act. Cong. Aug. 16, 1856, § 5, (Rev. St. U. S. § 1920,) providing that the judges of the supreme court in each of the territories shall fix the times and places of holding the several courts in their respective districts, is not repealed by Act June 14, 1858, (11 St. at Large, 366,) which leaves the authority to fix county courts to the territories, and the judges may fix times for the district courts different from those appointed by the legislature.

2. An exception to a charge, in ejectment, that plaintiff cannot recover if defendant has been in possession a certain time, is waived by a contention that defendant is a tenant in common, as no recovery could be had in such case.

3. A tenancy in common to a water-ditch, arising under a deed, is not severed by claiming under a promise or parol license from a third person, where the deed and promise appear to be parts of the transaction.

4. Plaintiffs are estopped to deny defendant's water-rights in a ditch by declarations of their grantor while in possession, that the grantor of defendant had the right to a certain part of the water, relying on which declaration defendant bought and entered into possession prior to plaintiffs' purchase.

5. An exception to a charge requiring a preponderance of evidence to entitle to a verdict is frivolous.

TITUS, C. J. Judgment for the defendant, Daniel W. Shivers, in the district court of the third judicial district, at the suit of the plaintiffs, John G. Campbell and James M. Baker, for the alleged unlawful use of water in irrigation, is the cause of this appeal. The appellants here were the plaintiffs below, the defendant there is the respondent here; and the record, by the transcript, discloses the following conclusions of fact: In the month of March, 1867, the defendant moved to Chino valley, in the county of Yavapai, near Ft. Whipple, about 25 miles north of Prescott, took possession of the ranch which he now occupies, and has ever since occupied the same. Along with this, (his ranch,) he has ever since used, and still continues to use, for purposes of irrigation, one-fourth of the water which flows through a certain ditch or drain, not only to or through the defendant's ranch, but also to or through the ranches of Robert Postle, George Banghart, and the ranch of the plaintiffs. The use of the one-fourth of the water flowing through the ditch or drain above described, from February 1, 1870, to January 1, 1872, is the wrong of which the plaintiffs complain; and they claim, with their costs, damages in the sum of $2,000, which they aver they have suffered by this alleged unlawful use of the water described. The defendant denies that his use of the water described was unlawful at all, denies that he has damaged the plaintiffs, and asks to be dismissed with his costs. This is the issue tried in the court below, and the correctness of the verdict and judgment thereupon in favor of the defendant is the question to be reviewed here in this court.

It is to be regretted that the settlement in Chino valley, of which the property in question constitutes part, was not more fully and correctly described than it is in the record of the present case. The ranch of the plaintiffs, in two of the deeds submitted in evidence on the trial of the case, is described as situated west of Postle's ranch; while the same ranch, in two other deeds submitted in evidence on the trial of the case, is described as situated north of Postle's ranch. The order of the several ranches on the ditch or drain, which conducts the water for their common irrigation, is not given; while their boundaries are entirely omitted, not only in the pleadings and evidence, but even in such deeds of them as have been submitted in evidence on the trial of this cause. The water-right in controversy is wholly omitted from the original deed of the plaintiffs' title, as the same appears in evidence, while their counsel is found denying the defendant's claim to contest this very right with them, because of the same omission from his own deed. The court is thus left to conjecture, and counsel are involved in absurdity on matters of the utmost importance in the discussion of questions such as the present case presents. It seems that Postle's ranch is above all others on the ditch or drain which is the common medium of supply, and about three-quarters of a mile from the mass of the water upon which all depend. The relative positions of the plaintiffs' and defendant's ranches do not appear except from conjecture. Of all those who depend on a single drain or ditch for water, it is impossible for any one to exhaust or reduce the supply of others, excepting such as are below him on the same ditch or drain. The plaintiffs claim that the defendant has done this for them. From this, it would seem to be a presumption of fact, therefore, that the ranch of the defendant is higher up the ditch or drain, and nearer the common source of the water supply, than the ranch of the plaintiffs. Of ranches located or selected for purposes of irrigation, other things being equal, those nearest the water supply are first chosen. From this, it would also seem to be a presumption of fact that the ranch of the defendant must have been located, if not anterior to, at least contemporaneous with, that of the plaintiffs. The legal deductions from these presumptions of fact will be stated hereafter. Further reference to the facts of this case will be made in connection with the points to which they pertain. No assignment of error has been made in this case excepting such as appear in the briefs of counsel.

The points presented by the counsel of the appellants against the judgment in this case are as follows: "(1) The court erred in charging the jury that, if defendant had been in possession of the said property for five years, plaintiffs must fail in this action. The owners of the property in question were tenants in common of the water-right, the possession of one being the possession of all. (2) The court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by plaintiffs of a meeting held by Banghart, Brown, and Postle, in which the two former refused to let defendant have any of the water claimed by them; that Postle said he would let him have part of his; and that there was no other understanding between them. (3) The court erred in refusing to give the third instruction asked for by plaintiff's counsel: 'That defendant, having asserted a right under the deed of Degrallo, is bound by it, and that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until he claims under the right now set up by him.' (4) The court erred in charging the jury that plaintiffs were estopped by the declarations of Brown. (5) The court erred in its charge to the jury that there must be a preponderance of evidence in favor of plaintiffs to enable them to recover. (6) The court should have sustained the objection of the plaintiffs: 'That the court was not legally in session.'"

As the last of the above-cited exceptions is first in practical order, and, if allowed, must impel this court to reverse the judgment in the present case, it is proposed to consider it first. The legislature of this territory has, from its origin, assumed that it is authorized to fix the terms of the supreme and district courts. Till the present case, no conflict has arisen on this subject between this court and the legislature, because the practice of the court has been to adopt and ratify the action of the legislature in regard to the terms of the district courts. At its session of 1871, the legislature enacted on this subject, as follows: "The district courts, in the several counties of the territory, shall be held as follows, to-wit: 'In the county of Pima, on the first Mondays of March and October of each year; in the county of Yuma, on the third Monday in March, and the first Monday in November, of each year; in the county of Yavapai, on the third Mondays in June and November of each year.'" This distribution of the terms of the district courts was undoubtedly a defective execution of the order of congress, because it contained no limitation to the sessions of the court. It was just such legislation as enabled a Mormon district judge to sit one hundred and twenty days, not for the transaction of business, but to charge the federal government an enormous bill of expenses, — an abuse, or rather one of the abuses, which induced the act of congress of 1856, which will be cited hereafter. The ratifying order of the supreme court supplied this defect by imposing the necessary limitation. It was found, however, that the interval, only two weeks, between the Yuma and Yavapai terms was absolutely too brief to enable the United States district attorney to transact the United States business at one of these courts, and reach the other in time for it there. Accordingly, the legislature was invited to join the judges of the supreme court in amending this order, not because these judges doubted their power to make the order alone, but to avoid every appearance of disrespect towards the legislature, and all possibility of exception, such as has been taken in the present case. The legislature refused to act, and the judges of the supreme court, not doubting their authority, made and promulgated the following order: "Order of the supreme court of Arizona. Until the further order of this court, the terms of the district courts of the several districts of the territory of Arizona shall, respectively, commence at the times hereafter mentioned, and shall continue so long as may be necessary to transact the business before the respective courts, and no longer: In the first district, on the first Monday in March, and the first Monday in October; in the second district, on the first Monday in April, and the first Monday in December; and in the third district, on the first Monday in June, and first Monday in November. By order of the court, February 11, 1873. [Signed] JOHN TITUS, C. J. C. A. TWEED, ASSO. JUSTICE. DE FOREST PORTER, ASSO. JUSTICE." In the order thus made, this court imposed upon the terms the only limit practicable in the case; that is, the whole of the two periods between the commencements of the respective terms. The court limited the sessions of the respective district courts to the time necessary to transact the business before the respective courts. The changes thus made in the terms of the respective courts were imperatively necessary for the transaction of the judicial business of this territory. The session and term of the district court of the third judicial district, and in and to which the exception of the present case was taken, was the semi-annual term for both federal and territorial business, and for the whole district, with juries, grand and petit, called from all parts of such district.

The authority of this court to make the order in question is derived from Act Cong. Aug. 16, 1856, (11 St. at Large, p. 49,) which is as follows: "Sec. 5. That the judges of the supreme court in each of the territories, or a majority of them, shall, when assembled in their respective seats of government, fix and appoint the several times and places of holding the several courts in their respective districts, and limit the duration of the terms thereof: provided, that the said courts shall not be held at more than three places in any one territory: and provided, further, that the judge or judges holding such courts shall adjourn the same, without day, at any time before the expiration of such terms, whenever, in his or their opinion, the further continuance thereof is not necessary." A brief reference to the character and history of the act of which the section cited is part will show that it is fundamental to all the territories, remains unrepealed, and will probably so continue till the last territory shall take its place in the galaxy of states. This act consists of 15 sections, and its title shows its comprehensive character,—"An act to amend the acts regulating the fees, costs, and other judicial expenses of the government, in the states, territories, and District of Columbia, and for other purposes." No part of this act appears to have been repealed, certainly not the provision applicable to the present case, as appears by the large volume of our new Federal Code. § 1920, recently published. The history of this act is one of much interest. Before and at the time of its passage, considerable dissatisfaction had existed, in most if not all the territories, with the operations of the federal government. "Territorial sovereignty" was announced as a favorite dogma of a certain school of active politicians. In Kansas and Utah, organized resistance, more or less flagrant, was made to the federal officers, especially the judges of the district courts. The president of the United States, during the session of congress by which this act was passed, in his "Proclamation respecting disturbances in Kansas," (11 St. at Large, p. 791,) uses this language, in respect to the territory of Kansas: "It appearing that combinations have been formed therein to resist the execution of the territorial laws, and thus, in effect, subvert by violence all present constitutional and legal authority," etc. Part of this system was to intimidate or embarrass the federal judges, and thus prevent their administration. In Utah, the state of society was, if possible, worse than in Kansas. Two years later, it there culminated in armed rebellion, so that the president of the United States, in his proclamation respecting the rebellion and Mormon troubles in the territory of Utah, (Id. p. 796,) employs, among other topics, this language: "Judges have been violently interrupted in the performance of their functions, and the records of the courts have been seized, and either destroyed or concealed." There, as in Kansas, the legislature embarrassed the federal judges not of Mormon faith by denying them all legal aid, such as refusing to fix the times and places of their sessions. It was this last practice which induced the act of 1856, above cited, enabling the federal judges to fix their own terms. Enormous expenses were accumulated against the federal government by all in Utah whom the Mormons could control. This led to the severe system of accounting provided for in the act under consideration.

Careful consideration of section 5 of the act of 1856, above cited, shows that it intended to enable the United States judges in the territories to appoint the terms of their own district courts, independently of legislative control. No respectable authority, it is submitted, has been, or can be, cited which conflicts with this conclusion. The opinion of Judge Conkling certainly does not. His treatise was written 8 years before the organic act of New Mexico was passed, and 20 years before Arizona was organized. Commenting on this topic in his treatise, (page 201,) he says: "But, by a general act of August 16, 1856, c. 124, (11 St. at Large, p. 49,) the judges of the supreme court of the several territories are required"—this is his own language—to do what? "When assembled at their respective seats of government, to fix and appoint the several times and places of holding the several courts in their respective districts," etc. The learned commentator has misquoted the law under consideration, but he has not so far mistaken as to deny its true operation; for he not only concedes to the judges of the territorial supreme courts the authority to fix the terms of their respective district courts, but declares they are required to do so. The act of June 14, 1858, (11 St. at Large, p. 366,) furnishes no rule for the construction of the act of 1856, already cited. It is perfectly apparent that, were the authority given the federal judges to fix the times and places, or either, of holding the county courts, without anything more, such grant of authority would be futile. The judges would have no means of paying the expenses of these courts, and the United States refuse to pay them. Congress did not intend to confer on the federal judges of the territories the authority to appoint county courts, while withholding from them the means of its execution. It has wisely left the authority of fixing the county courts to the territories, or the counties themselves, by which the expenses are to be paid. This was obviously the intention of congress in making this difference between these statutes, and not "forgetfulness" of the act of 1856. The case of Klopfer v. Keller, 1 Colo. 410, is no authority in this case. It was tried at a special county court, in which the act of 1856 could not legitimately come in question. It presents, therefore, the case of a mere obiter dictum, decided under a Colorado statute, passed in accordance with the organic law of that territory framed in 1861. Chief Justice HALLETT, who announced this dictum, based it on the fact that the enabling power of congress in the organic law of Colorado, and the territorial statute passed under it, were both subsequent to the congressional act of 1856. Our organic law, on the contrary, is six years prior to the act of 1856. The cases cited in the case above entitled are not more applicable to the courts of this territory than the principal one. Dunphy v. Kleinsmith, 11 Wall. 610, is more applicable to the case in controversy than the opinion cited in argument from Conkling, or that of Klopfer v. Keller, from 1 Colo. 410. In that case, the power of a Montana court to try an equity case by jury was absolutely denied, and the legitimacy of a jury of nine was seriously questioned by the supreme court of the United States, with all the power a territorial legislature can confer. This case shows that the powers conferred by congress on the United States courts in the territories are not to be impaired by territorial legislation. The supreme judges of this territory, therefore, had the power to appoint the regular terms of the district courts for each of the several entire districts; and this exception to the contrary is overruled.

The error first assigned on the brief of appellants' counsel, and the one next to be considered, is as follows: "(1) The court erred in charging the jury that, if defendant had been in possession of the said property five years, plaintiffs must fail in this action." To this the appellants' counsel adds: "The owners of the property in question were tenants in common of the ditch and water-right, the possession of one being the possession of all." The latter statement is certainly true, and it is an abandonment of this exception. This unity of possession, which makes the defendant a tenant in common with the plaintiffs, protects him from all disturbance by them, or either of them. He can call upon them to account for any invasion of his rights, and his unity of possession can only be dissolved by proceedings in partition, or by amicable agreement. If this is not so, then, from all that appears in the present case, the five years and some months which elapsed between the defendant's entry upon the enjoyment of the water-right in March, 1867, and the institution of this suit in August, 1872, must bar the plaintiffs' recovery. Comp. Laws, p. 331, § 3. From all that appears in the present case, therefore, the defendant is entitled to the protection which is due to a tenant in common, or to the statute of limitations, and, in either event, this exception must be, and is, overruled.

The next exception is as follows: "(2) The court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by plaintiffs of a meeting held by Banghart, Brown, and Postle in which the two former refused to let defendant have any of the water claimed by them; that Postle said he would let him have some of his; and that there was no other understanding between the parties." No legal right of the plaintiffs was infringed by the rejection of this evidence. The defendant was not present at this meeting, either personally or by representation. The declarations of the persons present, whether confined to the parties themselves or communicated to the defendant, could not affect his legal rights, unless it should appear that he, in some way, accepted or assented to them. It does not appear that his acceptance or assent was shown, or proposed to be shown. This exception is therefore overruled.

The third exception is as follows: "(3) The court erred in refusing to give the third instruction asked for by plaintiffs' counsel: 'That defendant, having asserted a right under the deed of Degrallo, is bound by it, and that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until he claims under the right now set up by him.'" It does not clearly appear, either from the record or the argument upon it, what is meant by this exception. To be at all available for the plaintiffs, it must be found to refer to some portion of the evidence in the case. The only portion of the evidence in the case, to which this exception appears to be responsive, is defendant's allegation that, "early in 1867, Brown offered him a ranch in Chino valley, as an inducement for him to bring his family, and settle there." This seems to be that which this exception describes as "the right now set up by him." The exception assumes that this is, in some way, fatally conflicting with the "defendant's having asserted a right under the deeds of Degrallo," and that this severed the tenancy in common, which is asserted by the plaintiffs' first exception, and formed an era in the case which put the statute of limitations in active operation. Such, however, is not the legal effect of this testimony. There is really no conflict in the defendant's claiming at one time under Degrallo's deed, and, at another, under Brown's promise. They are parts of one complex transaction, in which the deed appears as the fulfillment of the promise previously made. The defendant might, at one time, assert that Brown's promise was the consideration which actuated him; at another, the $500 mentioned in Degrallo's deed; at another, the deed itself; and at other times, any two of these, or all three of them together; and yet, by these, he would forfeit no legal right, and incur no legal hazard. The defendant, in his conversations on this subject with Brown himself, or with Brown's grantees, would naturally refer to Brown's promise, with strangers, to Degrallo's deed; and, in stating the cost of his ranch and water-right to anybody, he might allege the $500 mentioned in the deed, by which he and his must expect to hold them, and be guilty of no breach of legal or moral truth, and incur no forfeiture or hazard. No error appears in the charge thus excepted to, and the exception must be overruled.

The fourth exception is as follows: "(4) The court erred in its charge to the jury that plaintiffs were estopped by the declarations of Brown." The exception does not fully state the charge of the judge upon the trial of this case, nor the evidence to which it refers. The charge was this: "Again, if Brown did represent to defendant, while he, Brown, was in possession of the property now claimed by the plaintiffs, that one-fourth of the water flowing in the ditch was the property of Degrallo, and used the inducements alleged to induce the defendant to go there, and settle, and defendant, relying on his representation, did so go to that valley, and enter upon the possession of the ranch and water-right, under and by virtue of any alleged purchase or agreement by Brown, or Brown and Postle, from or with Degrallo, these plaintiffs are estopped, as Brown himself would be, if he were the plaintiff in this action, from denying such right of defendant to one-fourth interest in the water-right forever after,—and this, if Degrallo never had any right or interest in the property whatever, or if there was no such man in being." The whole of this exception must be taken together with the evidence to which it refers, in estimating its legal effect in this case. On recurring to the testimony, we find that the defendant took possession of his ranch, and one-fourth of the water now in controversy, in March, 1867, and has ever since used and enjoyed both, and that the deed of Degrallo to defendant was recorded April 11, 1867. Brown's deed to Schneider is dated November, 1867; Schneider's deed to Campbell, one of the plaintiffs, and Buffum, is dated August, 1868; and Campbell's deed to Baker, the other plaintiff, is dated March, 1872. The only principle upon which Brown's grantees, the present plaintiffs, can deny the binding effect upon them of Brown's declarations concerning the water to the defendant would be that they had no notice of them. In respect to this, the presumption of law is that Campbell and Baker exercised ordinary diligence in ascertaining the conditions and relations of their ranch at the time they took possession of it in November, 1867, and in March, 1872. The law requires of them ordinary diligence, in all such matters as this water controversy, in which others are concerned. Vigilantibus non dormientibus subservit lex. The law will hardly take from the defendant his ditch water, and give it to the plaintiffs, in pity or approval of their self-imposed ignorance at the time they purchased their present ranch. The evidence shows that, if they then made the ordinary efforts to learn the extent of their water-rights, they found the defendant in possession and in enjoyment of the one-fourth of the water now in controversy, his deed of record for the ranch he occupied and farmed, and the public repute of the locality conceding the defendant's right to the water of which the plaintiffs now seek to deprive him. The evidence shows that John G. Campbell, one of the plaintiffs in this case, made his tenant, D. K. Poland, understand that the defendant owned the one-fourth of the water at the time of their engagement in 1868. It is somewhat significant that in Brown's deed to Schneider, of November 5, 1868, for the ranch which the plaintiffs now claim, there is no mention of any ditch or water-right whatever, and that the quantity is not stated in any of the subsequent deeds for the same property. If this court had any doubt of the conclusion above stated, the defendant's right could be maintained on the ground of parol license. It has none, however, and this exception must be, and is, overruled.

The fifth and last exception is as follows: "(5) The court erred in its charge to the jury that there must be a preponderance of evidence in favor of plaintiffs to entitle them to recover." The proposition thus excepted to would seem so axiomatic as to defy either question or discussion. If, in any case, the evidence should be equal on one side and on the other, how could the jury find a verdict at all? The jury would be compelled to agree to disagree in such a case, and thus the trial would fail. In cases such as this, if they actually do occur, it is the highest duty of the jury to disagree. To enable a jury, therefore, to find a verdict at all, in any case in which there is conflict of testimony, there must be a preponderance of evidence in favor of one side, and the jury must find it as a condition precedent to the rendition of their verdict. That the judge thus stated a truism to the jury on the trial of this case is no matter of successful exception, and this exception is accordingly overruled.

The exceptions of the appellants thus all fail, and there is nothing else in the record to show why the judgment in this case should not be affirmed. This conclusion, it is submitted, if there were any doubt of its legality, could be sustained on the evidence which the case presents of a parol license to the defendant of the water-right in controversy. And the same conclusion is reached by another most simple process of investigation. It was found as a presumption of fact in the statement of this case that the defendant was located higher up on the ditch, and nearer the source of water supply, than the plaintiffs; and also, as another presumption of fact, that his location was therefore older than theirs. By a very simple deduction, the legal conclusion therefore is, prior in tempore potior in jure, in the absence of all sufficient evidence to the contrary, that the defendant's right is better than the plaintiffs'. The judgment of the court below in the present case is therefore hereby affirmed.

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—VERBAL ACCEPTANCE.

An order drawn by a creditor on his debtor for the whole amount of the indebtedness operates as an equitable assignment of the debt to the payee, and a verbal acceptance of the order by the debtor is valid.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

L. F. Fisher and C. C. Stephen, for appellant. R. Dunnigan, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The findings show that Wing Yet Lung was on March 27, 1888, indebted to the firm of Joyce & Duncan in the sum of $643.30, and that firm being also indebted to the respondent in the same amount, they upon that day gave an order requesting the appellant to pay respondent the sum of $643.30. Said order was accepted by appellant and he paid thereon the sum of $300. Judgment was rendered against appellant for the balance of $343.30, and his motion for a new trial denied. Appellant's acceptance of the order drawn against him by the firm of Joyce & Duncan was only verbal, and upon the trial he objected to the admission of the evidence showing such verbal acceptance, and also to the introduction of the order itself, upon the ground that such acceptance, not being in writing, was not binding, and that the order itself was incompetent without a written acceptance, and these objections being overruled are assigned as error. The court did not err in overruling appellant's objection to this evidence. Wheatley v. Strobe, 12 Cal. 92. The evidence is sufficient to support the findings, and we find no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

REAL-ESTATE AGENTS—COMMISSION.

Defendant, having only possessory title to a reservoir dam site, appointed plaintiff his agent to sell it, informing him that he would get the legal title, and agreeing that plaintiff should have a certain amount if he effected a sale to be approved by defendant, or if defendant made a sale without consulting plaintiff. Thereafter defendant obtained the legal title, and sold the property. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to the amount provided by his contract.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Waters & Gird, for appellant. E. E. Rowell and Paris & Fox, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover two-fifths of the amount for which certain property was sold by defendant. The court gave judgment for plaintiff for $1,850.90, and defendant appeals. The defendant and other persons entered into a written contract with plaintiff by which plaintiff was appointed their agent to negotiate a sale of a certain reservoir dam site, situated on the San Jacinto river in San Diego county, and which they agreed that if plaintiff effected a sale to be approved by them, they would give him two-fifths of the purchase price, and that if they, themselves, made a sale without consulting plaintiff, he was to have the same percentage as though he had effected the sale. While this contract was still in force, and plaintiff was still their agent, they effected a sale without consulting him, and, on that sale, defendant received property of the value of $4,627, for two-fifths of which the judgment was rendered. At the trial, a great many exceptions were taken which are not referred to in appellant's brief, and which do not seem to present any material error. The real point insisted on by appellant is that the property sold was not the property mentioned in the contract. The facts on which this point rests are these: At the time of the contract defendant did not have the legal title to the reservoir dam site, but only a possessory title. He had posted notices claiming the site, and also certain water-rights, and claimed to be in possession. This site was on section 7, and was consequently railroad land. He told plaintiff that he had made arrangements with the railroad land agent, and that as soon as the land was graded and in the market, he would get title from the railroad company. Afterwards such title was procured, and although in the sale the property was described as so much land, it was the same land that constituted the reservoir dam site described in the contract, and was bought by the purchasers, Judson, Potts, and Mayberry, for the express purpose of a reservoir dam site, for which purpose it was mainly valuable. The facts, therefore, that a better title was procured after the making of the contract, and that the property was described in the sale as land, do not defeat the contract. It is clear that the property mentioned in the contract, and the property sold, was the same. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—VERDICT—JUDGMENT—UNCERTAINTY—DAMAGES.

1. In an action of claim and delivery, a verdict for plaintiff for the possession of the property, or its value, is good, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 627, prescribing what the verdict shall contain, but not requiring that there shall be any findings as to delivery.

2. In an action of claim and delivery against a constable for property taken on execution, where damages are claimed for both the taking and the detention, a verdict for damages in a certain sum is good, though it does not specify whether the damages are for the taking, or the detention, or for both.

3. An objection to the form of the verdict, in that it omits to state whether the damages given are for the taking, or the detention, or for both, cannot be urged for the first time on appeal.

4. Where the verdict and judgment for plaintiff for part of the property are silent as to the balance, and defendant in his answer asks for the return of the property, which from the record appears to be in plaintiff's possession, the judgment will be so modified as to require plaintiff to return to defendant that part as to which the verdict and judgment are silent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

G. W. Langan, for appellant. D. M. Connor, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action of claim and delivery was for the recovery of the possession of certain horses and colts and two mowers, or their value, and damages for their taking and detention. The defendant admits the taking of the property, as a constable, under a writ of execution on a judgment against Jeremiah Ryan, the assignee of the plaintiff. The cause was tried by a jury, who returned this verdict: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find for the plaintiff the possession of the following property: The horses and colts described in the complaint, or their value, the sum of $1,225, with damages in the sum of $48.55." Upon that verdict a judgment was rendered for the plaintiff that he have and receive possession of the property mentioned in the verdict, specifying it, "or for the sum of $1,225, the value thereof, in case a delivery thereof cannot be had, and in case a delivery of any portion thereof cannot be had, then for the value of such portion of said property, together with $48.55 damages, and for costs taxed at $39.50." From this judgment, an appeal is taken on the judgment roll, and the appellant claims a reversal thereof, because: "The verdict is uncertain in this: It does not provide for a delivery of the property to the plaintiff, if delivery can be had, and does not, nor does the judgment, state for what the damages are given. The complaint claims damages for taking as well as for detention. Damages for detention only are permitted, and, so far as appears, the damages may have been awarded for the taking only." It was unnecessary that the verdict should have provided for any delivery of the property, if such could be had. When the jury found the right of possession to be in the plaintiff, then the conclusion of law followed, as provided in section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that he was entitled to delivery, if it could be had, and, if not, to the value of the property as found by the jury in the alternative. This the judgment must contain, but not the verdict; for, as to the judgment, the form of it must be as provided in the section of the Code of Civil Procedure supra, but section 627 of the same Code, which prescribes what the verdict of the jury shall contain, requires no finding as to delivery at all.

As to the second matter of objection, that in reference to the uncertainty of the verdict for damages, whether it is given for taking or detention, it may be said: That in an action of the kind in hand, damages may be claimed and recovered for both taking and detention. Arzaga v. Villalba, 24 Pac. Rep. 656. And the verdict being for a sum certain for damages, not specifying which kind, will be presumed to cover both grounds alleged for damage. Again, the objection going to the form of the verdict should have been taken in the court below, and it is too late to urge it here. Campbell v. Jones, 41 Cal. 515.

It is urged further that, because the jury found for the plaintiff for the possession of a part of the property only, and as to the balance their verdict was silent, that a judgment based thereon is void, as not responsive to the issue raised by the pleadings,—that is, the right of possession of the whole of the property sued for. Conceding that, if such a verdict had been rendered for the defendant, it would have been insufficient to support the judgment, under the rule laid down in Muller v. Jewell, 66 Cal. 216,<sup>1</sup> yet the defendant here does not allege in his answer that the plaintiff has the possession of any of the property, but that an officer of the law has it under a writ in this case. The plaintiff has only obtained judgment for a part of the property, and has no right to possession of the balance. There is nothing to show but that the defendant is entitled thereto, and that it cannot be withheld from him. The verdict and judgment here being silent as to the balance of the property, it must be held that the plaintiff was denied any further relief than he has obtained, and he is precluded from any further litigation with the defendant as to this balance. Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 277. But in this case the defendant has asked for a return of the property, and it does not appear that he has given bond and sureties, who have justified, and in that case it would have been the sheriff's duty, under section 515, Code Civil Proc., to have delivered the property to the plaintiff, and it must be presumed that he has done so. Therefore, since the plaintiff has not been determined by the verdict and judgment to be entitled to this balance of the property, the judgment here should be so modified as to require his return of it to the defendant, and in other respects the judgment should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

COFFEY v. GRAND COUNCIL. (No. 14,010.)

MANDAMUS—SETTLEMENT OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

A mandamus will not be granted to compel a judge to settle a bill of exceptions, where it appears that counsel for petitioner served a statement to which amendments were proposed, which he rejected, and that then he set a day and hour at which the statement and amendments would be presented to the judge for settlement, but, by reason of other engagements, failed to appear at the appointed hour, though he did appear later in the day, but did not then ask for a settlement of the statement, nor ask the opposing counsel to consent to a statement until two days after.

In bank.

W. F. Stafford, for petitioner. H. H. Reid, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel Hon. J. P. Hoge, a judge of the superior court, to settle a bill of exceptions in the case of Coffey vs. The Grand Council of the Young Men's Institute, and should be entitled "Grand Council vs. Hoge, Judge." On the petitioner's own showing, we think it is not entitled to the writ prayed for. After judgment in the court below in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant in due time served its notice of intention to move for a new trial, and proposed statement. Proposed amendments were served January 30, 1890, and on February 3d, defendant served notice that they were not accepted, and that the proposed statement and amendments would be presented to the judge on February 10, 1890, at 10 A. M. Counsel for the plaintiff appeared before the judge at the hour named, but no one appeared on behalf of the defendant, nor was the proper statement presented until

2 o'clock of the day named, when its counsel went to the chambers of the judge, and asked permission to withdraw the proposed statement and amendments for the purpose of seeing if the attorneys for the respective parties could not agree upon a settlement. Two days later, he called at the office of the plaintiff's attorney for a voluntary settlement, but the latter refused to consider the proposal, claiming that defendant had lost the right to a settlement by reason of its laches. Thereupon defendant's counsel incorporated all of the proposed amendments in the statement, and presented an engrossed copy of the same to the judge for his certificate on March 11, 1890, but the latter refused and still refuses to sign the same, claiming that he had lost jurisdiction to act upon it. The petitioner alleges that its counsel was engaged in causes pending in other departments of the superior court, and for that reason overlooked the hour for which the settlement of the statement had been fixed. If there is any power to relieve a party from the effect of such an inadvertence, it is in the court below, not here. The matter was presented to the judge, and the petition shows that the petitioner was given repeated hearings on its application, all parties being present. Assisted before, if there was any power anywhere to relieve the petitioner from its default, and if good cause could be shown in that behalf, the court below was the proper tribunal to determine the matter, and we must assume that it did not abuse its discretion on the showing made by the parties. Furthermore, it appears that counsel for the petitioner did not ask the judge to settle the statement when he appeared before the latter, at 2 o'clock, and that he did not leave the papers with the judge, but withdrew them. Instead of going immediately to the attorney for the adverse party, to see if a voluntary settlement could be had, he held the papers for two days, and after being informed that no settlement could be made, the reasons for which were given, he held them for about a month before any attempt was made to secure the certificate of the judge. No excuse is offered for these delays. Counsel for petitioner asked at the hearing to be allowed to amend the petition, so as to set out the conversation between himself and the judge, which occurred at 2 o'clock, February 10th, as fully as it is set out in his affidavit in opposition to the motion made in department 1 of this court, to dismiss the appeal. If the petition can be amended in any case after an alternate writ has been issued, and the respondent has appeared and answered the same, it would be useless to allow it in this case. We have looked into the affidavit referred to, and there is nothing there alleged which would have any material bearing on the question before us. No copy of the petition or of the writ was served on the plaintiff, and respondent has moved to dismiss on that ground. Rule 28 requires the petitioner to serve copies on the party in interest. This would of itself be sufficient ground for dismissing the petition, no offer having been made to comply with the rule. The demurrer is sustained without leave to amend, and the alternate writ is discharged.

APPEAL—FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT.

Where no transcript is filed on appeal, and it appears that the judge below has refused to settle a statement, because presented too late, and that a writ of mandamus to compel him to do so has been denied, the appeal will be dismissed on motion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

W. F. Stafford, for appellant. Henry H. Reid and O. T. Shuck, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file the transcript. The certificate of the clerk makes a prima facie case in favor of the moving party, but appellant claims that there is a statement on motion for a new trial, which remains unsettled by the judge of the court below, and which he intends to use on appeal. The judge of the court below, after repeated hearings on appellant's application to settle the statement, has refused to certify to it on the ground that it has lost its right to a statement by its failure to present the same to him for settlement. An application was made to this court in bank for a writ requiring the judge to settle the statement, and the petition has been denied. The facts shown there (Coffey v. Grand Council, ante, 547, this day filed) are the same as the facts here. If we assumed that the judge had the power in his discretion to settle the statement after February 10th, it still appears that after repeated applications he has refused to settle the statement, and we must assume that he will continue to do so, and that there can, therefore, be no statement on appeal. The appeal is dismissed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of a contract to purchase all of plaintiff's merchantable beef steers, the question whether the steers were of the kind and quality defendants agreed to take is for the jury, and its verdict, on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Graves, Turner & Graves, for appellant. Huggin & Van Ness, (J. M. Wilcoxson, of counsel,) for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This action is for the recovery of $3,623 damages, alleged to be sustained by reason of an alleged breach of a contract of the parties by the defendants. The contract was, in effect, that defendants would purchase of the plaintiff all the steers belonging to him on the 11th day of May, 1888, that were three years old and upwards, and that were then or that would be merchantable beef by the 1st day of July, 1888, the number of which was estimated by the parties to be about 300 head. And the parties further agreed that, if there should arise any question between them as to what steers would make merchantable beef, the question should be decided by arbitration, each party to select one arbitrator, and, if the two could not agree, they should select a third to settle the question. Pursuant to this agreement, plaintiff gathered his said band of cattle, and the defendants selected therefrom 90 head of the largest and most choice steers of said band, and paid the plaintiff therefor at the rate of $40 per head, and requested plaintiff to have another and complete gathering of the cattle on the 1st day of July, 1888, at which time defendants would take the remainder of the steers as per agreement, and plaintiff had gathered and ready for delivery the residue of his band, consisting of 176 head of steers, which he insisted then, and still insists, were good merchantable steers. Defendants refused to accept all of said steers, but offered to select from said band only so many as in their opinion were then merchantable beef,—48 or possibly 50 head in all. Thereupon plaintiff insisted upon choosing arbitrators, as stipulated in said agreement, to decide how many of said steers were merchantable beef. Plaintiff chose one William Epperson, and the defendants one A. J. Harris, with the understanding if they could not agree they should select a third person to act with them. It does not appear that the arbitrators so selected ever decided that any of said steers were merchantable beef, or that they ever differed or failed to agree upon how many were or were not merchantable beef, or that they ever selected a third person to act with them. The only reason appearing in the record for not proceeding with the arbitration is that the defendant Judge announced that he could not abide by the decision of the arbitrators. He said, according to the testimony of one of the witnesses, that Lynch was not willing to do anything towards settling the matter, and, as far as he (Judge) was concerned, he would not have another thing to do with the cattle, and turned and rode out of the field. That was evidently treated by all of the parties as a revocation by defendants of their agreement to arbitrate. About two weeks after the failure to arbitrate, plaintiff sold 176 head of cattle to Lux & Miller for $29.68 per head, and this action is prosecuted to recover the difference between the price which defendants agreed to pay for cattle of the kind and quality specified in their agreement with plaintiff, and the price paid for the 176 head sold to Lux & Miller. Whether the cattle which defendants refused to accept were of the kind and quality that they agreed to take is a question upon which there is a plain conflict of evidence, and we cannot disturb the verdict of the jury upon that question. We think the instructions of the court placed the matters in issue fairly before the jury. Judgment and order affirmed.

PARTNERSHIP—LOCATION AND PURCHASE OF PUBLIC LAND—DIVISION OF PROFITS.

1. A verbal agreement that plaintiff should locate and purchase government land for defendant, and that on its resale, to be made for cash as opportunity offered, the proceeds of each sale, after deducting the government price, should be divided equally between them, is consistent with and not superseded by a written acknowledgment given by defendant to plaintiff after nearly all the land had been located and purchased, reciting the fact of its acquisition, and that plaintiff was to share equally in the net profits; and hence the division of the profits is not postponed by the written acknowledgment until all the land has been resold, but the division is to take place on the resale of any portion thereof, as provided by the verbal agreement.

2. The fact that defendant borrowed the money with which to purchase the land from the government does not entitle him to deduct the interest, before dividing the proceeds on a resale, as the agreement does not so stipulate.

3. A decree that plaintiff is entitled to an undivided one-half interest in the land remaining unsold, subject to a lien in favor of defendant for the amount of the purchase price, is not erroneous for its failure to provide for the payment of taxes to be subsequently levied on the land, as the interest awarded to plaintiff is taxable to himself alone, and not to defendant.

4. Defendant cannot complain of the erroneous action of the court in allowing him interest on the purchase price of a portion of the land acquired after the execution of the written acknowledgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

William Shipsey, for appellant. W. B. Dillard, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. Plaintiff brought this action to dissolve a partnership, for an accounting, and to establish his interest in certain lands acquired as partners, and obtained a judgment in his favor. Defendant appeals from the judgment, also from an order denying him a new trial. The main facts, as shown by the findings, may be briefly stated as follows: About November 15, 1885, the plaintiff, who was then county surveyor of San Luis Obispo county, had special knowledge of the location and quality of certain large tracts of vacant government land on the Carisa plains in that county, then offered at private sale for $1.25 per acre, but he was without means to purchase any of the land. On or about that date, he and the defendant, who was possessed of both means and credit, entered into a verbal agreement, whereby the plaintiff, upon his part, agreed to assist in pointing out, locating and entering in the name of the defendant, such portions of the lands as the latter might deem it advisable to purchase for their joint benefit, and the defendant, upon his part, agreed, in consideration thereof, to furnish a team and wagon for the inspection of the lands, to purchase the lands of the government, and furnish the necessary money therefor, and, when so purchased, to take charge of and sell the same for cash at a reasonable profit as opportunities might occur, and, after each sale, to deduct from the proceeds of each sale the price paid to the government for the land sold, and pay over promptly to the plaintiff one-half of the remainder. Between the date of the agreement and the 5th day of June, 1886, the plaintiff and the defendant had, pursuant to the agreement, acquired 3,169 acres of land, the title to which stood in the name of the defendant. Upon the latter date, defendant gave plaintiff a written acknowledgment to the effect that the defendant had acquired title from the United States government to 3,169 acres of land, and that it was understood and agreed that the plaintiff was to share equally with the defendant in the net profits of the land. Thereafter, about August 15, 1886, and pursuant to the same agreement, the defendant acquired title to 640 acres of land. On April 11, 1887, while all the lands were still held under the agreement, the defendant sold and conveyed to one A. R. Taylor, a near relative of the defendant, 1,937 acres of land for the sum of two dollars per acre. Of this price, he received but one dollar per acre, and voluntarily, but without the plaintiff's consent, and contrary to their agreement, gave credit to the grantee for the remainder of the purchase price, which still remains unpaid, the defendant not having taken steps to collect it. Had this latter amount been collected, the net proceeds of the sale, after deducting the sum of $1.25 per acre paid to the government, would have been the sum of $1,445, one-half of which the plaintiff would have been entitled to. Defendant, however, paid him but $125 on account, which the plaintiff admitted in his complaint. On June 1, 1889, and at various times subsequently, the plaintiff demanded of the defendant an account of the lands sold, and the money received therefor, and also the payment to him of his share of the net proceeds of the sale; but the defendant failed and refused to render him any account, or to pay him any portion of the net profits of the sale, except the sum of $125, admitted as before stated. Prior to the first demand for an account of the lands sold having been made, that is, on November 1, 1888, the defendant received an offer of $3 per acre for all the lands acquired under the agreement, and was urged by the plaintiff to accept it; but, having sold a portion to Taylor, he could not do so, and has ever since been unable to sell the remainder of the lands. The land sold to Taylor was the only portion of the lands that the defendant sold, and the only amount of money, in which the plaintiff had any interest, that the defendant misappropriated, was the amount he gave his relative, Taylor, credit for indefinitely. On these facts, the court awarded the plaintiff $597.50, with legal interest thereon from the date of the sale of the portion of the land to Taylor, and an undivided one-half interest in the lands remaining unsold, subject, however, to a lien in favor of the defendant for the sum of $1.25 per acre to cover the purchase price he paid therefor to the government.

The defendant contends that the writing superseded the oral agreement, and that, according to the former, the profits were not to be divided until all the lands were sold. The verbal agreement, alleged in the complaint as the foundation of the action, was entered into in November, 1885, and all the land in question, except the 640-acre tract, was acquired pursuant to it, nearly seven months before the writing was made, which defendant claims superseded the verbal agreement. The writing itself does not contain anything inconsistent with the verbal agreement. It merely states the substance of it. The only witnesses examined in the cause were the parties to it, and nowhere in their testimony does it appear that the writing was given or received as a contract which was intended to supersede all their previous negotiations and stipulations concerning the same subject-matter. The defendant testified that "there was no written agreement from January till June, and the reason I made that little writing was I was afraid that Carpenter was afraid of my verbal agreement, and I told him at the time my word was as good as my bond." The plaintiff testified: "My contract with defendant became complete when the writing of June 5, 1886, was executed. That writing contains the substance of the agreement." The foregoing is all the testimony that was given concerning the writing, and we think the court was justified in finding therefrom, in view of the contents of the writing itself, that it was given and received as a mere acknowledgment or memorandum of the verbal agreement. The statement of the plaintiff that the contract became complete, etc., must, when read in connection with the defendant's statement of the distrust with which he thought plaintiff regarded him, mean that he (the plaintiff) felt safe in having a tangible and complete acknowledgment of the existence of their verbal agreement and of his interest in the land, the title to which stood wholly in the name of the defendant. The agreement itself was not completely performed at the time the written acknowledgment of it was given to the plaintiff. It was still executory, and remained so until the judgment herein was entered. Now, as the verbal agreement was that the lands were to be sold for cash at a reasonable profit, as opportunities to make sales should occur, and the profits were to be divided promptly after each sale, it is clear that the plaintiff was not compelled to wait until all the lands were sold for his share of the profits.

Defendant further contends that, as he borrowed money with which to purchase the lands, and paid interest thereon, the profits should have been ascertained, in the court below, by deducting from the price for which he sold a portion of the lands to Taylor, not only the $1.25 per acre paid to the government therefor, but the interest he had paid thereon, and the taxes and other expenses necessarily incurred in acquiring, keeping, and disposing of the property. As to the interest, it is sufficient to say that it was not stipulated for in the agreement, and, as to taxes and other necessary expenses, even if they were properly chargeable, there was no evidence of them offered, nor claim made therefor at the trial.

It is further urged that no provision was made for the payment of future taxes upon the unsold portion of the lands in which plaintiff was awarded an interest. It was not necessary to make any further provision therefor, because, as that portion of the lands was divided equally between them, and the plaintiff's interest made subject to a lien for $1.25 per acre in favor of the defendant to secure the purchase price, the plaintiff's interest is taxable to himself alone, and not to the defendant.

As to the 640 acres purchased under the agreement after the written acknowledgment of June 5, 1886, was given, the court, in awarding the plaintiff his half interest therein, in addition to the lien imposed thereon in favor of the defendant for the price per acre paid by him to the government, extended such lien to cover interest at the legal rate from the date of the purchase of the tract. The finding upon which this allowance of interest is based is claimed to be unsupported by the evidence. We are inclined to think so, too; but, as it is in favor of the defendant, he is not injured by it.

It is also claimed by the defendant that the 640-acre tract was erroneously brought within the agreement. The evidence that it was acquired under the agreement is quite strong. Both parties testified that it was so acquired; but the defendant, in order to defeat the plaintiff's claim respecting it, testified as follows: "The written declaration I gave Carpenter embraces all the land described in the complaint, except the 640 acres in sections 5 and 6, township 31 south, 19 east, that I acquired in August afterwards. If he kept his agreement, that was to be included in it." To which we may add: The court found that he fully performed the agreement upon his part, and this finding is supported by the evidence. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

SEVERAL TORT-FEASORS—JOINT LIABILITY.

The several owners of different irrigating ditches, who act independently of each other in the operation of their ditches, are not liable in a joint action for damages sustained by a land-owner from an overflow occasioned by the combined waters of all the ditches.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Waters & Gird, Curtis & Otis, and George L. Otis, for appellant. Willis,

Cole & Craig and Harris & Gregg, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land situated about one mile southerly from the San Bernardino range of mountains. Part of the tract was in a high state of cultivation. Coming out of said mountains, and trending towards plaintiff's land, but not reaching it, is a canon called "Baldridge Canon." The natural waters of said canon would not flow upon plaintiff's land, but, as found by the court, "would spread out on the lower lands without cutting any particular channel, the tendency of the flow being to spread out over the said lower lands north of plaintiff's premises, and become absorbed in the soil." But the defendants, by means of three different ditches, turned foreign water into said canon, and the commingling water from said ditches passed through said canon, and by cutting new channels, etc., flowed out and over plaintiff's land, covering part of it with sand and débris, and thus doing him damage. All of the ditches, however, were not owned jointly by all of the defendants. Each ditch was owned and operated by part only of the defendants who had no interest in the other ditches; and there was no concert of action—that is, no common design—between the owners of one ditch and the owners of the other ditches. The action was brought to enjoin all the defendants from continuing the wrong, and also to recover damages jointly against all the defendants for the injury already done. The court gave judgment decreeing an injunction, and also adjudging damages against all the defendants, jointly, for $972.33. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial; and the only point they make is that the joint judgment for damages is erroneous, because there was no concurrent or joint act or negligence on the part of defendants which caused the damage.

It is clear that the rule, as established by the general authorities, is that an action at law for damages cannot be maintained against several defendants jointly when each acted independently of the others, and there was no concert, or unity of design, between them. It is held that, in such a case, the tort of each defendant was, several when committed; and that it does not become joint because afterwards its consequences united with the consequences of several other torts committed by other persons. If it were otherwise, say the authorities, one defendant, however little he might have contributed to the injury, would be liable for all the damage caused by the wrongful acts of all the other defendants; and he would have no remedy against the latter, because no contribution can be enforced between tort-feasors. Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51; Navigation Co. v. Richards, 57 Pa. St. 142; Sellick v. Hall, 47 Conn. 260; Gould, Waters, § 222; Pom. Rem. §§ 307, 308. The case of Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17, is very similar to the case at bar, and involved the very point under discussion. In that case, several defendants were sued "for wrongfully flowing waste water from their lands to the injury of plaintiff's ditch, and for an injunction to restrain such wrongful flowing of waste water." It appeared, however, that the defendants "own, occupy, and irrigate separate and distinct tracts or parcels of land each in his own right;" and they moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that it did not appear that the injury complained of "was the result of the joint or concurrent act of defendants." The trial court overruled the motion, and, on appeal the supreme court of Nevada held that the nonsuit should have been granted, and said in its opinion: "The general principle is well settled that where two or more parties act, each for himself, in producing a result injurious to plaintiff, they cannot be held jointly liable for the acts of each other." On rehearing, however, it was held that the injunction against defendants was proper; but the judgment, so far as it awarded damages, was reversed. The principle has not been changed in this state, either by statute or judicial decision. The latest authority on the point here is People v. Mining Co., 66 Cal. 138, 4 Pac. Rep. 1152. That was a case where it was sought, by the equitable remedy of injunction, to restrain the commission of acts similar to those complained of in the case at bar; and the appellant sought to invoke, as against the injunction, the principle above stated as applicable to actions at law for damages. This court held, however, that the rule did not apply to the equitable remedy; but it expressly stated that it would apply to an action for damages. Counsel for appellant, in support of their position, had cited a number of cases; and, in alluding to them, this court said as follows: "Each of those cases was decided upon the principle that where several persons, acting independently of each other, engage in the commission of wrongful acts, the torts are distinct and not joint; and each is only severally liable for the injury caused by his own acts, and not for the torts of others with whom he was not acting in concert. There can be no doubt of the correctness of that principle, and of its applicability to an action at law for the recovery of damages for the violation of a private right." It may be contended that the earlier case of Hillman v. Newington, 57 Cal. 56, established a different doctrine; but it must be remembered that the main purpose of that action was to procure and maintain an injunction. The judgment awarded only nominal damages,—$1. Before that time, there had been some doubt whether several wrong-doers, acting independently, could be joined in an equitable proceeding to procure an injunction against all; and, indeed, it had been once held in this state (Keyes v. Water Co., 53 Cal. 724) that it could not be done. The language of the court in Hillman v. Newington must, therefore, be considered as referring especially to the right of equitable remedy. There was practically no question of damages before the court, and no question was raised as to the distinction between the equitable and the legal remedy. The case is referred to in the opinion of the court in the later case of People v. Mining Co., above mentioned, where Hillman v. Newington is evidently considered as settling only the equitable remedy. And, of course, the distinction is very plain between holding one defendant liable for the past wrongs of all the others, and simply enjoining all from committing wrong in the future. We think, therefore, that under the law as clearly settled, the joint judgment against the defendants for damages is erroneous.

We have considered this case somewhat at length, because it is contended that the rule as above stated will in some instances work a hardship to owners of property injured by the joint consequences of acts of several persons not acting in concert. No doubt there may be cases where it would be difficult to make sufficient proof against one of such persons, if sued separately. But it cannot be made clear that the opposite rule would work less wrong. At all events, we must declare the law as we find it. If the law were changed so that in a case like the one at bar a several judgment could be given against each defendant for the proportionate part of the joint damage which his individual acts had caused, it may be that such change would be in furtherance of justice. But the suggestion of such change could be properly made only to the law-making power. The judgment appealed from, so far as it awards damages against defendants, is reversed, and in all other respects the judgment is affirmed. Let appellant recover the costs of this appeal. Order overruling motion for new trial affirmed.

THORNTON, J. Application to be discharged on habeas corpus. The petitioner, as appears by the return, is in custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, by virtue of a commitment upon a conviction by the police court of the city and county aforesaid of a misdemeanor, viz., visiting a gambling place. It is urged that the court below was without jurisdiction, because the time was not set forth in the complaint upon which the conviction was had. This point might have been considered and passed on by the court which rendered the judgment, and might also have been considered and passed on by the superior court, to which the case was carried by appeal of the defendant, and the judgment there affirmed.

We cannot see that the court below was without jurisdiction for the defect claimed which is brought to our attention. The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county above mentioned. So ordered.

WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

1. Where the record shows that two special questions were submitted to the jury which they answered, but gave no general verdict, and that these questions did not cover all the issues in the case; that the trial proceeded, and both parties introduced evidence; and that the case was submitted to the "court for decision and judgment," which was rendered against defendant,—the right to trial by jury was waived by defendant under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 631, providing that jury trial may be waived by oral consent in open court entered in the minutes or by failure to appear at the trial.

2. Answers to special questions not disposing of all the issues in a case do not constitute a special verdict within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 624, defining a special verdict to be that by which the jury find the facts; and such special findings, unaccompanied by a general verdict, are of no effect, since by section 625 the special findings only control when they are inconsistent with the general verdict.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 631, provides that the right to trial by jury is waived (1) by failing to appear at the trial; (2) by written consent in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk; (3) by oral consent in open court entered in the minutes.

Geo. A. Nourse, for appellant. W. F. Goad and Arthur Rogers, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. This action was on a promissory note executed by defendant's testator to the plaintiff. It was given to secure the payment of the note of the Pioneer Gold Mining Company to the plaintiff for $110,000. This last note was indorsed by William S. Chapman. It was further secured by the pledge of all the shares of the capital stock of the Pioneer Gold Mining Company, except 30 shares thereof, and also by a mortgage on the Pioneer mine, then owned by the company above named, executed by said company. The above facts appear and are not disputed. It further appears that there was a prior mortgage executed by the company on the Pioneer mine, on which a suit for foreclosure was brought, and in this suit the plaintiff, who was one of the defendants therein, filed a cross-complaint, asking that his mortgage be foreclosed. This was done, and an order of sale issued directing the proceeds of the sale of the mine under the decree to be applied first to the payment of the prior mortgage, and the remainder upon the plaintiff's mortgage. At the sale under this decree, the plaintiff became the purchaser of the mortgaged premises for $50,000, of which $10,415 was paid to the owners of the prior mortgage, and the remainder, less costs of sale, was applied on the second debt of plaintiff, adjudged then to amount to $69,426.60. The sheriff's return of sale showed a deficiency due on the second debt to plaintiff, amounting to $61,534.13. The complaint shows payments on the mortgage debt to plaintiff, including the payment made of a portion of the funds of the sale above mentioned, amounting to $98,380.82. Judgment for this deficiency was docketed against the mortgagor company and W. S. Chapman. On this judgment payments were made before the commencement of this action, leaving still due, as averred in this complaint, the sum of $34,551.20. Plaintiff asks judgment on the note sued for, principal and interest thereon, amounting to $17,120.80. The claim of plaintiff on the note sued on was regularly presented to the defendant's executor, who rejected it. This action was brought on the note to recover the amount above mentioned, to be paid by defendant in due course of administration. It is set up in the answer that the $110,000 note had been fully paid, and denies that any sum remains due and unpaid on it. Other allegations of the complaint were denied. These need not be fully stated. As an affirmative defense, the defendant set up by his answer the following: "That a transcript of the docket of the deficiency judgment docketed against the Pioneer Mining Company and W. S. Chapman (the maker and indorser of the mortgage note) was filed with the recorder of Fresno county in November, 1887, and thus the judgment became a lien upon all the real property of said W. S. Chapman in said Fresno county; (2) that at and before the filing of said transcript, Chapman owned certain real property described, situated in said county, which was held in the name of W. F. Goad, trustee for plaintiff, Montgomery, for further security for debts due Montgomery from Chapman; (3) that the said lien of said judgment was never enforced against said property of said Chapman, but that said Montgomery, Chapman & Goad, after the death of said A. L. Sayre, sold and conveyed by deed to Thomas E. Hughes all said real property for $35,000, paid by Hughes to Montgomery, which was received by Montgomery as payment in full of every debt and obligation due from Chapman to him, except the judgment aforesaid, which then amounted to less than $36,000, and that Montgomery thereupon released said land from the lien of said judgment; (4) that said real estate was then worth $140,000, and if sold at its real value would have realized enough to pay all debts due Montgomery from Chapman, including said deficiency judgment; (5) that said Montgomery released said land from the lien of said judgment, and released said Chapman from the obligation of said judgment without the consent of defendant." The case was tried by a jury on the 28th of April, 1889, who rendered the following verdict:

"Question 1. What was the value, May 15, 1888, of the following lands, viz.: The south half of section 24, section 25, the south-east quarter of section 26 and section 35, all in township 11 south, of range 17 east, from the Mount Diablo base and meridian; also section 1, and the west half of section 15, in township 12 south, of range 17 east, from said base and meridian? Answer. $136,800. C. C. HARRIS, Foreman."

"Question 2. Did the plaintiff, A. Montgomery, on or about May 15, 1888, release W. S. Chapman from all liability under the judgment in the complaint herein mentioned? Answer. Yes. C. C. HARRIS, Foreman."

This verdict, it appears, was in answer to special questions embracing special issues submitted to the jury by the questions above given. There was no other verdict, and no general verdict; nor does it appear that any general verdict was demanded by either party. It appears from the record that the trial proceeded after the return of the verdict, both parties introduced evidence, and on the 24th and 25th of April, 1889, it is stated "said trial was completed and submitted to the court for decision and judgment, with the privilege to the parties to file briefs herein, which was done." The court subsequently rendered its decision, finding on all the issues in the case, disregarding the verdict, treating it as non-existent, and, in fact, finding contrary to the answers of the jury on the questions submitted to them, and rendered judgment for plaintiff for a sum of money. The defendant appealed.

The above facts are taken from the record, and on them must the solution of the points in this case be made. Was there any verdict rendered on which judgment could be entered? This is an action at law, and the defenses set up on behalf of defendant were all legal defenses. Payment is certainly a legal defense, and so is the discharge of a surety by releasing his principal, or by surrendering a lien on property sufficient, if sold, to pay the debt for which the surety had obligated himself. We have no doubt of the correctness of these rules. Such is the common law, and it is so prescribed in the Civil Code, §§ 2819, 2840. The verdict cannot then be regarded as advisory to the court. The case is not one in equity. It has no such features. All the questions arising on the defenses set up relate to legal defenses. If the facts above mentioned exist, the surety is discharged by operation of law, without the necessity of appealing to a court of equity to obtain such discharge. The fact that the statute requires that the judgment must be entered, payable in due course of administration, does not make this an equity case. This doctrine applies particularly to actions for the recovery of money, which are almost always actions at law. Certainly such must be the form of the judgment in a recovery on a promissory note. By the statute, (Code Civil Proc. § 625,) in an action for the recovery of money, a jury may, in their discretion, render either a general or a special verdict. In such a case as the one before us, the court cannot direct the jury to find a special verdict, but it may, in such a case, and in fact in all cases, instruct the jury. If they render a general verdict, to find up on particular questions of fact, to be stated in writing, and may direct a written finding thereon. This finding on the written question must be returned and filed with the clerk, and entered on the minutes of the court. When the special finding of facts on the questions submitted is inconsistent with the general verdict, the special finding controls the general verdict, and the court is bound to give judgment accordingly; that is, in accordance with the special finding. It must be held, nothing appearing to the contrary, that the court instructed the jury in accordance with law; that is, if they found a general verdict, to find on the questions submitted to them. We cannot assume or presume that the court violated the law in failing to direct the jury to find a general verdict in connection with their answers to the questions, unless the record shows it. The record must put the court in the wrong. If it does not, it must be held that the court acted in accord with the rules of law. We must presume then that the jury did not obey the instructions of the judge, in failing to find a general verdict, as they were told to find. Either party had the right to have the court direct the jury, when they returned their verdict on the questions submitted, to return a general verdict. This was not done, and it must be held that this right was waived by each party to the action.

What, then, is the effect of the verdict which was rendered? Neither party asked for judgment on the verdict as rendered. If this had been asked by either party, the other party might have objected. The objection, if made, should have been sustained, and the result would have been a mistrial. The court could not, of its own motion, have ordered judgment on the verdict. It was not such a verdict as judgment could have been rendered on, unless by consent of both parties. If judgment had been entered on it by consent, the maxim would apply consensus tollit errorem, and the judgment would be valid. This was not a special verdict. A special verdict is defined by the Code as that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court. Code Civil Proc. § 624. The facts found by the jury are all the facts in issue. On these facts so found the court renders judgment. See Breeze v. Doyle, 19 Cal. 101. When the jury find a special verdict they are not bound to find a general verdict. In this case they might have returned either a special or a general verdict. Either was within their power; and in this they were beyond the control of the court. Code Civil Proc. § 625. The special finding in this case did not dispose of all the issues. It did not dispose of the defense of payment and other issues. In any point of view it was not a special verdict. It was a special finding, regularly to be accompanied by a general verdict. Not being so accompanied, it was of no legal effect, and no judgment, except by consent of the litigants, could have been entered on it. It was a nullity to which no validity could have been imputed, unless the parties had agreed that it should be regarded, so far as it disposed of the issues in the case, as a controlling finding or verdict. On this point see Elsemann v. Swan, 6 Bosw. 668. But the record shows no such agreement. For all that appears the jury was discharged without finding anything which in law can be held as a verdict, and the record informs us that the parties submitted further evidence; that the trial was completed on the 25th of April, 1869, (one day after the so-called verdict was returned into court;) and that the cause was, on the 25th of April, "submitted to the court for decision and judgment." The verdict seems to have been treated by counsel and court as of no effect. It appears in the transcript that the cause came on regularly for trial; was tried on the 24th and 25th of April, 1889, when the trial was completed. We cannot construe this otherwise than as a statement, which we must hold to be absolutely true, that the trial was not completed until the 25th day of April, 1889, the day after the special findings were filed. Certainly the verdict on an incomplete trial is a nullity, and should be so treated, unless it is shown that the parties gave it effect by a stipulation that it should be regarded as of some validity, and how far it should be so regarded. The defendant had a right to have his cause tried by a jury. This was accorded to him. The jury was called and sworn in the case, and then was discharged without objection, without rendering a verdict. Both parties afterwards went on to try the case, introduced further evidence, and submitted the case for decision and judgment. We cannot hold otherwise than that there was a waiver of a trial by jury, just as effectual as if his consent had been given in open court, and entered on the minutes. The minutes show a consent by action in open court, by proceeding with the trial, introducing further evidence after the jury was discharged, and submitting the case for decision and judgment. Such action was inconsistent with any demand or desire for a jury trial, and should be held a waiver, within the provisions of Section 631, Code Civil Proc.

It is argued that the verdict was not waived. But in our view there was no verdict, and the counsel seems to have so regarded it, or he would have asked for judgment on the verdict. We can put no other construction on the statements in the record of the course that the trial took than that the finding was regarded as no verdict, and that the trial should proceed as if no verdict had been found. No question of waiver arises on the finding, for there was no verdict. It gave the defendant no right, for it conferred none. It cannot be said that the defendant did not waive his right to have judgment entered on the verdict, as the special finding gave no such right to either party. If it had conferred a right to judgment, and the parties had afterwards to complete an incomplete trial, the question might arise, although it would be manifestly unjust to hold either party bound by a verdict on an unfinished and incomplete trial. This disposes of all the questions arising in the case. There was no motion for a new trial. There is no statement or bill of exceptions in the case, nor any motion made in the court below to set aside the judgment on any ground. We find no error in the record, and the judgment must be and is affirmed.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

HUGHES v. FORD et al.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—IMPROVEMENTS—APPEAL
—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by a lessee of property, after the expiration of the lease, to recover from the owner the value of improvements made on the premises, plaintiff testified as to an alleged agreement on the part of defendant to pay for the improvements. The evidence consisted of conversations between the parties, but it did not appear that any price or terms were ever agreed on. Defendant denied that he agreed to pay for the improvements. Held, that a judgment for defendant would not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Where a tenant, who has erected improvements on the demised premises under an agreement with the lessor that he may remove them, wrongfully allows the improvements to remain on the premises after the expiration of the lease, he cannot recover rent for such improvements.

Error to superior court of Denver.

HAYT, J. At a time prior to the year 1883, George W. Clayton and William Clayton, then being the owners in fee of lots 24 and 26, block 48, east division of the city of Denver, leased the same to plaintiff in error, Paul T. Hughes, for a term expiring June 1, 1883. By the terms of said lease all improvements erected by plaintiff were to remain his property. Thereafter plaintiff entered into possession of the premises and erected thereon certain buildings. Upon the expiration of the term of the lease, plaintiff, by the consent of the Claytons, held over upon the original terms. On or about November 21, 1883, Clayton conveyed the premises to Ford, one of the defendants in error, Clayton, however, reserving and excepting the improvements, (belonging to plaintiff,) with an agreement that plaintiff might remove the same at any time before June 1, 1884. It further appears that on or about November 21, 1883, plaintiff and defendant Ford entered into an agreement to the effect that plaintiff should deliver to said Ford the premises on the 1st day of June, 1884, free of any incumbrance caused by plaintiff, and should pay Ford as ground rent, in the mean time, $150 a month; and also pay all taxes levied upon the premises for the year 1883. Ford, in consideration thereof, leased to plaintiff the premises until the 1st day of June, 1884. Plaintiff also testifies that at numerous times after the conveyance from the Claytons, Ford expressed to him a desire to retain the improvements upon the land, and his readiness and willingness to purchase the same at a fair valuation, and that he further promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of the improvements, or renew and extend the lease of the premises. This testimony of plaintiff is contradicted by the defendant. It appears, however, that about the 31st of May, 1884, plaintiff prepared to remove therefrom the buildings and improvements erected upon the premises. About this time further negotiations were had looking to the purchase of the improvements by Ford, and, for this reason, the removal did not take place. It is in evidence that the parties attempted to fix the value of these buildings by arbitration, but the arbitrators chosen failing to agree, and the articles of submission being defective, nothing came from such attempt. Plaintiff claims that the failure of the arbitration was due to the fraud of the defendant Ford, but the proof is not sufficient to sustain this allegation. It is also shown that on or about May 20, 1884, the defendant Ford gave notice to plaintiff that he desired to take full possession of the premises on or about the 1st day of June, 1884. Plaintiff seeks, inter alia, for a judgment for the value of the improvements, and for a lien therefor upon the same. In the alternative, plaintiff asks that he be permitted to remove the buildings from said premises within some reasonable time to be fixed by the court.

In the superior court the case was tried to the court without a jury. The issues were there found in favor of the defendants, and judgment entered accordingly. At the trial the evidence was directed principally to two points: (1) To prove an agreement between the parties whereby the defendant Ford became obligated to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of the improvements; (2) to establish such value. Unless the first point be established, the second is entirely immaterial. To prove an agreement to pay for the improvements, plaintiff was compelled to rely almost exclusively upon his own testimony. This, at most, is vague and unsatisfactory, and is directly contradicted by the defendant Ford. In this state of the record it was the province of the trial judge to decide upon the weight of the evidence. This he did, and his decision was against plaintiff; and we see no reason for disturbing such conclusion. An examination of the evidence shows that the conversation between the parties, in reference to a sale of the buildings by the plaintiff, and their purchase by the defendant, amounted to no more than negotiations for a sale. Neither price nor terms were ever agreed upon. The minds of the parties never met. The agreement to submit the matter to arbitration shows that neither party, at that time, regarded the matter as settled. The arbitration failing, the matter must still be regarded as undecided. Under the circumstances, the defendant Ford cannot be charged with the value of plaintiff's improvements. The plaintiff asks, however, in this alternative, to be allowed a reasonable time within which to remove the same; and the defendant in his answer expressly assents thereto. Under the circumstances, the court should have made some appropriate order in reference thereto. This it did not do, and for this error the judgment must be reversed. A receiver was appointed, who collected the rents during the pendency of the action in the court below. By the final judgment, this receiver was required to pay the defendant Ford the amounts thus collected. This part of the judgment cannot be disturbed. The improvements were wrongfully suffered to remain upon the premises after the expiration of the lease, and plaintiff was not entitled to the rent therefrom. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to modify the same by allowing the plaintiff a reasonable time within which to remove the improvements.

JOHN MOUAT LUMBER CO. v. WILMORE.

NEGLECT—SPARKS FROM SAW-MILL—DAMAGES.

1. The owner of a saw-mill is liable for negligently setting fire to a house, when the evidence shows that sparks constantly escaped from the smoke-stack of the mill both before and after a spark-arrester was placed on it, and that the attention of the owner had been called to the fact by plaintiff, whose house had been several times fired by the sparks.

2. Where the evidence shows that the sparks had many times before been blown into plaintiff's house, 75 yards from the mill, and that on the day of the fire the wind was in that direction, and that the window screen on the side of the house next the mill was loose so that the sparks might have gotten into the room where the fire originated, that there was no fire in the house at the time, and no other known source from which it could have originated, the conclusion that the fire was started by sparks from the mill is warranted.

3. Evidence of the cost of wearing apparel destroyed by fire, followed by evidence of wear and tear, is competent to fix its value, such goods having, when worn, no market value.

Appeal from Jefferson county court.

Action by appellee, J. H. Wilmore, against appellant, the John Mouat Lumber Company, for negligently setting fire to appellant's house, by reason whereof, it is claimed, it and its contents were partially destroyed by fire upon the 22d day of May, 1886. The cause was commenced in a justice's court, consequently there are no written pleadings. The trial before the justice having resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant company appealed to the county court. In the latter court the cause was, by consent, tried to the court without a jury. As the result of this trial, appellee recovered judgment for $300, and costs. To reverse this judgment the case is brought here by appeal.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The principal question presented upon this appeal is in reference to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment. Counsel for appellant in his written argument says "that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, nor was there any evidence that the fire originated from the defendant's fire, smoke-stack, or mill." The evidence received at the trial was not taken down by a stenographer, and the abstract upon which we must determine the appeal is not as full as it should have been. It is admitted that appellant was the owner and proprietor of the saw-mill from whence it is claimed the fire originated. It is also conceded that the house of appellee was situate about 75 yards east from the mill, and that there was a window in the bedroom where the fire is shown to have originated, and that this window was on the side nearest the mill, also, that the wind at the time was blowing from the direction of the mill towards the house. Appellee, testifying in his own behalf, said, in answer to the question, "Had you been troubled by fires from this mill before this, while it was occupied by the defendant?" "Answer. I had. Q. When was it? A. It was when the wind blew; had noticed a thousand of them. It bothered me all the time, but chiefly after January. I had called the attention of John Mouat, A. T. Mouat, and Mr. Eller, and most all of them, to the smoke-stack, as my wood was on fire, and my hay and charcoal. Mr. Eller is secretary of the company, and John Mouat is the president." In answer to other interrogatories the witness said: "I saw the fire catch previously from the mill. * * * I have seen fires in the front room from the smoke-stack. * * * I saw some sparks after the fire, but not any before that day. They were about the same thing as I had seen before. I was familiar with the smoke-stack. I examined it after the fire. It was thirty feet high. It was a hood, funnel shaped, on top of it, set on bars of iron. The hood is on the top part of it, and the space was open between the lower part and the smoke-stack." In answer to the question, "How much time did it take to fight the fires?" the witness answered: "It took a good deal of time. I cannot say how much. A good many times I got up and went out for fear, and I watched always in the day-time. I have had to leave my work and put out large fires that would take from 10 to 20 buckets of water, and I have been kept at home. This occurred many times. I cannot tell the time, for it was on and off for three and four months. It was not only the loss of time, but I would have to leave my work. I can only guess at the time. It may have been two or three weeks that I put in that way. It must have been two or three, positively two, weeks." Mrs. C. A. Northrup testified upon this point: "Question. Have you ever seen sparks from the mill flying there? Answer. Yes; it was the Tuesday after the fire occurred. That was the only time. It came in there from the north-west. I cannot tell the kind of a spark. It blew across my lap. It was a live spark, and it came from the north-west. I saw a fire that came from the way the fire was. I have seen sparks come from the mill, because they came with the smoke of the mill." Mrs. Mary Wilmore testified in answer to the question, "Have you seen sparks of the fire from this mill before the fire of your house?" "Answer. I did, repeatedly; have seen fire from the mill before the fire in our house. There was hardly a day but we had fires to put out. Q. Had you seen sparks at night from the mill more than once before that? A. Yes, sir; a thousand times. I have been burned with them. Q. Have you seen them since this spark-arrester has been put up the same as before? A. I have; have seen coals and sparks both come some as large as the end of my thumb. A window in the west room was raised up, and the screen was torn at the top and at the bottom. I saw some dead cinders in the west room. They looked like dead bark." The witness Daniel Northrup testified in answer to the question, "Did you ever notice sparks before or after that time?" "Answer. I have. I have seen fires around Wilmore's from the cinders. I saw as many as twenty or thirty. The most of them were in his wood-pile." The witness Charles Nadler testified to the same effect. The witness Henry Hildebrand testified, in reference to the spark-arrester upon the defendant's smoke-stack, "that it was not safe, for the reason that the rim had a hole 24 inches, while the smoke-stack was only 20 inches, so it left two inches in the hole." Here we have testimony showing that this smoke-stack was constantly emitting sparks both before and after the spark-arrester was put on, and also testimony to the effect that the spark-arrester was not sufficient, and did not answer the purposes for which it was intended. We cannot find from this record that it was denied by any witness that sparks did thus escape, and although it was testified by defendant's witnesses that the spark-arrester was a good one, and one of the best that were made, still, it was for the court below to decide upon the weight of the evidence. Its decision was against appellant; and we think there was sufficient proof of negligence to support this finding of the trial court.

It is claimed that the evidence does not show that the fire caught from the mill. In support of this claim counsel contends that the fire caught inside the house, and that it could not, therefore, have been started by sparks from the mill. In answer to this, it may be said that if it be conceded that the fire originated within the bedroom, the evidence shows that it may have been blown in through the open window, although the witness Gallin testified that there was a screen on the outside of the window, and that it was not loose, so far as he could see. The testimony of this witness was so shaken on cross-examination that the trial court may have attached very little weight to it. Other witnesses testified that the screen was loose at the top and bottom, so that cinders and sparks from the mill could, and did, pass into the room; and that fires had previously caught in this manner from the mill. Although no eye-witness saw the sparks that started the conflagration, it is in evidence that sparks and burning coals were frequently emitted from the mill, and that they were so emitted upon the day of the fire; that the wind was blowing so as to carry the sparks in the direction of the house, and that fires in and about the house had frequently been started in this manner; that there was no fire in the house at the time, and no other known source from which the fire could have originated. From the very nature of the case, resort to presumptive evidence became necessary. The most important rights of property and the gravest criminal charges are being constantly determined upon such evidence, and we see no reason why this case should be made an exception. In our opinion, the facts and circumstances detailed by the witnesses upon the stand, justified the conclusion reached by the trial court, that the fire causing the damage was started by sparks from the mill. Kaine v. Weigley, 22 Pa. St. 183; Railway Co. v. De Busk, 12 Colo. 294, 20 Pac. Rep. 752.

But one other question was raised at the trial by such specific objections as to entitle it to be reviewed upon appeal. Against appellant's objections, appellee and his wife were both permitted to give evidence of the cost of certain wearing apparel, and family clothing. As the testimony was followed by evidence of wear and tear, it was proper for the consideration of the court. There is no market value for such goods when worn; hence, the general rule in reference to the measure of damages does not control. In such case the value may be fixed by considerations of cost, and actual worth, at the time of the loss, without reference to what they could be sold for in a particular market. Railroad Co. v. Frame, 6 Colo. 382. Finding no substantial error in the record, the judgment must be affirmed.

BOARD COUNTY COM'RS LARIMER COUNTY
v. LOVE.

SHERIFF'S FEES—MILEAGE.

Under Gen. St. Colo. § 1441, allowing officers 15 cents for each mile "necessarily" traveled in serving process in criminal cases, a sheriff who serves process issued in different cases at the same place and on the same journey is entitled to mileage in each case for the entire distance.

Error to district court, Larimer county.
Wells, McNeal & Taylor, for plaintiff in error. T. M. Robinson, Eph. Love, pro se. E. A. Ballard and Sanford Darrah, for defendant in error.

HELM, C. J. The question presented by the record before us may be stated as follows: When a sheriff serves "processes" issued in different criminal cases, at the same place and upon a single journey, is he entitled to mileage in each case for the entire trip? The statute controlling the present controversy allows that officer 15 cents per mile for each mile "necessarily" traveled in performing the duties mentioned. Gen. St. § 1441. It is unquestionably against the policy of the law to allow public officers compensation for constructive services, but there is a divergence of opinion as to whether certain alleged services are, or are not, to be treated as constructive. For instance, suppose the sheriff travels 30 miles, and at the same place serves a process in each of two separate cases, can it be said that his mileage is actual in one of the cases and constructive in the other? If so, in which case is it actual, and in which constructive? No matter how the selection be made, it will prove neither equitable nor satisfactory. Or, suppose the parties upon whom processes are thus served reside at different distances, but in the same direction, from the county-seat, so that if served separately mileage in one case would be charged for 20, and in the other for 30, miles. Obviously, the total mileage for the 30 miles traveled could not be charged to the suitor whose process only required a trip of 20 miles; while to charge the whole amount against the other litigant and none against him, would be sure to produce the most vigorous protest. These hypothetical cases are verified by actual experiences upon every secular day. They show both the injustice and impracticability of treating the mileage as actual in one case, and constructive in the other. But it is claimed that the difficulty in all such cases as those supposed would be easily obviated by an equitable apportionment of the mileage fee among the different prosecutions or suits. This proposition is reasonable in theory, but the wisdom of attempting its practical application must be doubted. No distinction can be discovered upon principle between mileage fees in criminal and in civil cases, and none is made, in the respect now under consideration, by statute. Judicial causes, whether civil or criminal, are separate things. They are distinct entities in litigation. Unless otherwise specially stipulated or ordered, they are brought, conducted, and determined entirely independent of each other. Fees are taxed, and a fee-bill is rendered as a part of each particular case. Costs are ordinarily not expected to vary in accordance with the multiplicity or decrease of other contemporaneous actions. It is usually deemed enough for each suitor to take care of his particular suit, and the courts generally have their hands full in administering justice, without a commingling of different cases. But suppose the rule of equitable apportionment, above suggested, be adopted; the extent of a party's liability in his particular case is no longer determined exclusively by the proceedings in connection therewith. It depends upon fortuitous circumstances not growing out of the controversy which he is prosecuting or defending. If the sheriff's apportionment of mileage fees were always acquiesced in, the matter would be at least partially shorn of its seriousness and difficulty. But his action in this regard would be constantly challenged. He would often serve processes in a number of different cases at the same time, and his apportionment would be subjected to the critical analysis of as many losing litigants. Many elements of uncertainty, and grounds for imputing fraud, would enter into consideration, and ultimately become subjects of judicial cognizance, for the courts would almost certainly be called upon to determine the disputes resulting. A peculiar field of jurisprudence would thus be entered, and a vast amount of time would be consumed by the judiciary of the state that should be given to the transaction of other business. Moreover, it might happen that no one of the cases blended in this particular could be finally disposed of and passed from the docket, without a similar determination of all the others. No rule, legislative or judicial, can be adopted to govern the matter in hand that will not be obnoxious to plausible objections; but, upon careful consideration, we are of the opinion that mileage should be allowed in each particular case. We hold that different causes, separately prosecuted and tried, should not be commingled in the taxing and apportionment of these costs; and that the time of the courts is not to be consumed in the difficult and unsatisfactory arbitration of fees between different losing suitors, having no community of interest otherwise, in pending litigation. The foregoing view we believe to be in accordance with the spirit and purpose of the statute, which, in our judgment, does not contemplate such complex and impracticable proceedings. It is also supported, as above shown, by strong considerations of justice and expediency. The officer might be compelled to make a separate trip in each case, and, though serving a number of processes issued therein, he would receive but a single mileage fee. Under these circumstances, the suitor ought not to complain. His mileage fees, thus computed and allowed, will not be unreasonable, and he is as fully protected as he can well be in practice. If the sheriff manages to serve processes in different cases upon a single journey, he is fortunate, but his good luck at one time will be more than offset by loss of fees and other misfortunes at another. Thus, on the whole, he is not likely to receive more than the reasonable mileage contemplated by the statute. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 10, 1891.)

DEPOSITIONS—INDORSEMENT—CONTINUANCE—JUDGMENT IN REPLEVIN.

1. Where an indorsement on an envelope inclosing a deposition gives the title to the case, shows in whose behalf the deposition is taken, the name and character of the officer taking the same, that the deposition was sealed up by the officer who took it, and it is addressed to the clerk of the district court of the eleventh judicial district, Columbus, Cherokee county, Kan., held, that such indorsement is sufficient. Whittaker v. Voorhees, 38 Kan. 71, 15 Pac. Rep. 874.

2. It is not error for a notary, before whom a deposition is to be taken, to adjourn the taking of said deposition at the time and place named in the notice for taking the same, until the next day, at the same place and hour, at the request of the attorney of the party taking the deposition.

3. In an action of replevin, where the plaintiff fails to obtain possession of the property on the order of delivery, and the trial of the action results in favor of the plaintiff, but the verdict is for the value of the property simply, and not in the alternative for the return of the property, or, in case it cannot be returned, for the value thereof, the verdict and judgment are irregular. But in such a case it is not necessary to reverse the judgment, and order a new trial, as the court may direct a modification of the judgment, requiring it to be entered in the alternative; and, in such a case, when the evidence clearly shows that the property could not be returned, it is unnecessary to direct a modification of the judgment.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Cherokee county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

J. D. Lewis and W. F. Sapp, for plaintiff in error. W. R. Cowley and H. C. Root, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an action for replevin for 77 tons of zinc ore. The defendant claims to have purchased the ore from Aldrich and Fuller in May, 1886. The plaintiff was deputy-sheriff of Cherokee county, and had in his hands an execution in favor of O. T. Street against Aldrich and Fuller which he levied on the ore as the property of said Aldrich and Fuller. The defendant demanded the ore of the plaintiff, and, on his refusal to return it to her, commenced this action to recover possession of it. The cause was tried by the court and a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $924. Motion for a new trial was overruled. The first error complained of was the action of the court in refusing to suppress the deposition of Joel Bacon.

The first objection to the deposition is that it was not properly indorsed and transmitted by the officer taking it. The indorsement on the envelope is sufficient. It gives the title of the case, shows in whose behalf the deposition is taken, the name and character of the officer taking the same, that it was sealed up by the officer who took it, and it is addressed to the clerk of the district court of the eleventh judicial district, Columbus, Cherokee county, Kan. Whittaker v. Voorhees, 38 Kan. 71, 15 Pac. Rep. 874. The certificate which is complained of is in due form and sufficient in substance. Complaint is also made that the deposition was not begun on the day named in the notice. The notary was present at the time and place named in the notice for taking the deposition. The attorney for the defendant appeared. Nobody appeared to cross-examine. Counsel for the defendant requested the notary to adjourn the taking of the deposition until the next day, which request was granted, and the taking of the deposition adjourned until the next day, at the same place and hour. The deposition was then taken. No one appeared at this time for the plaintiff. The notary had a right to adjourn from day to day, but counsel say he did not give any reason for the adjournment, and that the statute requires that a reason should be given. It is true the notary did not say in his certificate that he adjourned to accommodate the attorney for the defendant. If he had, that would have been a compliance with the statute. He did say, however, that he adjourned at the request of the attorney for the defendant. We find no error in the ruling on the motion to suppress. The petition contains all the necessary elements of a petition in replevin. While the description of the property therein is not as complete as it might have been, it is sufficient. There was no dispute over the identity of the property. The petition being sufficient, the evidence of A. H. Aldrich, R. S. Fuller, and Joel Bacon was properly admitted.

The plaintiff complains of the ruling of the court in excluding certain evidence of the defendant, Babb. If there was any error in the action of the court in this assignment, it was immediately cured by the court permitting Mr. Babb, in answer to the very next question, to go over the whole ground, and testify fully all about the conversation had between himself and Aldrich, which was the conversation before excluded. Counsel for the plaintiff say the verdict and judgment are too large. The evidence of Mrs. Aldrich and the witness Fuller is sufficient to sustain the verdict. The trial court approved it, and we will not disturb it. The judgment was for the value of the ore simply, and not in the alternative. Such a verdict in replevin is irregular. But this court held in Ward v. Masterson, 10 Kan. 79, "that it was not necessary to reverse the judgment, and order a new trial; that it was sufficient to direct a modification, and that the judgment be entered in the alternative for the delivery of the possession, or, in case that cannot be had, for the recovery of the value." In this case, the plaintiff below did not get the property on her order of delivery; and the evidence of the plaintiff shows that the property was sold by him and taken away. We do not, therefore, deem it necessary to direct a modification of the judgment. It is recommended that the judgment in this case be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

RES ADJUDICATA—PLEADING.

Where, in an action brought to have certain shares in the capital stock of a corporation assigned to the plaintiff, upon the ground that the same had antecedently been purchased of the defendant, but never properly assigned to him, the defendant answered that all the issues involved in the case had been previously settled by the special findings, verdict, and judgment in another action between the same parties, and in the same court, and a demurrer was interposed to such answer, and sustained by the court below, held error.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, McPherson county; FRANK DOSTER, Judge.

John D. Milliken, for plaintiff in error. Simpson, Bowker & Travis and Lucien Earle, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. On the 29th day of December, 1886, G. W. Stockham commenced this action against Samuel Shepard, in the district court of McPherson county, alleging, in substance, that on the 9th day of June, 1883, the defendant sold and delivered to him 62½ shares of the capital stock of the Conway Town Company, but that no transfer had ever been made on the books of the company; that, owing to the fact that the stock stood in the name of Shepard, $26.18 of a dividend had been paid to him; and asked that upon the bringing of said stock into court, defendant be required and compelled to assign the same to the plaintiff, in proper form; and that he have judgment against the defendant for the dividend drawn. To this petition of the plaintiff the defendant answered—First, by general denial; second, that the possession of the stock had been obtained by fraud and force. And, afterwards, by way of a supplemental answer, set up—First, the fact that, in another action between the same parties and in the same court, all the matters of difference between them, as raised by the issues in this case, were tried, determined, and adjudicated; and, for a second defense, set up the further fact that he had a judgment for $800 against the plaintiff, which he asked to have allowed as an offset to the plaintiff's claim, to the extent of his judgment, interest, and costs. To this supplemental answer, the plaintiff demurred as to the first and second causes of action, which demurrer was sustained as to the first, and overruled as to the second. But previous to the court's passing upon the demurrer, the plaintiff, with the consent of the court, dismissed his second cause of action, wherein he asked for a money judgment for the dividend received by Shepard. The cause was tried to the court, and Shepard was ordered to sign his name to the certificate of stock which Stockham claimed he had sold to him. The facts in this case are peculiar and novel, and may be stated briefly as follows: Shepard owned 160 acres of land in McPherson county, and in consideration of $6,125, par value of stock in the Arkansas Valley Town Company, deeded to the company 40 acres for a town-site, as a part of Conway; on the 9th day of June, 1883, he sold the remaining 120 acres of his farm to Stockham, giving him a warranty deed for the same. It was claimed by Stockham that this sale included the stock in the town company; that he had neglected to have a written transfer made, but did obtain possession of the stock. Shepard claimed, however, that the possession of this stock was obtained without his consent, and by force and fraud. After the sale by Shepard to Stockham, he moved to Kingman county, and for some three years had no communication with the town company, or Stockham, except to receive notices of the annual meetings of the town company, and seemed to have had no knowledge that any dividends had been declared on the stock. Stockham, in the mean time, had been receiving the dividends upon this stock, which had been sent to the local agent at Conway. Some time in the month of July, 1886, Shepard returned to McPherson county on a visit, and received a letter from the post-office at Conway, from the town company, inclosing a draft to his order for $26.18, being a dividend upon the stock in question for the year 1886. He used the proceeds of this draft, and, in a short time, received a letter from Stockham notifying him that the dividend belonged to him; and, upon Shepard's refusal to account to him for the same, filed a complaint against Shepard, before a justice of the peace of McPherson county, charging him with stealing the money. He was subsequently arrested in Kingman county, and brought back to McPherson county, where the case was continued from time to time, and finally dismissed by the county attorney. On the 20th day of December, 1886, this suit was commenced, and, in a few days thereafter, an action was instituted by Shepard against Stockham for damages for malicious prosecution. This latter action was tried on the 19th day of October, 1887, in the district court of McPherson county, before a jury, and special findings and a verdict were rendered in favor of Shepard for $1,500, which was, upon a motion for a new trial, reduced by the court to $800. Ninety days were given to make a case for the supreme court, but, as a matter of fact, the case was never taken up. In this case, the jury rendered a special verdict, and among other questions asked and answered were the following: "State at what time, if at all, the plaintiff, Samuel Shepard, sold his certificate of shares in the Conway Town Company to the defendant G. W. Stockham. Answer. Never sold them. Q. 2. At what time was the certificate of shares of the plaintiff, Shepard, delivered to the defendant, Stockham? A. Never delivered." Upon the rendition of the judgment in the case for malicious prosecution, the plaintiff in error in this case obtained leave of the court to file a supplemental answer, setting up—First, that the issues involved in the case had all been settled, by the special findings, verdict, and judgment in the action for malicious prosecution, and were, therefore, res adjudicata; second, that if such was not the case, that Shepard had a judgment of $800 which he was entitled to set up as an offset in case the finding as to the ownership should be against him. The court sustained the demurrer as to the first cause of action, and overruled it as to the second, but upon the trial excluded all evidence tending to prove it. The trial of this case occurred on the 27th day of April, 1888.

The first ground of error relied upon is the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the defense of res adjudicata, set up in the supplemental answer. The real question for our determination is whether or not the same subject-matter between these parties was drawn in question, or included in the issue, so that it could be, or was, as a matter of fact, tried and determined by the special findings, verdict, and judgment in the former action, in the same court, and where the same persons were parties. A solution of this question is a decision of this case. "Three things," says Chief Justice SHAW, "seem to be necessary to constitute an adjudication, so that a former judgment may be pleaded as a bar to another suit—First, whether the subject-matter of a legal controversy, which is proposed to be brought before any court for adjudication, has been drawn in question, and whether the issues of the former judicial proceeding which has been determined, is a legal judgment on the matters, so that the whole question may have been determined by that adjudication; second, whether the proceedings were between the same parties, in the same right or capacity, relating to the subsequent suit, or with their privies, respectively, claiming through or under them, and bound and estopped by that which would bind and estop those parties; and, third, whether the former adjudication was had before a court of competent jurisdiction tion." Bigelow v. Winsor, 1 Gray, 302. It has become a settled rule of action, firmly established in our jurisprudence, that no man shall be twice vexed over the same controversy, and, following this principle, this court has said: "When the matters in an action have been passed upon, or, from the issues made by the pleadings, might have been passed upon, the judgment rendered in the case bars a subsequent suit for the same cause of action between the same parties. When the same cause of action has once been litigated and decided, that is an end of it, and the form of action is immaterial. If the cause is the same, the judgment is conclusive." Bank v. Rude, 23 Kan. 146. "There is a growing disposition to enlarge the scope of the doctrine of res adjudicata." Commissioners v. McIntosh, 30 Kan. 238, 1 Pac. Rep. 572. "The rule of res adjudicata applies as well to facts settled and adjudicated as to causes of action." Whitaker v. Hawley, 30 Kan. 327, 1 Pac. Rep. 508. We find the same doctrine enunciated by text-writers. "There are but few older principles or rules of law that have been handed down from generation to generation, from the earliest days of the Roman law to the present time, than that of estoppel." 1 Herm. Estop. § 1. "There is no doubt that a judgment or decree necessarily affirming the existence of any act is conclusive upon the parties or their privies, whenever the existence of the fact is again put in issue between them, not only when the subject-matter is the same, but when the point comes incidentally in question in relation to a different matter. * * * To render a matter res adjudicata, it is not essential that it should be distinctly and specifically put in issue by the pleadings. It is enough to have been shown and tried and settled in the former suit." Freem. Judgm. § 249. "To constitute a judgment in one case a bar to another action, it is not necessary that the object of the two suits be the same, nor that the parties should stand in the same relative position to each other." Barker v. Cleveland, 19 Mich. 230. "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive on the parties as to all points directly involved in it, and necessarily determined." Shirland v. Bank, 21 N. W. Rep. 200; Hahn v. Miller, 28 N. W. Rep. 51. "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction upon a particular matter, fact, or point, once litigated and determined, is conclusive between the parties or their privies." Wales v. Lyon, 2 Mich. 282. "Such judgment is conclusive when given in evidence, though not pleaded by way of estoppel." Trayhern v. Colburn, 66 Md. 277, 7 Atl. Rep. 459. The estoppel of an issue on a particular point, or of the judgment itself as to the point which it decides, will be conclusive as to the points in any subsequent proceeding, whether founded on the same or a different cause of action. 1 Herm. Estop. § 111, and cases there cited; 3 Smith, Lead. Cas. (9th Ed.) 2095; Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351; Wilson's Ex'r v. Deen, 121 U. S. 525, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1004; Gardner v. Buckbee, 3 Cow. 120; Furneaux v. Bank, 39 Kan. v.25p.no.9—36

146, 17 Pac. Rep. 854. When a matter is once adjudicated, it is conclusively determined as between the same parties and their privies; and this determination is binding, as an estoppel, in all other actions, whether commenced before or after the action in which the adjudication was made. Freem. Judgm. § 249; Poorman v. Mitchell, 48 Mo. 45; Allis v. Davidson, 23 Minn. 442; Casebeer v. Mowry, 55 Pa. St. 419. In the latter case, the court said: "The date is of no consequence. It is the fact of an adjudication on the subject-matter between the same parties, which gives effect to the former recovery. The operation is the same, whether the record be pleaded by the one or the other of the parties." It seems to us that, tested by the well-settled rule "that a man shall not be twice vexed for one and the same cause," and the great weight of authorities, the judgment relied on and set up in the supplemental answer of the defendant is within the rule, and a bar to this action.

Stockham charged Shepard with stealing this dividend of $26.18, and had him arrested, and he was subsequently discharged. Shepard then sued Stockham for malicious prosecution, and in that suit it was determined, by a finding of the jury, that this very stock had never been sold by Shepard to Stockham. This was an essential and important fact in that controversy. It was determined by a judicial examination and verdict, and, in our judgment, was conclusive, and the demurrer was improperly sustained. Something has been said about the sufficiency of the plea, but we think it good, upon demurrer. If it were not sufficiently full, definite, and certain, the proper way to have raised that question would have been by motion. The demurrer should have been overruled. It is not necessary for us to notice the other errors complained of. We recommend a reversal of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

SAUM v. LA SHELL.

COSTS—OFFER OF JUDGMENT.

The plaintiff commenced an action before a justice of the peace for $160. The defendant immediately tendered to the plaintiff $35, and afterwards filed a bill of particulars, neither admitting nor denying the plaintiff's claim, nor asking judgment, for any amount, but showing a claim in his own favor, and against the plaintiff, for $65. The case was afterwards taken to the district court on appeal, and was there tried before the court and a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $26.25. The defendant then filed a motion asking that, because of the aforesaid tender, all the costs made in the case after the return of the summons in the justice's court should be taxed against the plaintiff, which motion was overruled by the court, and judgment was then rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the amount of the verdict, and for costs of suit. Held that, as it was not shown that the tender was kept good, or that any offer was ever made by the defendant to confess judgment for any amount, no error was committed by the trial court in overruling the defendant's motion, and in rendering the aforesaid judgment for costs.

Error from district court, Norton county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

J. R. Hamilton and H. J. Harwl, for plaintiff in error. F. M. Jeffrey and Jones & Thompson, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought before a justice of the peace of Norton county by G. B. La Shell against Charles M. Saum, in which the plaintiff, by his bill of particulars, claimed $160. The defendant filed a bill of particulars, in which he neither admitted nor denied anything stated in the plaintiff's bill of particulars, but showed a claim against the plaintiff, and in his own favor, for $65. The case, after passing through the justice's court, and by appeal into the district court, was tried before the court and a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $26.25. The defendant then filed a motion asking that all the costs made in the case, after the return of the summons in the justice's court, should be taxed against the plaintiff, for the reason that, after the issuing of the summons, the defendant had tendered to the plaintiff an amount greater than the amount of the verdict, and the costs which had accrued at the time of the tender, and also that he had offered, in writing, to confess judgment for that amount, which tender and offer the plaintiff refused, which motion was overruled by the court, and judgment was then rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the amount of the verdict, and for costs of suit; and afterwards the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brought the case to this court.

The only question presented to this court for consideration is whether the court below erred or not in rendering judgment for costs against the defendant. We cannot say that any such error was committed. It does not appear that the defendant ever offered, in writing, or otherwise, to confess judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against himself, for any amount, or that he was ever willing to do so, or that either the justice of the peace or the district court ever had any notice that any tender was ever made, until on the trial in the district court, when the tender was disclosed and brought to light by the defendant's evidence. It appears from the defendant's evidence, introduced on the trial in the district court, that, at the time of the service of the summons in the justice's court, the defendant tendered to the plaintiff the sum of $35; but it does not appear that he kept this tender good. It does not appear that he brought the amount tendered, or any amount, into court, or that he offered to do so, or that the fact of the tender was, at any time prior to the trial in the district court, brought to the attention of either the justice of the peace or the district court, and probably it was not. In the justice's court, he filed a bill of particulars, in which it would seem that he claimed $65 as against the plaintiff, and did not admit that he owed the plaintiff anything. Under such circumstances, it cannot be held that the court below erred in rendering judgment against the defendant for the costs which accrued in the case. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CONDIFF V. KANSAS CITY, FT. S. & G. R. CO.

INJURIES TO EMPLOYEES — EXPOSURE TO SAVE HUMAN LIFE — INSTRUCTIONS — EVIDENCE.

1. Exposure of life by an employee to save life is neither wrongful nor negligent, if attempted within the scope of an employee's duty, unless made under circumstances constituting rashness in the judgment of prudent persons.

2. Where an exposure is made for the purpose of saving human life, and the person making the exposure is injured thereby, it is for the jury to say whether the conduct of the party injured is to be deemed rash or reckless.

3. The trial court is not required to give instructions which need limitations and qualifications to make them applicable to the case.

4. The evidence and instructions in this case examined, and held, that the trial court committed no error, prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff, in giving or refusing instructions.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Bourbon county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

On the 6th day of September, 1887, James S. Condiff, as administrator of the estate of C. W. Condiff, deceased, brought his action against the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Gulf Railroad Company, to recover $10,000 damages for injuries received by Charles W. Condiff, on the 3d day of November, 1885, from which injuries he died soon after. The railroad company filed an answer, denying generally the allegations of the petition, and also alleging "that if the intestate of the plaintiff was injured by defendant, the negligence of said intestate directly and proximately contributed to said injury." Trial had at the May term of the court for 1888, before the court with a jury. The jury returned a verdict for the railroad company. The plaintiff filed its motion for a new trial, which was overruled. He thereupon excepted to the rulings of the court and the judgment rendered, and brings the case here.

Ware, Biddle & Cory, for plaintiff in error. Charles W. Blair, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) Charles W. Condiff, deceased, was, on November 3, 1885, a section foreman on the line of the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Gulf Railroad. He had charge of a crew of five hands, working section No. 32, between the villages of Arcadia and Mulberry, in Crawford county. The latter village was the head-quarters of the foreman and crew, and the point from which they all started on the day named on a hand-car, at 7 o'clock A. M., to work on the track at the mouth of the cut where they had been engaged the day before. Besides the six men on the hand-car there were dinner-buckets, water-pails, material, torpedoes, spikes, shovels, picks, and other tools. The distance that the party had to go was about  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles, and there was a freight train, (No. 33,) south bound, due and behind time, to be met. They knew that some place on the line, before arriving at their destination, they would probably meet this train, and on the route they stopped to listen for the train, not being able to hear it while the hand-car was in motion. The wind was from the south, blowing in the same direction they were going, which made it still more difficult to hear a train approaching them from the north. From the last stop, their course, a distance of 954 feet, was over a bridge, and a long trestle and dump or fill, on which it was not practicable to remove their hand-car and tools, without pitching them down where they could not get the hand-car back, if at all, without great labor. From the last stop they proceeded over the bridge, trestle, and fill, with great haste, to their place of work, which was at the end of the fill and mouth of the cut, where there was a public road-way across the track. They heard and saw nothing of the train before the start over the bridge. They could make the 954 feet in about a minute. At the time they arrived at the crossing or point of work, they saw the train rounding a curve into the cut. This train consisted of an engine, tender, and a large number of empty freight-cars. One of the witnesses of plaintiff testified that the hand-car was about 90 feet from the engine when he first saw it, although he testified afterwards that when they arrived at the place for work, he saw the train 250 yards, or 750 feet, distant. The engineer testified that when he first saw the hand-car, he was distant from it about 150 feet, and that he saw it as soon as it came in line of vision; that he could not see it before, because of the cut and curves on the line of the railroad. The hand-car was slackening speed at the crossing, just as the crew saw the engine. The train was behind time, and was running rapidly on a slight up-grade through the cut. After the parties on the hand-car saw the engine, they stopped it as soon as they could. After the hand-car was stopped, Condiff gave the engineer of the train a signal to slow up. He then turned round (before this he had been facing the engine) and attempted, with the sectionmen, to take the hand-car off the track. There did not seem time for this to be done, and Condiff told the men with him "to let loose the hand-car." The men let loose the car, left the track, and were uninjured. Condiff did not make any effort to get off the track. The engine struck the hand-car and injured him so that he died within a few days. When the engine struck the car, it went up on the pilot under the head-light, and the tools were scattered along the track. The plaintiff's theory is that the freight train was behind time; that it was running faster than the rules of the road permitted, in order to make up lost time; that it could have been stopped on the grade inside of 450 feet; that the front brakeman was riding on the engine, where he had no business; and that the deceased lost his life in trying to save the property of the railroad company, and the lives of its employees.

The court refused to give the following instructions, which were asked by the plaintiff: "(1) If, from the appearances, the deceased believed that, by pushing the hand-car forward, and getting it in motion, he could avert a wreck of the train, and probable loss of life consequent thereon, it was not negligence on his part to make the attempt, even though he believed that he might fail, and receive an injury himself. (2) Under the circumstances in which the deceased was placed, he was justified in using every prudent effort in his power to avert the wreck of the freight train, and the loss of life that might result therefrom, and if he so acted and lost his life, he cannot be charged with negligence. (3) It is not negligence in an employee to risk his life to prevent an accident that might be attended with loss of life to his co-employees, and great destruction of his employer's property. (4) Exposure of life by an employee to save life is neither wrongful nor negligent, if attempted within the scope of an employee's duty. (5) If from the circumstances it appears to you that the deceased believed he could save the wreck of the train, and the probable consequence of loss of life and property, and acted in that direction, and, in so acting, lost his life, his acts in that regard cannot be considered negligent." On the contrary, the court instructed as follows: "If C. W. Condiff saw the train time enough before the collision, under the circumstances as detailed in the evidence, to get out of the way and avoid accident, then the failure, if any, to sound the whistle, would not make the railroad company liable for his death. If Condiff saw the danger of possible collision before it took place, and could have saved himself by stepping off the track, but did not do so, the plaintiff cannot recover. The defendant in this case sets up that Condiff contributed to the injury by his acts and conduct. Now, if you find that the injury happened through his own fault, through his own carelessness or negligence in stepping or getting in front of the engine without using ordinary care or prudence, then he in that way contributed to the injury, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this case."

The important question, therefore, presented by the record is whether the court committed material error in refusing the instructions prayed for. Most of the instructions refused, requested the court to charge as a matter of law that the deceased, in refusing to leave the track or hand-car, was not guilty of negligence, if at the time he believed, by pushing the hand-car or getting it in motion, he could avert the wreck of the train and probable loss of life. The instructions refused, stating as a matter of law that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence, were improper for three reasons: First. They directed the jury that if the deceased placed himself in the position of danger for the protection of property, he was not negligent. Second. They were not limited or qualified by informing the jury that the efforts of the deceased to avert the wreck of the train and probable loss of life must have been so made as to be compatible with a reasonable regard for his own safety; that is, in his efforts to save life, he must not have acted under such circumstances as constituted rashness in the judgment of prudent persons. And, third, whether he acted prudently under all the circumstances detailed in the evidence was a matter to be determined by the jury, not the court. The court might very properly have stated to the jury that they were to decide, from all of the circumstances of the case, whether the deceased used ordinary care or prudence in not leaving the track, or in getting in front of the engine. It did give an instruction somewhat similar to this. We are in full accord with the decision announced in Eckert v. Railroad Co., 43 N. Y. 502, and similar cases, that "the law has so high a regard for human life it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under circumstances constituting rashness in the judgment of prudent persons;" but where a person voluntarily places himself, for the protection of property merely, in a position of danger, we are not prepared to say that he is not negligent. If Conditt was struck by the engine of the train while attempting merely to protect the hand-car or tools from injury, we cannot say that he was free from fault or negligence. So much of one of the instructions which were refused as stated "that exposure of life by an employee to save life is neither wrongful nor negligent, when attempted within the scope of an employee's duty," is a correct statement of the law, if it were qualified by the instruction, "if made under such circumstances as not constituting rashness in the judgment of prudent persons." The instructions refused did not contain this limitation or qualification. When the exposure is for the purpose of saving human life, it is for the jury to say, from all the circumstances of the case, whether the conduct of the person injured is to be deemed rash and reckless. The court cannot, in such a case, charge as a matter of law that the exposure is not negligence.

A careful reading of the evidence preserved in the record fails to convince us that sufficient was introduced to render a refusal of the instructions prayed for so erroneous as to reverse the judgment. Two of the persons who were upon the hand-car with Conditt at the time it was stopped testified upon the trial as witnesses for the plaintiff. One of these, William Preston, among other things, testified as follows: "Question. Did Mr. Conditt, after last looking back at the engine, make any effort to get off the track? Answer. He did not, to the best of my knowledge. He seemed to be excited some way or other. His intention was to move the hand-car to prevent a wreck, I suppose. Q. What effort, if any, did his noticing the engine, and his position at that time, seem to have upon him? A. It did not seem to have any effect on him. He seemed to be dumb struck at that time, and did not seem to realize what he was doing." The other one, George A. Fisher, testified, among other things: "Question. How fast was the train going when you first saw it? Answer. About 25 miles per hour to the best of my judgment. Q. What did Conditt do with reference to checking the train when he first saw it, if anything? A. He didn't do anything when he first saw it, until the hand-car was stopped. Then he gave the engineer signal to slow up. Q. What did he do then? A. He turned around, (he had been facing the engine before,) and attempted to take the hand-car and tools off the track. Q. Describe fully the situation at the time he was injured, and just prior thereto. A. Well I can't describe his position just immediately before. I had to look out for myself. When the damage was done I was on one side of the train, and he was on the other. When I last saw him, he had just returned from facing the engine to the hand-car, and told us boys 'to let loose the hand-car,' and that was the last I saw of him till the damage was done. I could not swear to his taking hold of the hand-car, for I did not see him. We were trying to get the hand-car off the track. When he first got off, he signaled the engineer to slow up. Then told the boys to let loose the hand-car. Then we got away; left the track entirely. Q. Was the hand-car moving from the engine at the time it was struck? A. I could not answer that, because I was not looking. I was looking the other way. Q. Why were you trying to get the hand-car off the track? A. It was company property, and we wanted to save it, and to prevent a wreck. Q. What effect, if any, did Conditt's noticing the engine and his position at that time have upon him? A. He seemed to be terribly excited." There was no evidence showing or tending to show that the freight train, coming at the rate testified, was liable to be wrecked by striking the hand-car. It did strike the hand-car without materially injuring the train, or any one on it. The hand-car, when struck, went up on the front of the engine, and the tools upon it were scattered. The only person injured was the deceased. One witness testified that it was the intention of Conditt to move the hand-car, to prevent a wreck. Whether he meant the wreck of the hand-car or the wreck of the train, he did not state. Even this evidence was his opinion only. In the excitement under which he was acting, Conditt may have desired to save the hand-car, which was in his charge, as also the material and tools upon it. While we may take judicial notice, considering the speed of the train and the position of the hand-car when the men at Conditt's instance, gave up the attempt to lift the hand-car off the track, that a collision between the two was inevitable, we cannot say, with the meager evidence before us that by the engine striking the hand-car there was imminent danger to the lives of the employees upon the train, or to any one of them. The evidence shows, however, that all the efforts of Conditt to lift or throw the hand-car from the track had ceased, as being impracticable, before he told his men "to let loose the car." After that, he had the opportunity to leave the track. He did not leave, but remained alone by the hand-car. It is not shown by any evidence that his subsequent attempt to give the hand-car a backward motion averted, or was liable to avert, injury to the employes on the freight train or any one of them. We know that moving the hand-car backward would cause less resistance to the speeding train, but whether this would be of any practical benefit to prevent the train from being thrown off the track by a collision with the hand-car at the rapid rate it was going, we cannot determine, nor could the jury determine, without some evidence. No expert railroad man or other witness testified upon this point. Considering the scantiness of evidence as to the probable or possible effect to the employes on the freight train from a collision with the hand-car, and the failure of the instructions refused to contain the limitations or qualifications pointed out, we cannot say that error prejudicial to the plaintiff was committed in giving or refusing instructions. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

REDEMPTION FROM TAX-SALE — ISSUANCE OF TAX-DEED.

The cases of English v. Williamson, 34 Kan. 212, 8 Pac. Rep. 214, and Cable v. Coates, 36 Kan. 191, 12 Pac. Rep. 931, referred to and commented upon.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

On rehearing. For former report, see ante, 218.

Malcolm Nicolson, for plaintiff in error.
George G. Cornell, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. It was urged in support of a rehearing of this case that the former opinion was in conflict with Cable v. Coates, 36 Kan. 191, 12 Pac. Rep. 931. Cable v. Coates followed English v. Williamson, 34 Kan. 212, 8 Pac. Rep. 214. The opinion, however, in the former case failed to state, as it should have done, that September 4, 1881, was Sunday. In the case of English v. Williamson, it was said that, "under the statutes above quoted, [Civil Code, § 722.] when the last day comes on Sunday, that day, as well as the first, shall be excluded, and we suppose our tax laws, as well as all other statutes, were enacted with reference to this rule, and therefore that the rule should govern. Besides, we would also think that such rule should govern upon general principles. If Sunday, in such a case, is not excluded, the owner of the property would not have the full three years given to him by statute within which to redeem his property from the taxes, while the statutes in express terms give him that time, and more than that time." As September 4, 1881, was Sunday, the owner of the land in the Cable-Coates case had all of September 5, 1881, in which to redeem; but the tax-deed was issued in that case at 2 o'clock P. M. of September 5, 1881, and therefore was prematurely issued. With this explanation, the Cable-Coates case is in line with the English-Williamson case, and the opinion handed down follows both of those cases. The motion for rehearing will be overruled.

Under the statutes of this state, no proceeding to reverse, vacate, or modify any judgment or final order can legally be commenced in the supreme court, except within one year after the making or the rendering of such judgment or final order, unless the party instituting the same has in the mean time been under some legal disability.

Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

Vance & Campbell, for defendants in error.

VALENTINE, J. There can scarcely be any doubt as to the correctness of the decision of the court below, and yet, upon the record brought to this court, this court has no jurisdiction to determine whether such decision was correct or not. The decision was made and rendered on July 30, 1887, and the proceeding to reverse the same was not instituted in this court until September 25, 1888, nearly 14 months intervening. Now, under the statutes of this state, no proceeding to reverse, vacate, or modify any judgment or final order can legally be commenced in the supreme court, except within one year after the making or the rendering of such judgment or final order, unless the party instituting the same has, in the mean time, been under some legal disability. QUIETING TITLE—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE.

In an action by the plaintiffs to quiet title, where it appeared that they purchased the land of the agents of the owner on the 6th day of June, and the defendants bought the same land, and the landlord's interest in the lease of the owner, without previous knowledge of the sale, on the 8th, taking a bond for a deed, which was properly acknowledged and duly recorded on the 18th of the same month, and the defendants entered upon the land about the same time, with the consent of the tenant, who had a lease of the premises for one year, to dig coal, and afterwards, on hearing of the sale by the agents, the owner made a deed for the same land to the plaintiffs, which recited the fact that it was given subject to a certain mortgage, and the bond for a deed, given to the defendants, and the plaintiffs purchased the interest of the tenant in the premises, but permitted him to remain in possession, and there is no other evidence of possession, upon the part of plaintiffs, held that, as against the plaintiffs, the defendants were entitled to a decree quieting the title to the land.

I. O. Pickering and J. Harvey Frith, for plaintiffs in error. J. Jay Buck, for defendants in error.

GREEN, C. On the 1st day of August, 1887, the plaintiffs in error commenced this action in the district court of Lyon county to quiet the title to the S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  and the E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 23; also 2 74-100 acres in the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 27,—all in township 16 of range 12; alleging, in general terms, that they were in possession, and that the defendants set up and claimed an estate and interest adverse to plaintiffs' title. The defendants answered by denying generally the petition, and claimed that they were the equitable owners of the land, and, by way of a cross-bill, alleged possession of the premises, adverse claim of the plaintiffs, and asked for affirmative relief by way of annulment of plaintiffs' title, and that their title be quieted.

The case was tried to the court, and the following conclusions of fact made: "(1) On and before May 27th, William Lewis owned the land in controversy. (2) Glendenning and Sawyer were real-estate agents at Admire, Kansas, and were, by the said Lewis, duly authorized to sell said land. (3) On June 6, 1887, said agents sold said land to the plaintiffs by contract, in writing. Said writing consisted of the letters and telegrams in evidence, which were written and signed by the said plaintiffs, and by said agents of the said Lewis, Glendenning and Sawyer. The said plaintiffs paid on said contract the sum of $100 at the time it was made, and were able, ready, and willing to pay the remainder of the purchase price, upon the receipt of the deed from said Lewis for said land. (4) Immediately after closing said sale, and on June 6, 1887, said agents informed said Lewis of said sale by mail. Lewis resided at Lerado, Reno county, Kansas. (5) The land in controversy is located within one and one-half miles of the village of Admire, in Lyon county, Kansas, and the defendants all reside in said village of Admire, near said land. (6) On June 8, 1887, at Lerado, Kansas, said Lewis made an agreement with one T. D. Griffith, who was agent of the defendants, to sell said land to the defendants upon the terms and conditions stated in the bond for a deed, a copy of which is attached to defendants' answer in this action, and to which reference is here made; and the said T. D. Griffith, as agent for the said defendants, then paid to said Lewis the sum of $200 cash, and executed the defendants' negotiable notes for the $800, and the $1,000 mentioned in said bond. (7) At the time of the execution and delivery of said bond for a deed, and payment of said $200, and the execution of said notes, as aforesaid, neither the said defendants nor their said agent, T. D. Griffith, had any knowledge or notice whatever of the aforesaid purchase by the plaintiffs. (8) On June 18, 1887, the defendants duly filed their said bond for deed, in Lyon county, Kansas, for record, it having been duly acknowledged when executed. (9) On June 20, 1887, Lewis, having heard of the aforesaid sale to the plaintiffs, carried out the same by executing to them a general warranty deed to said land. Said deed contained, among other recitals, the following, viz.: 'The above-described land is free and clear of all incumbrances whatever, except a mortgage of $1,700 on same land, together with a bond for a deed held by Griffith and Brown on said land.' The plaintiffs, in consideration of said deed, paid Lewis the purchase price agreed upon by them with the said Glendenning and Sawyer, on June 6, 1887, as aforesaid. Said payment was made in cash, and amounted to the sum of $1,800. The plaintiffs, to procure said deed, indemnified Lewis against loss on account of the said sale to the defendants. The plaintiffs duly recorded said deed June 25, 1887. (10) At the time of the foregoing transactions said land was in the actual possession of a tenant of Lewis, who was entitled to the possession thereof until March 1, 1888. Said tenant, after June 20, 1887, sold out his right to the plaintiffs, surrendered possession of said land as said plaintiffs' tenant, and was so in possession when this suit was begun. (11) After said purchase and possession by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, the defendants claiming said land entered thereon, and began prospecting for coal, and were so prospecting thereon when this suit was begun. (12) Lewis, after the delivery of the deed to the plaintiffs, and before this suit was brought, tendered to the defendants the cash paid and the notes given by them, which they refused to receive. (13) After this suit was brought, the defendants tendered full payment of the notes given to Lewis, and demanded a deed, which was refused. (14) On June 4, 1887, W. H. Brown, one of the defendants, and the aforesaid T. D. Griffith, went to the land in controversy, and there inquired of the said tenant, then living on said land, as to the residence of Lewis, and were informed by said tenant that said Lewis resided at Lerado, Kansas. They were also informed at said time that the aforesaid Glendenning & Sawyer, real-estate agents at Admire, Kansas, were trying to get the agency for the sale of said land. (15) On the 7th day of June, 1887, said Griffith left Admire and went to Lerado, Kansas, and there concluded the transaction mentioned in conclusion number 6 herein. Neither Griffith nor said defendants made any inquiry of said Glendenning and Sawyer concerning said land before said Griffith left, as aforesaid. It is about two hundred miles from Admire to Lerado. (16) The plaintiffs, prior to and at the time of all the foregoing transactions, were the managing officers of a coal company operating at the said village of Admire, and the aforesaid Glendenning and Sawyer were the local agents of said coal company at Admire, and superintendents of its business." Upon the above findings, the court held, as a conclusion of law, that the defendants below were entitled to the land, and rendered judgment quieting the title in defendants, and for costs, against the plaintiffs, who bring the case here.

The first contention is that the defendants did not prove that they were in possession of the land at the commencement of the action, and hence could not have affirmative relief; that, according to the findings, the plaintiffs were in possession. The situation, in regard to the possession of this land, was somewhat peculiar. It appears from the evidence and special findings that William Lewis owned the land in controversy in May, 1887. On June 6th, Glendenning & Sawyer, as agents of the owner, sold the land to the plaintiffs. Two days after this, Lewis gave the defendants a bond for a deed for the same land, in which it was stipulated that the defendants were to have the landlord's share of all of the growing crops and fruit from the place, except $50 of the proceeds of the orchard. The farm was in the actual possession of a tenant, who was entitled to remain in possession until the 1st of March following. On the 18th of June, the defendants filed their bond for a deed in the office of the register of deeds of Lyon county, it having been properly acknowledged. About the 20th of June, the defendants, with the consent of the tenant, went onto the land to prospect for coal. On June 20th, Lewis made a deed to the plaintiffs containing the recitation set out in the ninth finding. Some time after this, the tenant sold out his right to the plaintiffs, but still remained on the place, and plaintiffs in error claim that he continued to hold the actual possession of the land as their tenant. Let us see how this could affect the rights of the defendants. This sale took place the 5th day of July. The defendants held a bond for a deed, which was of record some days before this, for the land, and the right to the landlord's share of the crop, except $50 of the proceeds of the orchard. Could this sale, by the tenant of Lewis, interfere with defendants' possession, or confer any rights upon the plaintiffs, who took a deed after the recording of this bond for a deed, with an express recitation therein that the conveyance was made subject to this instrument, and to procure the same the plaintiffs were obliged to indemnify the former owner against loss, and the tenant could not, under section 11 of the landlord and tenant act, transfer his interest, or any part thereof, to another, without the written assent of the landlord, or person holding under him? Section 3620, Gen. St. 1889. We think, under this bond for a deed, the defendants below held the equitable title to the land, and owned the landlord's interest in the lease, and the evidence and special findings show a sufficient possession to entitle the defendants to a decree, quieting the title, as against the plaintiffs. We see no reason for disturbing the judgment of the court below, and recommending an affirmance thereof.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. MOURIQUAND.

EMINENT DOMAIN—DAMAGES—EXPERT EVIDENCE—VIEW BY JURY.

1. A person who has testified on the trial that he is 50 years of age; that he has followed farming all his life; that he has had experience in growing orchards of fruit trees; that he has put out in his life-time three or four different orchards; that he knew at the time of the construction of the railroad through the premises that there was "quite a nice little orchard there;" that he had been over the premises very frequently; that he lived only two miles from the same; that while he could not say he knew the particular trees taken, he knew what fruit trees planted in such an orchard were reasonably worth at the time of the construction of the road,—is competent to give his opinion of the value of fruit trees, two, three, and five years old, which were growing in an orchard on the premises, but taken or destroyed by a railroad company in constructing its road over its right of way.

2. The case of City of Topeka v. Martineau, 42 Kan. 387, 22 Pac. Rep. 419, followed.

Error from district court, Chautauqua county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

HORTON, C. J. Mrs. S. J. Mouriquand appealed to the district court of Chautauqua county from the award of commissioners condemning a right of way through lands owned by her. The condemnation commissioners awarded as damages the sum of $202.50. Three acres of land were taken for the right of way. The jury returned a verdict of $772.10. Judgment was entered upon the verdict. The railroad company excepted to the rulings and judgment of the court, and brings the case here. Upon the trial, there was evidence tending to show that, in constructing the railroad across the premises in controversy, 137 peach trees, 9 apple trees, 2 cherry trees, and 1 plum tree were taken or destroyed. Some of the witnesses, who knew the value of peach, apple, cherry, and plum trees in the orchard, and had actual knowledge of the trees taken from the premises, testified that the peach and apple trees were worth $5 each, and the plum and cherry trees $2 each. $228.15 were allowed for the trees taken. Complaint is made because D. C. Chilcote was permitted to testify as to the value of the fruit trees when he was not acquainted with the particular trees taken or destroyed by the railroad. We think his evidence was competent. He testified that he was 50 years of age; that he lived two miles from the premises; that he had resided there six years; that he had been over the premises very frequently; that he had followed all his life farming and cattle raising; that he had had experience in growing orchards of fruit trees; that he had put out in his life-time three or four different orchards; that he knew at the time of the construction of the railroad through the premises that there was "quite a nice little orchard upon it," and, while he could not say that he knew the particular trees taken, he knew what fruit trees planted in such an orchard were reasonably worth at the time of the construction of the road. He had, therefore, such knowledge and experience as enabled him to form an opinion as to the value of the trees. "It is not necessary," said JOHNSON, J., in case of Whitbeck v. Railroad Co., 36 Barb. 644, "that he [the witness] should actually have seen or been familiarly acquainted with the trees in question. It was enough that he was acquainted with the fruit business in that neighborhood, and the value of similar property there." See Lawson, Exp. Ev. 19.

Complaint is further made that the court erred in instructing the jury concerning the view of the premises which they had been permitted to make. One or two lines of the instructions are open to criticism, but we do not think, in view of the decision in City of Topeka v. Martineau, 42 Kan. 387, 22 Pac. Rep. 419, that the instructions were so incorrect as to reverse the judgment. In the Martineau case, this court ruled that a direction to the jury to use the result of their observation in connection with the sworn evidence was not erroneous. In the present case the court said, among other things, to the jury: "You have also been permitted to go in a body and view the premises, in addition to hearing this evidence, and you are at liberty to take into consideration, in making up your verdict, whatever you may have seen in and about the premises." With the admonition that they were not to rest their verdict solely on what they learned at the view, it might have been better to have gone no further in the instruction referred to, as the object of permitting the jury to view the premises is to enable them to intelligently understand and apply the testimony which has been introduced before them. But, when the court directed the jury to disregard any evidence, it must be construed with the following language: "In making up your verdict you should consider the evidence, and give it fair and impartial consideration, and you will also take into consideration your own view of the premises." The jury were permitted by the whole instruction to decide between the conflicting evidence upon their own view of the premises. Had the jury disregarded all the sworn evidence, and returned a verdict upon their own view of the premises, then it might be said that the evidence which the jurors acquired from making the view had been elevated to the character of exclusive or predominating evidence. This is not allowable. The evidence of the witnesses introduced in the court on the part of the land-owner supports fully the verdict. If the verdict was not supported by substantial testimony given by witnesses sworn upon the trial, we would set it aside; but, as the jury only took into consideration the result of their view of the premises, in connection with the sworn evidence produced before them, to determine between conflicting evidence, the instruction was not so erroneous as to require a new trial.

Complaint is also made that the special findings conflict with the general verdict. The thirteenth interrogatory, submitted to the jury, reads: "Question. What were the several elements and sources of damages which make the aggregate of all of the damages sustained by plaintiff? Give each item separately, with the amount of such damages. Answer. Trees, $228.15; pond, $100; opening gates, $250; land taken for right of way, $60; damage to land north and south of road, $61.85." Adding these items up, the total amount of damages, according to the special findings, amounts to $700, but the general verdict was $772. It appears, however, under the instruction of the court, that the jury allowed interest in their general verdict. Adding interest to the several itemized amounts in the special findings, and there is no conflict between these findings and the general verdict. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

APPEAL—SETTLEMENT OF CONTROVERSY—DISMISSAL.

Where, after a case has been brought on petition in error to the supreme court, it has been settled, and all the costs in the case provided for, so that no decision which the supreme court could render upon the merits would be of any benefit, or could answer any beneficial purpose so far as any of the parties are concerned, the case will be dismissed from the supreme court, although in the settlement of the case it was agreed between the parties that the case should remain in the supreme court and be decided by the court upon its merits.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Geary county; M. B. NICHOLSON, Judge.

McClure & Marshall, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. Counsel for the defendant in error, in his brief in this court, uses the following among other language: "Although the record fails to show it, the fact is, this case has been finally disposed of and settled, and ought to have been dismissed. I can see no reason to burden the supreme court with useless and unnecessary litigation of this kind." Counsel for the plaintiffs in error, in his reply brief, uses the following among other language: "In answer to the suggestion contained in the brief of the defendant in error 'that the case is settled,' and that the supreme court ought not to be burdened 'with useless and unnecessary litigation of this kind,' I will say that it is true that the case has been compromised, the costs in the district court have been paid, and the costs in this court have been provided for. But as a part of that compromise it was agreed and understood that the questions of law involved in the case should be settled, and to that end the case should retain its place on the docket of this court, and when its turn should come, it should be decided upon its merits. * * * The compromise was effected long after the case was brought to this court, and, as a part of the terms of that compromise, it was agreed and understood that the case should go to final judgment in this court; not for the benefit of the parties to this particular case, but for the benefit of the bench and the bar of the state." It seems to be admitted by counsel for both parties that no decision which this court could render in this case would be of any benefit, or could answer any beneficial purpose, so far as any of the parties to this action are concerned, but it is claimed that it will be of benefit to the bench and bar of the state. Now this court has no desire to be transformed into a moot court, and, agreeing with counsel for the defendant in error, we shall order the case to be dismissed. All the justices concurring.

CITY OF KANSAS CITY v. BIRMINGHAM.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 10, 1891.)

DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — LIABILITY OF CITY.

1. Evidence examined, and found to support the verdict and special findings of the jury that there was no contributory negligence.

2. That it was not error in the instructions given by the trial court to speak of an opening in a sidewalk as a "defect or excavation," under the circumstances of this case.

3. Several instructions examined, and held to be correct.

4. Where the court instructs the jury fully upon contributory negligence, it is under no obligation to repeat such instruction in another form at the request of the defendant.

5. Special instructions asked and refused, examined, and held that no error was committed.

6. It was not error for the court to instruct the jury that, if the contractor of the building being erected provided and maintained reasonably safe guards, or signals, to protect persons traveling along the sidewalk, in front of the same, this would relieve the city from liability, the same as though such guards and signals had been placed and maintained there by the city.

7. Answers to special questions examined, and held not to be evasive, and supported by some evidence.

Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

GREEN, C. James S. Birmingham, as administrator of the estate of Thomas Sewell, brought this action in the district court of Wyandotte county, against the city of Kansas City, to recover damages for the wrongful killing of his intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the city, in permitting an excavation in the sidewalk, on the west side of James street, and within the corporate limits of the city, to remain unprotected by barriers and lights, or other signals, to warn people of the danger of falling into the same. It appears that a building was being erected on the street in question, and an excavation had been made in the sidewalk for an area way under the same, 72 feet long, 12 feet wide, and 7 or 8 feet deep, and it is claimed that this excavation was not sufficiently protected, especially upon the south end, the only protection being a board nailed to the side of the building, immediately south of the building, some 3 feet above the sidewalk, and slanting diagonally to the outside line of the curb, a distance of 12 feet. It is claimed that there were no lights or barriers, other than this board, on the south side of the excavation; and that on the night of the 27th of July, 1886, Thomas Sewell fell into this excavation and was killed, from the carelessness and negligence of the defendant below. The action was tried by a jury, and a verdict and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, for $5,000. The city, claiming that there were errors upon the trial in the district court, brings the case here for review.

1. The first claim made by the city is that there was contributory negligence, without which the injury could not have occurred; and that the verdict and findings were against the evidence, and contrary to the law as given by the court. We have carefully considered the entire record in this case, and there is certainly some evidence to support the verdict and the special findings of the jury. One witness testified that he saw the deceased about half past 9 o'clock on the night of the 27th of July; that he was sober and in good health. He was found on the following morning in the excavation dead, and in answer to special questions, the jury said that he was not intoxicated on the night of the accident. It was disclosed in the evidence that a bottle was found upon his person, containing liquor, but there is nothing in the record to indicate that he was under the influence of liquor, when last seen on the night in question. There is evidence sufficient in the record to support the findings and verdict of the jury.

2. The plaintiff next complains that the court erred in giving the first and second paragraphs of the sixth instruction, which reads: "Before the plaintiff can recover a judgment in this action, it must appear by a preponderance of the evidence (1) that plaintiff's intestate, Thomas Sewell, was killed as the result of a defect or excavation in the sidewalk on James street in the defendant city, and that such excavation was left in an unsafe condition; and (2) that said city or its officers were negligent in permitting said sidewalk to remain in said unsafe condition at the time said Thomas Sewell is alleged to have been killed. To charge the defendant with negligence, it must appear that the proper officers of the city had notice of the unsafe condition of the sidewalk, in time to have prevented the killing of Thomas Sewell by falling into said excavation, or that by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, they could have known of the unsafe condition of said sidewalk, in time to have prevented such killing. By reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, is meant that degree of care and prudence which an ordinarily careful and prudent man would reasonably be expected to use, under similar circumstances." Counsel contends that the jury were misled by the court's instruction in calling the opening in the sidewalk a "defect," and that attention should have been directed more particularly to the question of the sufficiency of the guard and signal lights. Possibly, the instruction may be subject to some criticism in the language used, but it will be noticed that the court referred to this place as a "defect or excavation," and in one sense it was a "defect;" that is, there was a want of some thing necessary to make a complete sidewalk along James street, and to that extent it might be reasonably characterized as a defect. We do not think the lan-

3. The city complains of the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth instructions. In the seventh instruction, the court told the jury that every person "is presumed to act with ordinary care and prudence, until the contrary appears." The eighth instruction, counsel contends to be good law in the abstract, but bad law as applicable to the case at bar. The court simply stated the law as to the liability of cities for negligently permitting dangerous defects to remain in sidewalks, no matter how such condition was caused. The ninth instruction is a correct statement of the law, with reference to the use of the sidewalk, and the qualifying clause, "not already otherwise in use," contended for by counsel, was not necessary to make the instruction good. The tenth instruction is in regard to the necessity of notice, and the court correctly stated that it was not necessary that the city should have actual notice of the unsafe and dangerous condition of the sidewalk, if the jury should find that the dangerous condition had existed a sufficient length of time before the accident, to have enabled the city, through its officers, by ordinary care and diligence, to have known of the existence of such defects, and remedied the same. Counsel make the same criticism upon the court's language of "unsafe and dangerous condition of the sidewalk" which we have already noticed, and contend that the court erred in keeping before the jury the defective condition of the walk, instead of the defective manner of guarding, or of giving notice of the condition which he claimed was legal and permissive. We do not think the jury could have been misled by any of these instructions complained of, especially when taken in connection with the entire charge of the court.

4. Counsel for the city asked certain instructions upon contributory negligence which were refused, and this, he contends, is error. The court fully instructed the jury upon contributory negligence, and was under no obligation to repeat such instruction in another form, at the request of the defendant below.

5. The next error which counsel contends for is the refusal of the court to submit certain questions to the jury. The first question refused reads as follows: "From all the surrounding circumstances,—the erection of the building, the building material on the street, and the location of Sewell's residence, with relation thereto, and the direction to travel to and from his work,—do you find that the deceased knew, or had good reason to know, of the excavation and its surroundings at the time he sustained the injuries that caused his death?" While the court might, with propriety, have submitted this question to the jury, we do not think that it was prejudicial error to refuse the same, inasmuch as a number of the questions with reference to the condition of the sidewalk, and the sufficiency of the protection and signal lights, were submitted. The tenth special question, refused, reads as follows: "If you find that such guards and lights were there at the excavation, and that they were not sufficient to notify Sewell of the excavation, state what, in your opinion, would be reasonably necessary, in the shape of guards and lights, to have given any travelers on the sidewalk, exercising ordinary care, notice?" Clearly this question was properly refused by the court. The jury impaneled was simply to try the issues joined in the particular case, and it would not have been proper, by any question submitted to them, to call forth an opinion as to what was necessary to properly guard this excavation, and we think the question was very properly refused.

6. We see no error in the last instruction given by the court, of its own motion, which counsel for plaintiff in error contends was erroneous. The court told the jury in its instruction, that if the contractor of the building being erected, provided and maintained reasonably safe guards or signals to protect persons traveling along the sidewalk, in front of the building, from injury, this would relieve the city from liability the same as though such guards and signals had been placed and maintained there by order of the city, and we think this is a correct statement of the law.

7. The final error contended for is that the answers to the special questions were evasive, untrue, and not directly responsive to the questions themselves; but we do not think this position of counsel well taken. We have examined each special question answered by the jury in this case, and we think the answers are direct and intelligent responses to the questions propounded, and are each and all supported by some evidence. There is no error in the record, as brought to this court, and we recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

ROSS V. ALLEN.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—MEMORANDUM.

The following is a memorandum of an alleged contract for the sale of lots numbered 23 and 24, in block 74, in Leavenworth city proper, in the county of Leavenworth and state of Kansas, by Kate H. Allen to Charles J. Ross, viz.: "Leavenworth, March 19, 1887. Received one hundred dollars of Mrs D. Byington, a/c Chas. J. Ross, to apply on payment of eight thousand dollars ($8,000) for property number 617 and 619 Delaware street, block 74, city proper: two thousand to be paid when abstract and title is furnished, two thousand in ninety days, and balance two years, with interest at 8%; abstract to be furnished within 30 days. J. M. ALLEN, Agent." J. M. Allen was not the agent of Ross, and the memorandum was not signed by Ross, or by any one for him, and he did not, by any other writing, recognize or adopt the contract. In an action against Ross for specific performance, it is held that the memorandum was vague, indefinite, and insufficient, within the requirements of the statute of frauds, and that the contract is not such as can be specifically enforced.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Leavenworth county; ROBERT CROZIER, Judge.

This was an action to specifically enforce the performance of a contract alleged to have been entered into between the parties on or about the 19th day of March, 1887, by which Charles J. Ross purchased lots 23 and 24 in block 74, in Leavenworth, Kan., for the sum of $8,000. The written agreement set up by Kate H. Allen in her petition to sustain the cause of action is as follows: "Leavenworth, March 13, 1887. Received one hundred dollars of Mrs. D. Byington, a/c Chas. J. Ross, to apply on payment of eight thousand dollars ($8,000) for property number 617 and 619 Delaware street, block 74, city proper; two thousand to be paid when abstract and title is furnished, two thousand in ninety days, and balance two years, with interest at 8%; abstract to be furnished within 30 days. J. M. ALLEN, Agent." The plaintiff below further alleged that she had duly performed the terms of the contract upon her part so far as she could, and still stood ready to keep and perform the same, but that the defendant had failed, neglected, and refused to perform the contract upon his part in every respect. At the trial, the following findings of fact and conclusions of law were made and stated by the court:

"FINDINGS OF FACT.

"(1) That on, before, and since the 19th day of March, 1887, Kate H. Allen, the plaintiff, was a married woman. That her husband's name was Harvey Allen. That, ever since A. D. 1862, Kate H. Allen has been the owner in fee-simple of lots 23 and 24, in block 74, in the city of Leavenworth proper, in the county of Leavenworth, in the state of Kansas. That on the 19th day of March, 1887, Kate H. Allen was the owner of said lots in fee-simple, clear, free, and unincumbered of record. That on, before, and since said 19th day of March, 1887, James M. Allen was the duly authorized agent of Kate H. Allen in and about the sale of said lots, and on said 19th day of March, 1887, said James M. Allen, by the name of J. M. Allen, and as agent of Kate H. Allen, entered into an agreement for the sale of said lots 23 and 24, in block 74, Leavenworth city proper, Leavenworth county, Kansas, with the defendant, Charles J. Ross, and thereupon the said Charles J. Ross paid on such purchase the sum of $100 in cash, to said J. M. Allen, and thereupon said J. M. Allen, as agent for Kate H. Allen, signed and delivered to said Charles J. Ross a written memorandum in words and figures following: 'Leavenworth, March 19, 1887. Received one hundred dollars of Mrs. D. Byington, a/c Chas. J. Ross, to apply on payment of eight thousand dollars ($8,000) for property number 617 and 619 Delaware street, block 74, city proper; two thousand to be paid when abstract and title is furnished, two thousand in ninety days, and balance two years, with interest at 8%; abstract to be furnished within 30 days. J. M. ALLEN, Agent.' That said Charles J. Ross, immediately upon the receipt of said memorandum, caused the same to be recorded in the office of register of deeds in and for Leavenworth county, Kansas. That the property described in said memorandum and intended to be by said Allen and Ross is lots 23 and 24, block 74, in Leavenworth city proper, in the county of Leavenworth, in the state of Kansas.

"(2) That on the 26th day of March, 1887, Kate H. Allen and her husband, Harvey Allen, executed and acknowledged in due form of law their warranty deed to said premises, with full covenants of warranty to Charles J. Ross, and delivered the same to their agent, J. M. Allen, to be by him delivered to Charles J. Ross, under and in pursuance of the contract of purchase of said lots. And on said day said plaintiff caused a mortgage and notes to be prepared and sent to said Charles J. Ross by his directions, for execution, which notes were copied in the mortgage, and of which mortgage and the notes copied therein the following is a copy, to-wit: * * * That the said notes and mortgage were sent to said Charles J. Ross at his request by J. M. Allen, to be executed, and were received by said Charles J. Ross, and by him retained and produced upon the trial of this case.

"(3) That on or about the 29th day of March, 1887, an abstract of title to said lots was procured from Messrs. Spalding & Bowen, abstracters, etc., by J. M. Allen, agent of Kate H. Allen, and delivered by him, under instructions from Charles J. Ross, to John Sorenson, who then and there, as the agent of Charles J. Ross, delivered the same to W. C. Hook, a practicing attorney of Leavenworth, to examine and report upon to Charles J. Ross, which said Hook did on the 11th day of April, 1887, as will more fully appear by a copy of the following letter: 'Leavenworth, Kansas, April 11, 1887. Mr. Charles J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—Dear Sir: I have examined the abstract of title to lots 23 and 24, in block 74, in Leavenworth city proper, furnished by Spalding & Bowen, dated March 28, 1887. The patents from the United States to Charles Trowbridge to these lots should be procured from the land-office at Washington, and recorded in this county by Mrs. Allen. An affidavit should also be procured that C. E. Trowbridge, who made the deed to John Kerr of these lots on April 10, 1862, is the Charles Trowbridge, the patentee, and also that he was an unmarried man at the time he made the deed. With these exceptions, I believe the title to be clear in Kate H. Allen. Respectfully, WILLIAM C. HOOK.' That said letter and said abstract both referred to and showed that the title to said lots was in Kate H. Allen, and said letter and abstract were sent by said Hook to said Charles J. Ross on the 11th day of April, 1887, and, within a short time after their receipt, said Charles J. Ross delivered said letter and said abstract to J. M. Allen, who at once proceeded to obtain copies of the patents to said lots, and recorded the same, also to obtain the affidavits required in said letter, and completed all such matters on or before the 28th day of April, 1887.

"(4) On March 28, 1887, a letter, of which the following is a true copy, was written by J. M. Allen, agent, etc., to Charles J. Ross, and was sent to and received by said Charles J. Ross: 'Leavenworth Station, March 28th, 1887. Chas. J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—My Dear Sir: I herewith send you the mortgage and notes for signatures, which you can have signed and also acknowledge up there. Please have both mortgage and notes signed by your wife and yourself. The abstract will be completed Thursday noon, and, if you cannot come down yourself, you can send the mortgage and notes and money for first payment to Jno. Sorenson, and we will deliver the warranty deed, also the abstract, to him, to be forwarded to you. Hoping this will find your family improved in health, I am very truly yours, J. M. ALLEN, Agt. N. B. Will you please sign the notes and mortgage according to the copies of the notes embraced in the body of the mortgage, viz., Charles J. Ross, Nannie B. Ross," and oblige, J. M. A.' That on the 5th day of April, 1887, J. M. Allen, as agent for Kate H. Allen, wrote and mailed another letter to said Charles J. Ross, which said letter was duly received by said Ross, a copy of which is in the words and figures following: 'Leavenworth Station, April 5th, 1887. Chas. J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—Dear Sir: Your favor of the 4th received this A. M. In reply, I would say everything is in shape here. I gave the abstract complete to your friend Mr. Sorenson several days ago. Of course, under the circumstances, I don't like to try to hurry you, but we really need the money now. In fact, if we hadn't needed the money, the property wouldn't have been in market, as it lies directly in the line of improvement. I trust, therefore, you will have the papers up there fixed up as soon as you can without serious inconvenience. Please let me know about what day I can count on the money, so I can arrange with the party we owe to wait, and greatly oblige, J. M. ALLEN, Agt.' That on April 28, 1887, a letter, of which the following is a copy, was written by J. M. Allen, agent, to and received by said Charles J. Ross: 'Leavenworth Station, April 28th, 1887. Chas. J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—Dear Sir: I did not go to see you again Tuesday, therefore, by not getting that check, I missed the chance to get the place I told you about. Consequently, I will have to rent of you, I suppose. The party who is living in the little house is going out on the 1st, but I have a customer for it who will take it at $12.00 per month. I will pay you $18.00 for the one I live in, if that will be satisfactory. All this, however, has nothing to do with the original agreement "that the balance of the first payment was to be made when abstract was completed and title proven." This is to notify you that same is now completed and recorded as per directions in note of your attorney. I wish, therefore, you would come over tomorrow or Saturday, so we can fix things up and start in O. K. May 1st. Yours, truly, J. M. ALLEN, Agt.' Written across the face of the letter was: 'If you want the mortgage and notes changed, bring them along.' That said Charles J. Ross, by the name of C. J. Ross, answered said letter of April 28, on May 4, 1887, a copy of which is as follows: 'Iatan, Missouri, May 4, 1887. J. M. Allen, Esq.—Dear Sir: Do not know when I will be in 11-worth. Mr. Sorenson does not think he can take half of the property at present, and this throws me considerable off track. I will try to be in 11-worth before long. Yours, truly, C. J. Ross.' On May 7, 1887, J. M. Allen, agent, sent a letter to Charles J. Ross, which was by him duly received, a copy of which is as follows: 'Leavenworth Station, May 7th, 1887. Chas. J. Ross, Iatan—Dear Sir: Your favor of the 4th I have just read. Found the same here when I got back from trip I referred to. Relative to your answer, would say the business between yourself and Mr. Sorenson of course I know nothing about. In fact, that has nothing to do with the case. We did not know Mr. Sorenson in the trade at all. He had nothing to do with it except that he told me that Mr. Ross's word was just as good as gold. Now I, as the authorized agent of the property, sold you the place in good faith, and I expect, as Mr. Sorenson says you are a man of integrity, that you will come over and fix the business up. I have had several chances to sell the property since you bought it, and in one instance for more money. I would like to have you come over right off, so the business can be brought to a close. We are paying interest on money which we can stop, of course, at least a part of it. That really was the object in selling the place. Otherwise we could and would have kept the property and made the profit of it ourselves. You got the property very low, and could well afford to pay all cash if you wished to. At least Sorenson said so. He seems to have the utmost confidence in your ability. Let me know by return mail what day you will come over, so I will be sure to be here, and oblige J. M. ALLEN, Agt.' On May 17, 1887, J. M. Allen, agent, wrote a letter to Charles J. Ross, which was duly received, a copy of which is as follows: 'Leavenworth Station, May 17, 1887. Chas. J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—Dear Sir: I wrote to you about two weeks ago, but have received no reply. It seems to me that it is hardly the way for a man of business integrity to act. Common courtesy would entitle a business letter to a prompt reply. Now, what I want to know is this: Are you coming down to complete your contract or not? I am tired of fooling with it, and want you to come and fix up the business some way or other. I am willing to do what is fair and honorable at all times, and expect the same kind of treatment in return. I shall be at home all this week, and expect to see you down before Sunday. Very resp'y, J. M. ALLEN, Agt.' On July 12, 1887, said J. M. Allen, agent, sent to Charles J. Ross a letter, which was duly received, a copy of which is as follows: 'Leavenworth Station, July 12th, 1887. To Chas. J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—Dear Sir: I want to see you about that lot business. If you don't expect to be in Leavenworth soon, I will come up there so we can talk the matter over. Please advise me by return mail when you will be down, or if you are not coming down, let me know what day next week you will be at home. If you will be at home Sunday next I will be there. Can you meet me at Iatan or Weston? If so, I would be glad, as it is very difficult to get a team at Iatan to take any one out to your place. Now,

Mr. Ross, don't fail to answer me at once, and let me know where and on what day I can meet you, and perhaps we can succeed in fixing up the matter. I will meet you at Iatan or Weston Sunday or Monday next, just as you say, or, if you can't do that, I will come out to your place, if you will tell me what day to come. Yours very truly, J. M. ALLEN, Agt.' On July 16, 1887, said Charles J. Ross, by the name of C. J. Ross, wrote a letter to J. M. Allen, which was duly received, a copy of which is in the words and figures following: 'Iatan, Missouri, July 16th, 1887. J. M. Allen, Esq.: Yours of the 12th received today. In regard to the lots will say I hold no claim on them, and have nothing to show against them, as the receipt I hold was not signed by the owner, nor the number of the lots specified, and can therefore in no way reflect on the title; and the owners can do with the property as they see best. If any particular is wanted, write me at once, and I will reply or come down soon. Yours resp't, C. J. Ross.' On July 20, 1886, J. M. Allen, agent, wrote and sent a letter to Charles J. Ross, which was duly received, a copy of which is in the words and figures following: 'Leavenworth Station, July 20th, 1887. C. J. Ross, Iatan, Mo.—Dear Sir: Your letter of the 16th duly received. In regard to the lot business I think you have acted very strangely. If you did not want to take the property you should have said so long ago, and I think now you should come down right away, so we can get the business in shape. I wish you would let me know what day you will be down, so I will be sure to be at home. When I get out of this business I think I will let real estate deals strictly alone hereafter. Please answer immediately as to the matter, and oblige J. M. ALLEN, Agt.'

"(5) That from the 19th day of March, 1887, up to and until July 26, 1887, said J. M. Allen, at several different times, saw said Charles J. Ross in the city of Leavenworth, Kansas, and at such times urged him to go on and complete the purchase of said lots, and at several times before the institution of this suit tendered him the aforesaid warranty deed herein referred to, executed by the plaintiff and her husband, on the 26th day of March, 1887, and demanded as conditions of the delivery of said deed the payment of $1,900, and the execution of the notes and mortgage aforesaid, which the defendant refused to do. Said Charles J. Ross, at none of said conversations, made any objections to the terms of said purchase, or to the terms of the notes and mortgage so made as aforesaid, but claimed that he could not take said lots because one John Sorenson had gone back on him, and would not take or pay for one-half of the purchase price of said lots. That said Charles J. Ross did not at any of the various times when the warranty deed was tendered as aforesaid, by said J. M. Allen, make any objections to the said deed, or to the said sale or the terms thereof; nor did he ever offer to perform the contract upon his part. At the times said deed was so tendered by said J. M. Allen, he expected said Charles J. Ross to perform said contract upon his part, and expected said Charles J. Ross to deliver to him said notes and mortgage so prepared as aforesaid. And said Charles J. Ross never at such times offered to receive said deed or to pay the balance due, and no question was ever made by said Charles J. Ross as to the tender so made by said Allen until the trial of this cause. And that said plaintiff, on the trial of this cause, brought said deed into court for said defendant, and again tendered the same to said Ross, and demanded a performance of said contract upon his part, according to the terms thereof. And the court finds that on July 19, 1887, there was due to the plaintiff from Charles J. Ross the sum of $3,900, as part of the purchase price of said lots, and that the balance of the purchase price of said lots, to-wit, $4,000, became due and payable on or before the 19th day of July, A. D. 1889, with 8 per cent. per annum interest thereon. And the court finds that the rental value of said premises up to this date, and chargeable to and against this plaintiff, is the sum of $300, and that said sum should be deducted from the said $3,900, leaving due the sum of $3,600, with 7 per cent. per annum interest from July 19, 1887, until paid."

"CONCLUSION OF LAW.

"And, as conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds that the agreement to purchase the said lots 23 and 24, in block 74, in Leavenworth city proper, in Leavenworth county, Kansas, heretofore made by and between the plaintiff and defendant, should be specifically enforced, and that judgment should be entered accordingly."

Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff—First, that she should recover from Ross the sum of $3,795, with interest thereon from the rendition of the judgment until paid, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, together with costs; second, that Ross should execute and deliver his promissory note in writing to the plaintiff for the sum of $4,000, payable on or before July 19, 1889, at the option of the defendant, with 8 per cent. per annum interest from July 19, 1887, until paid. It was further ordered and adjudged that Ross should execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the plaintiff a mortgage deed upon the lots within ten days of judgment, and, in case of his failure to do so, the judgment should stand as a mortgage lien upon the premises. And it was further ordered that the deed mentioned in the findings of fact should be delivered to the clerk of the court to be by him delivered to the defendant upon payment of the said sum of $3,795, with interest and costs, and the delivery to him for the use and benefit of the plaintiff of the note and mortgage herein mentioned. Ross excepted to the findings and judgment, and brings the case here for review.

Waggener, Martin & Orr and J. W. Coburn, for plaintiff in error. Lucien Baker, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The defense made against a specific performance is that the memorandum or evidence of the contract of sale is insufficient within the statute of frauds. Under the statute no action can be brought to charge a party upon a contract for the sale of land unless the agreement upon which the action is brought, or some note or memorandum thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party sought to be charged, or by his or her agent lawfully authorized. Gen. St. 1889, par. 3166. The only memorandum of agreement set up in the petition as a basis for plaintiff's action is the following: "Leavenworth, March 19, 1887. Received one hundred dollars of Mrs. D. Byington, a/c Chas. J. Ross, to apply on payment of eight thousand dollars ($8,000) for property number 617 and 619 Delaware street, block 74, city proper; two thousand to be paid when abstract and title is furnished, two thousand in ninety days, and balance two years, with interest at 8%; abstract to be furnished within 30 days. J. M. ALLEN, Agent." Ross contends that this receipt or memorandum is defective in many respects, and wholly insufficient as a basis for the action: (1) It is not signed by the party sought to be charged, nor by any other person lawfully authorized for him. (2) No vendor is named in the receipt relied on. While signed by J. M. Allen, agent, yet the identity of the person for whom Allen was acting cannot be ascertained from the memorandum. (3) The writing does not describe Ross as a vendee or purchaser. (4) The memorandum does not upon its face import an agreement or contract for the sale of any property. It is a mere receipt for money, and a memorandum of another payment to be made by installments, upon some property mentioned therein. (5) The writing does not describe lots 23 and 24 in block 74 in Leavenworth, nor any other real estate, but only refers to street numbers in some city not named. (6) It does not definitely appear from the writing when, where, or how the installments were to be paid, nor what installments should bear interest, nor what was the entire purchase price, and there is no mention of any promissory note or mortgage, both of which the court required the defendant below to give. Under the decisions of this court, we think the memorandum relied on is clearly insufficient. It does not contain the essential elements of a contract which can be specifically enforced. To be sufficient, the memorandum or writing should designate the parties to the contract, give a sufficiently clear description of the property so that it can be identified; the price to be paid or other consideration to be given, together with the terms and condition, should be stated; and the party to be charged, or his agent, must have signed the memorandum or writings. "While the form of the memorandum is not material, it must state the contract with reasonable certainty, so that the substance can be made to appear and be understood from the writing itself, or by direct reference to some extrinsic instrument or writing, without having recourse to parol proof." Reid v. Kenworthy, 25 Kan. 701. The writing is obviously vague and indefinite, both with respect to the parties and the character and description of the property sold. Who was the vendor? For whom was J. M. Allen acting? Was he the agent of Byington, Ross, or some unnamed person? Would not any one infer, looking at the memorandum alone, that Byington and Ross were the parties to the transaction, and that Allen was the agent of the latter? It is conceded, however, that Allen was not the agent of Ross; and, if the writing had been signed by Ross, probably the agency of Allen might have been shown by parol testimony, although the principal's name was not disclosed by any writing. While both parties need not sign the writing or writings, they must in some way show who are the parties to the contract. "The contract necessarily embraces two parties, each contracting with reference to the real estate, either of whom may be charged upon the contract, if the contract or some note or memorandum thereof is reduced to writing and signed by such party, but neither of whom can be charged, unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof is reduced to writing and signed by the party to be charged. The contract, note, or memorandum must in all cases be in writing. It must in all cases be signed by one of the parties, and must in all cases be signed by the party who is eventually to be charged upon it." Becker v. Mason, 30 Kan. 701, 2 Pac. Rep. 850; Grafton v. Cummings, 99 U. S. 100. The memorandum is not signed by Ross, nor by any one for him, and the omission of this essential is of itself sufficient to defeat the maintenance of the action. Then, again, the property is not described with sufficient certainty. It is true that an absolutely accurate description of the property is not required, but the property should be so explicitly described that it will be susceptible of identification by reference to other writings and facts which may be shown to the court. If the designation is so definite that the description given in the memorandum can, with the aid of extrinsic evidence, be applied to the exact property intended to be sold, it is enough. Hollis v. Burgess, 37 Kan. 494, 15 Pac. Rep. 536. In this case, however, the memorandum does not show that the property is located in any state, county, or city. The memorandum itself is dated at Leavenworth, and the property is described as being on Delaware street of some "city proper." If the name of the owner or vendor had been given, it would have aided in the identification of the property; but her name nowhere appears in the writing. Then, again, there is no certainty upon the face of the writing whether the property sold was real or personal. Only street numbers are mentioned, and it now appears that those are not the ones by which the real estate in question is described. The property is not described as lands, lots, or real estate, and the street numbers may be attached to buildings which may or may not be a part of the real estate. The writing is vague and uncertain with respect to the terms and conditions of the contract, and nothing appears therein with reference to the prom-issory note and mortgage required, or to any other security for the deferred payments. Although no other writing than the one set out was mentioned in the pleadings, the plaintiff below introduced in evidence and relies to some extent on certain correspondence between the parties. The writings relied on should have been set out in the pleadings, but we have overlooked that objection and find that the correspondence does not recognize or supplement the memorandum pleaded, so as to make complete evidence of a contract within the statute. The evidence of a contract may be gathered from several writings or letters, but their relation to each other should appear upon their faces, and cannot be established by parol evidence. While the memorandum may consist of several parts, all of them must be either physically connected, or, by direct reference made in one to the other, make up the entire agreement of the parties. The letters relied on to supply the essential features omitted from the memorandum should distinctly recognize and adopt the contract. Quite a number of letters were written to Ross, but only two were written by him. One was the letter of May 4, 1887, which we think contains no recognition or affirmance of the contract which supplements or aids the memorandum of March 19, 1887; and the letter written by him on July 16, 1887, is an explicit disavowal of any contract relation, and that he has any claim or interest in the property in controversy. There was no part performance by Ross to take the case out of the statute of frauds; and, taking the memorandum and writings together, they are insufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute. No application has been made to reform the contract so that it shall contain all the terms and conditions of sale, and, as it now stands, the written evidence of the contract is indefinite, uncertain, and insufficient to sustain an action for specific performance. Reid v. Kenworthy, 25 Kan. 701; Becker v. Mason, 30 Kan. 701, 2 Pac. Rep. 850; Fry v. Platt, 32 Kan. 62, 3 Pac. Rep. 781; Brunidge v. Blair, 43 Kan. 364, 23 Pac. Rep. 482; Sherburne v. Shaw, 1 N. H. 157; Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns. 399; Shipman v. Campbell, 44 N. W. Rep. 171; Nichols v. Johnson, 10 Conn. 192; Fry, Spec. Perf. 245. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment upon the special findings in favor of the plaintiff in error. All the justices concurring.

HOLMBERG v. JOHNSON.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—INJUNCTION OF WASTE.

Where J., by written contract, purchases a tract of land of H., and pays a portion of the purchase money down, and, by the terms of the contract, H. is to remain in possession and have the use of the land during a period of five years, for the taxes, care, and improvements put thereon by him in the mean time, J. is entitled to an injunction to restrain H. from committing waste on said land, by quarrying and removing therefrom rock, or removing therefrom trees, except nursery stock.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wilson county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

Hudson & Reed, J. B. F. Cates, and George P. Uhl, for plaintiff in error. S. S. Kirkpatrick, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an injunction proceeding begun in the district court of Wilson county by the defendant to enjoin the plaintiff from committing waste upon the land described in the petition. The defendant answered: (1) A general denial. (2) Defendant alleges ownership of the land in fee, and peaceable possession thereof. (3) Denies the execution of the contract under which the plaintiff claims to be the equitable owner of the land. (4) Alleges the plaintiff's claim is a cloud upon his title, and asks to have title to the land quieted in him. The plaintiff below replied by general denial. The court directed a jury to be impaneled, and submitted to them the following question: "Did the defendant execute the written contract of which a copy is attached to the plaintiff's petition marked A? Answer. Yes." The court also permitted the parties to submit the following questions to the jury. By the plaintiff: "Question. Did the defendant sign his name to the contract, the base of this action? Answer. Yes. Q. Did the defendant sign his name to the promissory note for $1,000 offered in evidence? A. Yes." By the defendant: "Question. Did Mrs. Johnson pay Holmberg anything for the contract sued upon? Answer. Yes. Q. If she paid him anything on the contract, what did she pay him in? A. In notes. Q. How much did she pay him for the contract in controversy, if she paid him anything? A. $2,850. Q. Was Holmberg indebted to Mrs. Johnson at the time this [contract] purports to have been executed, viz., December 3, 1884? A. Yes. Q. If the answer to the above question is in the affirmative, how much was he indebted to her at that time? A. $2,850. Q. Did Holmberg receive any consideration for the contract sued on? A. Yes." The defendant moved to set aside the findings of the jury, and for a new trial. Motion overruled, and judgment perpetually enjoining the defendant from committing the waste complained of, and for costs, entered.

The plaintiff in this court says the petition does not state a cause of action, because it does not aver the insolvency of the defendant. This court says, in Snyder v. Hopkins, 31 Kan. 557, 3 Pac. Rep. 367: "Doubtless injunction will lie at the instance of the owner to restrain the cutting of timber, quarrying of rock, mineral, or any other act which is in the nature of waste," and cites Iron Co. v. Reymert, 45 N. Y. 703, and Wilson v. Mineral Point, 39 Wis. 160. We think the authorities approve of the allowance of injunctions to restrain waste, as distinguished from mere trespass. High, Inj. §§ 419-457. So far as the second complaint is concerned, we think the plaintiff misapprehended the language of the amended petition. It does not read as the plaintiff seems to think in his brief it does. The plaintiff does not, in this proceeding, ask for specific performance. This statement disposes of the third complaint. In the fourth complaint, plaintiff avers that the court erred in permitting the defendant in error to offer evidence of the genuineness of the signature of Holmberg to other papers than the contract sued on. It is the established law of this state, and many other states of this country, to permit proof of the genuineness of a disputed signature by comparison with others signatures, on other instruments in writing, admitted or proved to be genuine. Macomber v. Scott, 10 Kan. 335; Joseph v. Bank, 17 Kan. 256; Ort v. Fowler, 31 Kan. 478, 2 Pac. Rep. 580; Woodman v. Dana, 52 Me. 9; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225; Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 218; Koons v. State, 36 Ohio St. 195; Rhodes v. Sexton, 33 Iowa, 540. Plaintiff also says the court erred in excluding the expert testimony of Dr. Willits, as to the sickness of Holmberg, and its effect upon his mind. As the sickness of Holmberg occurred a considerable time after the execution of the contract in question, it could hardly throw any light upon its execution; and, besides, there was nothing in the pleadings justifying an attempt to avoid the contract upon any such ground. The sixth and seventh grounds of complaint relate to the action of the court in refusing to open the case, and hear further evidence, three days after it was tried. The opening of a case by the court for the purpose of hearing further testimony is a matter lodged in the discretion of the trial court, and this court cannot reverse the action of the court in refusing to open a case for such purpose, unless satisfied that the trial court has abused its discretion. We cannot say the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to open a case three days after the trial thereof had closed. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. HUTCHINSON.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—FAILURE TO CONSTRUCT CATTLE-GUARDS.

A railroad company cannot escape from liability for its failure to perform the statutory duty to make proper cattle-guards on its road, when it enters or when it leaves improved or fenced land, on the ground that a contractor grading the road or laying track thereon neglected to put up proper guards.

Error from district court, Wilson county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Sutherland, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. James Hutchinson brought his action against the Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company to recover damages for failure to construct cattle-guards. He claimed damages to his crops in the sum of $50, and for time and labor in guarding his premises, $125. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against the railroad company for $85. Judgment was entered thereon. The railroad company excepted, and brings the case here. From the evidence adduced at the trial, it appears that in 1886 the railroad company constructed a line of railroad through Wilson county, and across the premises of Hutchinson; that upon some portion of the road, and including the track across the land of Hutchinson, the company let to some person the contract to do the grading of the road-bed, and to some other person the contract to lay the track; that the track was laid across the land on the 19th day of July, 1886; that at that time the track-layers and graders moved on west, and were not there any more; that up to that time no damage was claimed; that construction trains commenced running on the road and across the land as soon as the track was laid, but no passenger trains were run until October 2, 1886. At that time the railroad company took full charge and possession of the road. It is claimed that the trial court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "As regards the right of the plaintiff to recover, I will say further that it makes no difference in this case whether the railroad in question was constructed by the defendant company or by the construction company." We perceive no error in the language used. Paragraph 1259, Gen. St. 1889, reads: "When any railroad runs through any improved or fenced land, said railroad company shall make proper cattle-guards on such railroad when they enter and when they leave such improved or fenced land." We think that the duty of making proper cattle-guards by a railroad company when its road enters, and when it leaves, any improved or fenced land on its right of way, is a duty to the land-owner from the railroad company, annexed by statute to the privileges granted the corporation, and that the failure to perform the duty is not excused by alleging or proving the negligence of a contractor grading the road, or of a contractor laying the track upon the road. *Nelson v. CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. WILLETS.

TRESPASS—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A railroad company in constructing its railroad upon its own land went upon adjacent land and made excavations to the injury of the owner, and he sued the company therefor, and upon the trial the court instructed the jury that the measure of the plaintiff's damages was the difference in the market value of the land immediately before the commission of the injuries and the market value of the land immediately afterwards. Held not error.

2. In such case, the owner's land consisted of a tract of six or seven acres, and the excavations covered only about one-fourth of an acre thereof. Held, nevertheless, that the owner had the right to recover for the depreciation in the market value of the entire tract.

3. And, in such case, the market value to be considered is the market value of the land for any purpose for which it might be the most advantageously used, and for which it would sell in the market for the highest price.

4. Held no material error was committed in the admission of evidence.

5. The court instructed the jury as follows: "You have the right also to take into consideration in this case such knowledge and information as you may have acquired of the plaintiff's land as to the alleged injuries committed there, by the personal examination of the premises, that you have been permitted to make under the directions of the court." Held, that no error was committed in giving this instruction.

Error to district court, Wilson county; L. ST'LLWELL, Judge.

George R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. S. S. Kirkpatrick for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Wilson county by J. R. Willets against the Chicago, Kansas & Western Railroad Company, to recover damages for alleged injuries to real estate. The case was tried before the court and a jury, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $400 damages, and judgment was rendered accordingly; and to reverse this judgment, the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brought the case to this court. It appears that the plaintiff below, defendant in error, owned about nine acres of land adjoining the city of Fredonia; that he sold and conveyed between two and three acres of the same to the defendant for a right of way, and for station purposes; that the defendant, in constructing its railroad, entered upon the remainder of the plaintiff's land, without his consent, and made excavations thereon from 7 to 10 feet deep, and carried away the earth to the great injury of the land; and for these injuries the plaintiff brought and prosecuted this action.

The first claim of error is that the case was tried by the plaintiff and the court below upon an erroneous theory as to damages. This theory will be apparent from the following instruction given by the court to the jury, to-wit: "The first question for you to consider will be the measure of plaintiff's damages, and upon that point you are instructed that to ascertain the damages to which the plaintiff should be entitled, if any, you will ascertain—First, what was a fair, reasonable, market value of the plaintiff's land before the commission of these alleged injuries, and what was the fair market value of the plaintiff's land after the commission of these alleged injuries, and the difference, if any, between these two sums would be the measure of plaintiff's recovery." It is claimed that this instruction is erroneous for the following reasons: First, because it permits the plaintiff to recover for all losses, past, present, and prospective, which he had suffered, or might suffer, by reason of the defendant's wrongs, and not merely for such actual loss only as had occurred prior to the trial; second, because it permits the plaintiff to recover for the diminished value of the entire tract of land, which consists of six or seven acres, although, as the defendant claims, the excavations covered only about one-fourth of an acre of the tract. Involved in the first proposition is the claim that the diminished value of the real estate injured is no criterion at all for the recovery of damages. We think it is, however. It must be remembered that this is not an action merely for injuries to the plaintiff's possession, as the old common-law action of trespass quare clausum fregit was, but it is an action for injuries to the realty itself, to the inheritance; and damages for such injuries may generally, if not always, be estimated by considering the diminished market value of the land. They may, however, be estimated in various ways, generally at the election of the owner of the land. In cases of trespass upon real estate, where no appreciable injury occurs, only nominal damages can be recovered; but, where the injury is appreciable and computable, and is done willfully and maliciously, punitive or exemplary damages may be allowed. But neither of these cases is the present case, and these rules do not apply. But in all cases of injuries to real estate, including the present case, full compensatory damages may be recovered. In other words, the owner of land, for injuries to it by the wrongful acts of another, may recover exact compensation for his entire loss. In giving compensatory damages, various rules for computing the same are adopted to correspond with the different kinds of cases, and the manner in which they are presented; but generally they are adopted at the election of the owner. Where something is wrongfully taken from the real estate, the owner may, if he chooses, maintain an action of replevin to recover it back; or he may maintain an action for its value; or he may waive the tort, and recover for the amount of the benefit actually received from the thing taken by the wrong-doer; or, where the wrong-doer has occupied the land for some time, the owner may waive all other injuries or losses, and recover merely for the rental value of the real estate while the wrong-doer so occupied it; or, where the injury is of such a nature that the real estate can be restored to its former condition, the cost of restoring the same may be the measure of the damages. But in such cases the restoring of the property to its former condition can generally only be done with the consent of the owner, for the wrong-doer, without the consent of the owner, cannot be allowed to re-enter the premises, and thereby commit another and a new trespass for the purpose of restoring the property. Railway Co. v. Muhlman, 17 Kan. 224. In cases where the wrong-doer has the power, without committing any new wrong, to restore the property to its former condition, it will generally be presumed that he will do so, and he will generally be given an opportunity to do so; and, in such cases, the owner will generally be permitted to recover only for his actual loss up to the time of the commencement of his action, or, at most, only up to the time of the trial. And in such cases, in order that full and complete justice may be awarded to the owner, he will be permitted to commence and prosecute a new action for each and every succeeding or recurring loss occasioned by the original injury until his property shall be finally restored to its former condition. This is particularly true where the wrong-doer has the right, and the owner of the land has not the right, to restore the property to its former condition as where the thing that causes the injury to the owner's land is upon the land of another, and where it only indirectly affects his land. But in cases like the present the owner may recover for his entire loss in one action, and only in one action, and he may so recover the same if he chooses, by recovering for the depreciation in the market value of his land caused by the injuries thereto committed by the wrong-doer. 3 Suth. Dam. 372-374, 392-394; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 16, 20, 36. This is, in fact, a recovery only for the loss occurring prior to the commencement of the action, although it may also to some extent have in contemplation the future. The loss, as thus recovered for, is precisely the loss which occurred at the very time at which the injury was consummated. In many cases the depreciation in the market value of the land, and the cost of restoring it to its former condition, would be precisely equal. In the first of the above authorities, the following language is used: "In general, this damage is the amount the estate is diminished thereby in value." Page 393. In the last authority cited, the following language is used: "In cases of trespass, the cause of action is the wrongful act of the defendant, and the injury resulting is merely the measure of the damages. Therefore, applying the rule above, all damages for a trespass must be recovered in a single action." Page 16. "In actions for injury to real property, where the injury is done to the realty itself, the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the land before and after the trespass, or, in some cases, the amount necessary to restore the property to the condition in which it was before the trespass was committed." Page 36. Also, in all cases where damages may be recovered for the depreciation in the market value of real estate caused by injuries thereto, the owner may recover for the depreciation in the market value of the entire tract, although the injury may, in fact, be directly only to a portion of the tract. See the above authorities, and also the following: Railroad Co. v. Merrill, 25 Kan. 421; Commissioners v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 15 Pac. Rep. 577; Railroad Co. v. Andrews, 41 Kan. 370, 379, 21 Pac. Rep. 276; Railroad Co. v. McAuliff, 43 Kan. 185, 23 Pac. Rep. 102.

The plaintiff also in this case showed the exact location of his land, how it was situated with respect to the city of Fredonia, and its streets, and the railroad, etc., and for what purposes it might be used; and the jury were also permitted to see it. We do not think that there was any error in this; for, when the question of the value of real estate is in issue, the owner is entitled to show its market value for any purpose for which it might be the most advantageously used, and for which it would sell in the market for the highest price. King v. Railway Co., 20 N. W. Rep. 135; Commissioners v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 484, 485, 15 Pac. Rep. 577; Cohen v. Railroad Co., 34 Kan. 164, 8 Pac. Rep. 138, and cases there cited; Commissioners v. Hogan, 39 Kan. 606, 18 Pac. Rep. 611; Railroad Co. v. Elret, 41 Kan. 24, 25, 20 Pac. Rep. 538. The question to be considered is really what was the property worth immediately before the injury, if used for the purpose for which it could be the most advantageously used, and what was it worth in the same condition except for the injury immediately afterwards if it were used for the purpose for which it could be the most advantageously used?

It is also claimed that the court below erred in permitting oral testimony to be introduced tending to contradict the effect of the deed executed by the plaintiff to the defendant. The plaintiff's counsel, however, stated at the time it was introduced that it was not introduced for that purpose, and the court did not permit it to go to the jury for that purpose; and the court afterwards instructed the jury that it could not be used for that purpose. The real object of the testimony seems to have been to show that the trespass was committed willfully and maliciously; but, as no exemplary damages were allowed, it really answered no purpose.

It is also claimed that the court below erred in giving the following instruction: "You have the right also to take into consideration in this case such knowledge and information as you may have acquired of the plaintiff's land as to the alleged injuries committed there, by the personal examination of the premises, that you have been permitted to make under the directions of the court." Under the decision of this court in the case of City of Topeka v. Martineau, 42 Kan. 387, 22 Pac. Rep. 419, this instruction was not erroneous. We do not think that any material error was committed in this case, and therefore the judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

EMINENT DOMAIN — INJUNCTION OF PROCEEDINGS.

Where an owner of land entered into a written contract with a railway company to grant, and finally to convey, to the railway company a right of way across the owner's land, upon the condition that the railway company should construct and maintain upon the land a passenger depot, with proper side tracks and stock-yards sufficient to do the business there offered, and permitted the railway company to take the immediate possession of such right of way under such contract, and to construct thereon its railway, and the railway company did construct thereon its railway and a side track and a passenger depot and stock-yards, but the owner of the land and the railway company honestly differed in opinion as to whether the company had fulfilled all the conditions of the contract, and the owner of the land then instituted condemnation proceedings, under the statutes, for damages, and the railway company then commenced an action to perpetually enjoin the owner from prosecuting his condemnation proceedings, and the court granted a temporary injunction to restrain such owner from so prosecuting his said proceedings until the injunction case should be finally heard and determined upon its merits, held not error.

Error from district court, Anderson county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

A. A. Harris, for plaintiffs in error. W. A. Johnson, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. The Kansas, Nebraska & Dakota Railway Company commenced its action, in the district court of Anderson county, to perpetually enjoin the defendants, J. T. Harvey and George E. Harvey and another, from prosecuting certain condemnation proceedings already instituted by them, and pending in that court. A temporary injunction was also prayed for, and the question whether a temporary injunction should be allowed or not was heard before the court, and the temporary injunction was granted, restraining the Harveys from further prosecuting their condemnation proceedings until the final hearing in the injunction case should be had; and, to reverse this order of the district court granting the temporary injunction, the Harveys, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court.

It appears that prior to the construction of the railway, and on April 8, 1886, the Harveys, for the consideration of one dollar and other benefits, entered into a written contract with the railway company to grant, and finally to convey, to it, by a proper deed, the right of way across their land; and they permitted the railway company to take the immediate possession of such right of way under such contract, and to construct thereon its railway. This contract contains the following clause: "The condition upon which said right of way is granted is that the railway company shall erect and maintain a passenger depot, with proper side tracks and stock-yards, sufficient to do the business there offered, at a point on the east half of the north-west quarter of 17, 22, 21, in Anderson county, Kansas." The record shows that the second word in the above clause is "condition;" but it seems to be admitted by the parties that the word in the contract itself is "consideration." It seems to be admitted by the parties that the railway company has constructed its railway across the defendants' land, and that it has erected and is maintaining a passenger depot and a side track and stock-yards; but the Harveys claim that they are not sufficient for the business offered at that point; and that they have not been continuously maintained; and indeed that the extra track there constructed is not a "side track" at all, but is merely a "spur track;" and this for the reason that it is connected with the main track only at one end. It is between three and four hundred feet long. The railway company, however, claims that it has substantially, at least, if not fully and completely, complied with all the conditions of the contract. It would seem, under such circumstances, that condemnation proceedings under the statutes would hardly be the proper remedy. Railway Co. v. Hopkins, 18 Kan. 494. In such proceedings, the Harveys would recover damages precisely the same as though no contract had ever been entered into between the parties, and as though no side track or depot or stock-yards had ever been constructed or maintained. This would seem wrong. Must the company lose all? If the Harveys can maintain ordinary condemnation proceedings, they would have the right, if they should so choose, to maintain an action in the nature of ejectment to evict the railway company entirely from their premises. Would this be right? It would seem that a more proper remedy for the Harveys, if they think that the railway company has not fully performed its part of the contract, would be to commence an action to compel the company to so perform, or to commence an action for damages for its failure to perform, or to commence an action to have a forfeiture declared. In an ordinary action for damages, the Harveys could recover exact compensation for all the losses which they may have sustained by reason of any non-fulfillment on the part of the railway company of any of the provisions of the contract which the railway company should perform. This would seem to be just; while, if they are permitted to maintain their condemnation proceedings, and to obtain full compensation, as though no depot or side track or stock-yards had ever been constructed or maintained, it would seem to permit them to do a great injustice to the railway company. But we shall not decide this case upon its merits, as it has not been brought to this court in such a condition that we can do so. The only question for us now to consider is whether the temporary injunction was properly granted or not. It was granted to remain in force only until the case should be finally heard and determined upon its merits in the district court; and we think it was properly granted. There seems to have been an honest difference of opinion, and an honest dispute between the parties, as to whether the conditions of the contract had been fully complied with or not on the part of the railway company, and, if not complied with, then as to how great the failure on the part of the railway company was; and, certainly, under such circumstances, condemnation proceedings should not be prosecuted prior to the final determination in the district court as to just what had been done or omitted to be done by the railway company. Railroad Co. v. Dryden, 11 Kan. 186. We think the temporary injunction was properly granted, and the order of the court below granting the same will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

HESS v. SPARKS.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 10, 1891.)

SLANDER—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—PLEADING.

In an action for slander, the question whether the language spoken was a privileged communication is not raised by a general denial. The privilege must be pleaded.

On rehearing. For former report, see 24 Pac. Rep. 979.

Pyburn & Jeffries, Peckham & Henderson, and C. N. Sterry, for plaintiff in error. W. P. Hackney, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. It is urged that the opinion handed down in this case wholly ignores the question whether the language spoken by defendant below was a privileged communication or a qualified privileged communication. It is said that defendant below was one of the board of directors, and one of the largest stockholders of the company; and that the communication was made to the then secretary and treasurer of the company, in relation to an employee of the company. The answer in this case was a general denial only. No facts in justification, or privilege or qualified privilege, were alleged as new matter; therefore this question, so forcibly pressed upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, was not before the trial court under the pleadings. The demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained, and also the instruction prayed for properly refused, considering the pleadings and issues presented. Bliss, on Code Pleading, in section 363, says: "Facts in justification, either as showing the truth of the charge or that the publication was privileged, were always required to be specially pleaded. Facts in mitigation are just as essentially new matter. They disprove no fact which the plaintiff is bound to establish. They create issues upon which no evidence can be offered until raised by the defendant. They should then be set up in the answer." The other facts presented are sufficiently disposed of in the former opinion. The motion for rehearing will be overruled.

GAMMON et al. v. BLAISDELL.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—BREACH OF CONTRACT—FAILURE OF TITLE.

1. Where a person is the equitable owner of real estate, and, as such owner, enters into a written contract with another person to sell to him the same, the purchaser cannot subsequently allege, as a breach of the contract, that the real estate, after the execution of the contract, has been condemned and taken by a railroad company under the right of eminent domain. Kuhn v. Freeman, 15 Kan. 423.

2. When the purchaser of real estate brings an action against his vendor for an alleged breach of contract, on the ground that the vendor has neither the legal nor the equitable title to the same, the burden of proof is upon him to establish the allegations of his petition by competent evidence.

3. The evidence in this case examined, and held not to show that, at the date of the purchase by B. from G. and F., the latter did not have the equitable title to the real estate sold by them. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

J. D. McFarland and Charles Curtis, for plaintiffs in error. Hazen & Isenhardt, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. This was an action brought in the court below by Charles H. Blaisdell against F. R. Gammon and M. E. Fowler, partners, as Gammon & Fowler, for damages for an alleged breach of contract for the sale of real estate. On the 22d day of May, 1886, Gammon & Fowler received from Blaisdell $150, as part of the purchase money for lots 1, 2, and 3, in block 55, in North Cullison, Pratt county, and gave a receipt, a copy of which is as follows: "Topeka, Kansas, May 22d, 1886. Received this day from Charles H. Blaisdell one hundred and fifty dollars as part payment on lots 1, 2, and 3, in block 55, Cullison, Pratt county, Kansas, whole purchase price to be $300; the $150, balance due in one year from date. GAMMON & FOWLER." In his petition, Blaisdell alleged that, at the time he paid the $150, and obtained his receipt, Gammon & Fowler had no legal or equitable title to the lots; therefore, that he was entitled to recover his damages. After his purchase Blaisdell received $45 from Gammon, and, upon the trial, obtained judgment against Gammon & Fowler for $124.54, being the balance of the money that he had paid, with interest thereon. Gammon & Fowler excepted to the judgment of the court, and bring the case here.

It appears from the record that on the 2d day of March, 1887, after Gammon & Fowler had executed the receipt to Blaisdell, the Chicago, Kansas & Nebraska Railroad Company condemned and took possession of all of the lots which Gammon & Fowler had agreed to sell. Lot 1 was appraised at the sum of $20, lots 2 and 3 at $15 each, making $50. This amount was deposited by the railroad company with the treasurer of Pratt county. It was subsequently paid to F. R. Gammon, and $45 of it sent on August 30, 1887, by Gammon, in a letter to Blaisdell. He received the money, but refused to accept it in condemnation of the lots. In the absence of instructions from Gammon, he gave him credit for $45 on the value of the lots, but stated he would look to him for the balance of the money paid by him. We do not think that the condemnation proceedings gave any authority to Blaisdell to commence or maintain his action for a breach of the contract for the sale of the lots. It was said in Kuhn v. Freeman, 15 Kan. 423, that "none of the usual or ordinary covenants in a deed can be broken by a portion of the land covered by the covenant being taken under the right of eminent domain. The exercise of the right of eminent domain is the exercise of a sovereign power, and no person is presumed to covenant against the acts of sovereignty; hence, where the deed has already been executed, and afterwards the vendor sues the vendee for the purchase money, it is universally held that the vendee cannot set up, as a defense to the action, that a portion of the land has, since the execution of the deed, been taken under the right of eminent domain, and therefore that some of the covenants in the deed have been broken. Nor can the vendee sue the vendor in such a case in a separate action, on the supposed broken covenant. He must pay the vendor the full amount of the purchase money, and receive the condemnation money paid as damages for his compensation. This is the only remedy he has. The case at bar, however, is to some extent different from the above. The deed in this case was not executed at the time when the sale was made, and, before the deed was executed, the easement of the right of way had attached to the land, so that the vendor cannot now make an absolute and perfect conveyance, as he agreed to do. But still this difference in the facts, we do not think, should make a difference in the decision of the question involved. It cannot be presumed when the vendor agreed to make a good and perfect conveyance, that the parties contemplated that he was agreeing to do a thing notwithstanding what might be the future acts of the sovereign authority. When Weisbach agreed that he would make a good title, he had absolute and complete title to the land. By the agreement and sale, the land became in equity the property of Hamaker. The legal title was allowed to remain in Weisbach merely as a security for the payment of the notes, and may be considered merely in the light of an equitable mortgage."

It is urged, however, by the counsel for the plaintiff below, that neither Gammon nor Fowler had any legal or equitable title to the lots sold by them, and, therefore, that the case of Kuhn v. Freeman is not applicable. In support of this assertion they say that Gammon testified upon the trial that the only thing that he had at the time of the contract with Blaisdell, and that the only thing that he had at the time the second payment from Blaisdell became due, was a contract with the Occidental Town Company, in which he had agreed to purchase the lots from them. Therefore, as he only had an agreement to purchase, he had no legal or equitable title, because such an agreement does not amount to a sale. Under the petition, the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff below to show that neither Gammon nor Fowler had any legal or equitable title to the lots at the time of the contract with Blaisdell. Gammon testified upon the trial, among other things, as follows: "Question. Prior to the sale of these lots to Blaisdell, who did they belong to? Answer. They belonged to Gammon & Fowler. Q. Who did they buy them of? A. The Occidental Town Company. Q. Did you have a contract? A. Yes, sir. Q. In whose name was the contract? In yours, or in the name of Gammon & Fowler? A. I think in my name. I think these lots were in my name. Q. Did the Occidental Town Company subsequently convey the lots to you under the contract? A. They did. Q. Have you ever refused to make a deed for these lots to Mr. Blaisdell? A. No, sir. Q. You may state if you now are ready to make a deed conveying these lots to Mr. Blaisdell, subject to the rights of the Chicago, Kansas & Nebraska Railroad Company, acquired by the condemnation proceedings. A. I am." Upon cross-examination, he further testified: "Question. When did you make the contract with the Occidental Town Company for these lots? Answer. I think in April or May following. Q. In April or May following? A. Yes, sir; in 1886. Q. How many lots did you buy at the time you bought them? All of them? A. Oh, no, sir; only a very small portion of them, I think. Q. What kind of an instrument of writing did they give you? A. A regular printed contract like the Arkansas Valley Town Company, which operates on the Santa Fe. Q. You did not have title to this property at the time of your contract with Blaisdell? A. I had a contract. Q. You did not have any deed to this property? A. No, sir; I had a contract with the town company. Q. When did you get the deed from the town company? A. Within the last six months, I should say. It may be longer. Q. Did you have a deed for this property at the time Blaisdell was down to make this second payment? A. No, sir. Q. Then you did not have a deed at the time the second payment became due? A. No, sir. Q. You only had a contract? A. That is all. Q. Where is that contract? Have you got one with you? A. No, sir; it is in Cullison, at home. Q. You have not got any contract with you? A. No, sir; I have not." All of this evidence tends to show that Gammon & Fowler had, at the time of the contract with Blaisdell, the equitable title to the lots mentioned in the receipt, under a written contract from the Occidental Town Company. Subsequently, upon his cross-examination, Gammon used language to the effect that his contract from the town company was only an agreement to sell. This language, however, was more in the nature of an opinion or construction of a written contract, than anything else. The written contract between the Occidental Town Company and Gammon & Fowler will show whether it was a contract to sell or a sale of the lots by the town company. This, of course, should have been produced upon the trial, but as the plaintiff below alleged that Gammon & Fowler had no legal or equitable title to the lots sold by them, they should have established this by competent testimony. Plaintiff below could have obtained this contract, if he had made proper efforts so to do. If the contract could not have been obtained, then secondary evidence of its contents would have been admissible. At the time that defendants below interposed their demurrer to the evidence, it was not sufficient, under the issues of the pleadings, for the plaintiff below to recover. The subsequent evidence of Gammon, which was wholly incompetent, if proper objections had been taken thereto, did not supply the defects. Upon the trial, plaintiff below offered in evidence a copy of a letter written by him to F. R. Gammon on September 1, 1887, without laying any proper foundation therefor. It is doubtful, however, if the objection made to the copy was sufficiently definite to establish error. Smith v. Leighton, 38 Kan. 544, 17 Pac. Rep. 52. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and cause remanded for new trial. All the justices concurring.

JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where, in a suit commenced in the district court, garnishment and attachment proceedings have been instituted, and the defendant has made a special appearance to contest the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the action, and an adverse ruling has been obtained, and there is sufficient in the record to show that the court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter, held, that the order of the court requiring the garnishee to answer, and the other proceedings in attachment, cannot be attacked collaterally, and that such order and proceedings are conclusive until reversed or set aside in a direct action.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Geary county; M. B. NICHOLSON, Judge.

J. R. McClure, for plaintiff in error. Thomas Dever, D. Overmyer, and J. V. Humphrey, for defendants in error.

GREEN, C. On the 12th day of May, 1887, C. F. Ziegler commenced an action in the district court of Davis (now Geary) county, against L. C. Pfaffenberger, who was a non-resident of the state, and caused an order of attachment to issue. Service was made upon the defendant by publication. The affidavit for the attachment stated that the defendant was a non-resident, and had property in Davis county, and that one William J. Dueker, of said county, had moneys and credits and effects in his hands and under his control, and was indebted to the defendant. A copy of the order of attachment was delivered to Dueker. On the 19th day of September, 1887, Pfaffenberger entered special appearance in the district court, and made a motion to dismiss the action commenced by Ziegler, and to set aside the service by publication, the order of attachment and garnishee notice, for the following reasons: "(1) That the publication failed to show that service of summons could not be made; (2) that the return of the sheriff to the order of attachment did not show that any property had been attached or garnished; (3) that no legal notice of attachment or garnishment proceedings had been made, as required by law." Upon this motion, the court held that there was sufficient in the record to compel Dueker to answer, as garnishee, touching his indebtedness to Pfaffenberger; to which ruling the defendant excepted. The garnishee answered, and was ordered to retain the money in his hands until the further order of the court. On the 11th day of January, 1888, the plaintiff, R. Axman, as the assignee of Pfaffenberger, commenced an action against Dueker, the garnishee, to recover the amount due upon a promissory note executed by Dueker to Pfaffenberger. Upon the application of the defendant, Ziegler was made a defendant, and his inter-plea set out the attachment proceedings, and he claimed a lien upon the money due from the defendant by virtue of such proceedings. The court below found that Ziegler had a lien upon the moneys sued for in this action, to the amount of $565.83, and his costs taxed at $38.05, under the attachment and garnishment proceedings in the case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger, and awarded judgment for the plaintiff for the balance due on the note. To this judgment, the plaintiff in error excepted, and brings the case here for review.

The claim is made that, before judgment could have been entered, there must have been a finding by the court in the case of Ziegler v. Pfaffenberger that complete jurisdiction had been acquired, both over the person and the subject-matter of the action, in the manner authorized by law; and that where a garnishee pays a judgment against himself, based upon a judgment without jurisdiction, he is not protected by the judgment against a subsequent action by the principal defendant or other creditor. This statement of the legal proposition may be true, but the only question for our determination in this case is whether the court acquired jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit. The suit instituted by Ziegler was to subject the money owing by Dueker to Pfaffenberger to the payment of his debt; hence, it was a proceeding in rem, and we think there was sufficient evidence in the record to give the court jurisdiction; besides, the defendant in this case made a special appearance for the purpose of contesting the jurisdiction of the court over the very subject-matter of the action, and obtained an adverse ruling, and this ruling still stands of record, and is conclusive until reversed or set aside in a direct proceeding, and the plaintiff in error could not attack the proceedings had in that case in the trial of this. In re Dill, 32 Kan. 691, 5 Pac. Rep. 39. The general rule is that a garnishee is protected by the order and judgment of the court, notwithstanding error and irregularity in the proceedings; and an order of court that the garnishee pay into court the sum attached in his hands cannot be collaterally attacked, if the court has jurisdiction, and there has been no appeal. Wap. Attachm. 522; Wilson v. Burney, 8 Neb. 39; Gray v. Canal Co., 5 Abb. N. C. 131. Upon the question of adjudication in such proceedings, this court has said: "The old rule that the decision made upon a motion is not res adjudicata, and does not prevent a re-examination of the question decided, in the more regular form of a suit, either at law or in equity, no longer obtains in its former strictness. Regard is now had, less to the form of the proceedings, and more to the substance and condition of the decision. Hoge v. Norton, 22 Kan. 375; Commissioners v. McIntosh, 30 Kan. 234, 1 Pac. Rep. 572. The judgment of the court should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

MECHANIC'S LIEN — NOTICE — SUFFICIENCY OF STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

1. Where, under the mechanic's lien law of 1872, a statement for a subcontractor's lien for materials furnished was filed with the clerk of the district court within 60 days after the contractor had completed the building, but not within 60 days after the subcontractor had fulfilled his contract with the contractor, held, that the statement was filed in time.

2. Where it appears from the statement for a subcontractor's lien that the subcontractor, or one of a firm of subcontractors, had appeared before the clerk of the district court and subscribed and swore to the statement, held, that the statement was properly verified.

3. Where it is shown from the statement for a subcontractor's lien and otherwise that the contractor purchased of the subcontractor materials to be put into the house of the owner of the land, and that such materials were actually put into such house, held, that such statement is not necessarily invalid, although it may also be shown from such statement that the credit was originally given to the owner of the property.

Error from district court, Finney county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

C. W. Morse and H. R. Boyd, for plaintiff in error. Hopkins & Hoskinson, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Finney county by Henry C. Cunningham, Isaac N. McBeth, and Edward H. McBeth, partners as the Western Lumber Company, against George W. Keeler and E. L. Hudson, partners as Keeler & Hudson, and Benjamin H. Barr, to obtain a personal judgment against Keeler & Hudson, for the sum of $412.91 and interest, and to foreclose a subcontractor's lien as against the defendant Barr. The defendant Barr demurred to the plaintiffs' petition upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the court sustained the demurrer; and the plaintiffs, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court for review. It appears that the defendant Barr owned certain town lots in Stevens' second addition to the city of Garden City, and, desiring to build a house thereon, contracted with Keeler & Hudson to build the same, and they purchased the lumber and materials therefor from the plaintiffs, and, failing to pay a portion of the purchase price therefor, the plaintiffs filed a statement in the office of the clerk of the district court to obtain a subcontractor's lien upon the aforesaid property of the defendant Barr; and the only question now involved in the case is whether such statement is valid or not. If such statement is valid, then the plaintiffs' petition stated a good cause of action; but, if such statement is not valid, then the petition did not state any cause of action as against Barr. The grounds upon which it is claimed by Barr that the statement is invalid are as follows: First. It is claimed that it was not filed in time. Second. It is claimed that it was not properly verified. Third. It is claimed that the facts stated therein are not sufficient to authorize a subcontract-or's lien. We shall consider these objections to the statement in their order.

1. Was the statement filed in time? It shows upon its face, and it is so alleged in the petition, that the contract between the plaintiffs and Keeler & Hudson for the materials furnished by them was made prior to July 13, 1887, and that the contract was completed, and the last portion of the materials was furnished, on that day; and the petition alleges and shows that the house was completed on August 25, 1887, and the statement for the lien was filed on September 12, 1887. Under the statutes as they existed at the time these materials were furnished, and at the time when the statement for the lien was filed, the statement for the lien should have been filed within 60 days after the completion of the building. The words of the statute are as follows: "Within sixty days after the completion of the building, improvements, or repairs, or the furnishing or putting up of fixtures or machinery, or the performing of such labor." Laws 1872, c. 141, § 2; Comp. Laws 1885, par. 4448. Now, the statement in the present case was certainly filed within 60 days after the completion of the building, and this we think was sufficient. Clough v. McDonald, 18 Kan. 114; Davis v. Bullard, 32 Kan. 234, 4 Pac. Rep. 75; Seaton v. Chamberlain, 32 Kan. 239, 4 Pac. Rep. 89; Seaton v. Hixon, 35 Kan. 663, 665, 12 Pac. Rep. 22; Shellabarger v. Thayer, 15 Kan. 619; Crawford v. Blackman, 30 Kan. 527, 1 Pac. Rep. 136.

2. Was the statement for the lien properly verified? The statement for the lien with the verification reads as follows: "State of Kansas, Finney county—ss: In the Finney county district court. On the 12th day of September, A. D. 1887, before me, the undersigned clerk of the district court in and for Finney county, state of Kansas, personally appeared Isaac N. McBeth, a member of the firm of Western Lumber Co., composed of Henry C. Cunningham, Isaac N. McBeth, and Edward H. McBeth, which said firm has been for more than one whole year last past, and is now, engaged in the lumber business at the city of Garden City, Kansas, and that Benjamin H. Barr then was and now is the owner of lots 23 and 24, in block 38, in Stevens' second addition to Garden City, Kansas; that on, to-wit, 1st day of May, 1887, Keeler & Hudson, contractors and builders, contracted with the said Benjamin H. Barr to furnish all labor and material, and build a house for said Benjamin H. Barr on said lots 23 and 24, block 38, in Stevens' second addition to Garden City, Kansas; that in compliance with said contract the said Keeler & Hudson contracted with the Western Lumber Company to furnish a bill of lumber to the amount of six hundred and fifty-four dollars and eighty cents; that said Western Lumber Company did between the 20th day of May, 1887, and the 13th day of June, 1887, both days included, furnish a bill of lumber, an itemized bill of which is hereto attached and made a part hereof, which said lumber actually went into the building erected by said contractors on said lots 23 and 24, block 38, Stevens' second addition to Garden City, Kansas, aforesaid. It was then agreed that said Western Lumber Company should receive for bill of lumber the sum of six hundred and fifty-four dollars and eighty cents. That there has been paid on said bill of lumber the sum of two hundred and forty-one dollars and eighty-nine cents. That there is now due the Western Lumber Company the sum of four hundred and twelve dollars and ninety-one cents. Said contract was duly completed on the 13th day of July, 1887. That said Benjamin H. Barr is justly indebted to the Western Lumber Company on said bill of lumber in the sum of four hundred and twelve dollars and ninety-one cents, with interest at 7 per cent. from July 13th, 1887. [Signed] I. N. McBERTH. Subscribed and sworn to before me this September 12th, 1887. [Signed] O. A. HARDING, [Seal] Clerk Dist. Court. [Indorsed] Mechanic's Lien. Owner, Benjamin H. Barr. Contractors, Keeler & Hudson. Subcontractors, Western Lumber Company. Amount due, $412.91. Filed Sept. 12, 1887. O. A. HARDING, Clerk Dist. Court." Here follows as a part of the statement a long itemized bill of materials furnished. We think the statement was properly verified.

3. Are the facts stated in the statement for the lien sufficient to authorize a valid lien? We think they are when taken in connection with the other facts stated in the petition. The only objection to the statement in this regard seems to be that it shows that the credit was originally given to the defendant Barr, but the petition and the statement, and the original itemized bill filed with the statement and made a part thereof, all show that the lumber was purchased by Keeler & Hudson of the plaintiffs for Barr and for his house; and the petition shows that it was actually used in the house, and therefore we certainly think that the statement is sufficient in this particular. The order and judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings. All the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & W. R. CO. v. DONELSON.

EMINENT DOMAIN—DAMAGES—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In a condemnation proceeding for a right of way of a railroad, it was claimed that the construction of the road interfered with the natural drainage of the land not taken; that the ditches would not carry off the water, and a portion of the land would be overflowed and injured. A witness, who was acquainted with the land, and had seen the road and ditches since they were made, but who had not measured the capacity of the ditches, and had not seen an overflow of the land, there having in fact been none since the construction of the road, was asked, and allowed to answer, what proportion of the plaintiff's land was subject to overflow from the ditches. Held that, as the witness was not a surveyor or civil engineer, and had no special skill that would enable him to take levels or make calculations as to the quantity of water which would accumulate, and could be discharged through the ditches, or to make measurements and calculations to the extent of land that would be affected, if there was an overflow of the ditches, was not competent to give an opinion upon the subject, and that his testimony should have been excluded.

Error from district court, Chautauqua county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

George Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. L. C. Whitney and J. D. McBrien, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an appeal by Samuel Donelson from an award made by commissioners appointed to condemn a right of way through an 80-acre tract of land owned by Donelson in Chautauqua county. The extent of land taken was 548-100 acres, and the amount awarded by the commissioners was $320. The trial of the appeal in the district court resulted in an award of $1,095.85, as the aggregate amount of damages sustained by Donelson. In answer to special questions, the jury found that the value of the land taken was $274; that the damages to the land north of the right of way was $100, and to the land south of the right of way was $150. They further found that the land south of the right of way is damaged by the probable overflow of ditches, allowing the water to spread over about 30 acres of land, and damaging it to the amount of $425. They also allowed $26 as damages for the overflow of surface water from other lands. An item of damages was allowed for failing to construct a farm crossing. And these items, together with the interest, make up the aggregate of the award. It was claimed that the construction of the road through Donelson's land had interfered with the natural surface drainage of the land, and had diverted the course of the flowage of the water resulting from the rain-fall on the hilly land near that of plaintiff in such a way as to cause damages to his land. A witness named Miller was interrogated by the plaintiff in regard to the damages resulting from the overflow. Over the objection of the railroad company, he was asked, and allowed to answer, what proportion of the plaintiff's land was subject to overflow from the ditches constructed by the railroad company. The objection urged was that the witness was incompetent to state the fact, or give an opinion upon the subject. The witness was not shown to be competent, and his testimony should not have been received. He was a farmer who had lived in the vicinity of the land for 17 years, and had examined the plaintiff's land since the construction of the road. He had seen the ditches and embankments, which he claimed would cause the overflow, but had not measured their depth, and did not know whether they extended through the plaintiff's land. At no time since the construction of the road had he seen an overflow of the land, or any injury which had resulted to it by reason of a freshet or overflow. He was therefore incompetent to testify to any fact from observation or knowledge, and could only give an opinion, as an expert, of the probable overflow which might occur in the future. It was not shown that he had any special skill which would enable him to give an opinion that would be valuable or admissible. It did not appear that he was a surveyor or civil engineer, or that he had ever taken any levels, or made any calculations, as to the quantity of water which would accumulate and could be discharged through the ditches, or any measurements or calculations of the extent of land that would be affected, if there was an overflow of the ditches. In fact, it appears that he only gave an estimate of the width and depth of the ditches, and was unable to testify whether they extended entirely through the plaintiff's land. The question involved a calculation in engineering, as to the extent of country drained into the ditches, and the dimensions and capacity of the ditches to carry off the surface water that might flow into them. The sloping character of the ground and the level of the ditches should be considered to determine the rapidity of the flow, and the capacity of the ditches to discharge the water. If the ditches were insufficient to carry off the water that would probably fall in that section of the country, and upon the area that would run into the ditches, then the witness would have to determine the extent of the land that would be reached by an ordinary overflow, and the rapidity of such overflow would have much to do with the injury that would result therefrom. A surveyor or civil engineer who had made a survey of the ditches, and had taken levels at various points upon the land liable to be overflowed, would have been a competent witness. But the witness was not skilled, and presented no claims entitling him to give an opinion as a scientific expert. As a farmer, he might give his opinion on matters ordinarily connected with farming, and his testimony was proper, so far as it related to specific facts. We find no testimony of an overflow from the ditches since the construction of the road, nor anything which satisfactorily shows the incapacity of the ditches to carry off the surface water which would probably pass into the same. The jury made a liberal award for the anticipated damages from this cause, based largely upon incompetent testimony; and hence the ground of error assigned must be sustained. We find no objection to the instruction complained of, and there are no other matters upon which we deem it necessary to pass. The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial. All the justices concurring.

FT. SCOTT, W. &amp; W. R. CO. v. HOLMAN.

STOCK-KILLING—DEMAND.

Where the owner of a steer, killed by a railroad company in the operation of its trains, makes out a bill, in writing, stating an account in favor of himself, and against the company, for the value of the animal killed, giving the date of the accident, and presents said bill to the company within 30 days from the date of the accident, held, in an action for the recovery of the value of the steer, that the making and delivery of said bill is a sufficient demand upon the company for the value thereof.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Bourbon county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

J. H. Richards and C. E. Beuton, for plaintiff in error. J. S. West and Humphrey & Hudson, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an action by the plaintiff below to recover, as damages, the value of a steer killed by the cars of plaintiff company. It is admitted that the steer was killed by the cars of the company under such circumstances as would render it liable, if the demand for damages is held sufficient. It is also admitted that the value of the steer was $25. The demand was in writing upon a form furnished by the railroad company, and denominated a "stock application." It was filled up as follows, and presented to said company in due time, under the law: "St. Louis, Fort Scott and Wichita Railroad Company, to E. T. Holman of Bronson, Kansas, Dr.: For the following animals killed by the locomotives and cars of said company on its railroad track. Date of accident, Oct. 6th, 1887. Description. One red steer. Value, $25." To which was annexed a statement of the purpose of the company, and a series of questions which were answered by the claimant, the whole of which was verified by him. Does such a statement of a claim amount to a demand? We think it does. It is denominated a "stock application," but is it not rather an application for payment for stock injured by the train of the company? Its form shows it is. If it is an application for compensation, by the owner thereof, for stock injured by cars of the company, and it is filled up and delivered to the company by the applicant, is not that a sufficient demand of payment for his stock? We do not see how a better demand could be made. It notifies the company of the injury to the owner's steer, its value, the date of the accident, and says the company is indebted to him therefor. The form of claim furnished by the company and used in this case contains the following printed statement: "It is the desire of this company, after satisfactory investigation, to pay the reasonable value of all stock killed, where a meritorious claim is made out, and it is not deemed improper to ask a claimant to answer the following interrogatories on presenting a claim, and make oath thereto." We see no difference between a claim of payment for stock killed and a demand for payment therefor. "It is not deemed improper to ask a claimant to answer the following interrogatories on presenting a claim." On presenting a claim for what? For the value of stock killed. When are the interrogatories to be answered? On presenting a claim; that is, on making a demand. Then follow the questions submitted by the company for the purpose of eliciting information relating to the accident and the claim founded thereon, which are to be answered by the owner in connection with the demand. The character of the form used, when fully analyzed and considered, satisfies us that it was prepared by the company with a view of being filled up and presented as a claim, or demand, by the owner thereof, for the value of the stock injured by the company in the operation of its trains; the object of the company in furnishing the form being to secure, in connection with the demand, information that would assist it in looking up the claim to determine whether or not to pay it. At any rate, we think the claim, as presented, amounted to a demand. Another claim made by the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in fixing the amount of the attorney's fee at $45. The defendant answers this claim by saying it may be disposed of by remitting $10 of the attorney's fee as found by the court. This offer to remit a portion of the attorney's fee in this court imposes the costs of this court upon the defendant. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed upon the condition that the defendant remits $10 of the attorney's fee, and pays the costs of this court.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

SALE—CONSIDERATION—LIABILITY OF SURETY.

The liability of a surety on the obligations of his principal, and the promise of the surety to pay such obligations in the future, is a sufficient consideration to support a bona fide sale and transfer of property from the principal to the surety.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Russell county; S. O. HINDS, Judge.

H. G. Laing, for plaintiff in error. W. G. Eastland and George W. Holland, for defendants in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action of replevin, to recover the possession of a stock of implements, brought by defendants in error against James E. Smith, who, as sheriff, had seized the stock in attachment proceedings brought by the Buford & George Implement Company against Smith Bros. The Smith Brothers, who were engaged in the implement business, procured the defendants in error to join with them in signing certain notes and obligations, as sureties. Afterwards, when the Smith Brothers found themselves in failing circumstances, they transferred the stock of implements which they had on hand to the defendants in error at the stipulated price of $2,000. The consideration of the transfer was the liability of these sureties on the notes which they had signed for Smith Bros., together with the promise that they would pay the same. Shortly after the sale and transfer, the stock of implements was attached by the Buford & George Implement Company, who alleged that the sale of the property was for the purpose of hindering and delaying the creditors of Smith Bros. in the collection of their debts, and this action to recover their possession immediately followed. The verdict of the jury was in favor of the defendants in error, and, there being sufficient evidence, it establishes the good faith and honesty of the transaction. The notes which they signed represented a bona fide indebtedness, and the stock of goods transferred was insufficient to pay the obligations for which they were liable, and which they agreed to pay. It is contended by plaintiff in error that there was no consideration for the sale of the goods to the defendants in error, and this is the only material question which is discussed in his brief. The insolvency of the Smith Brothers practically settled the liability of the defendants in error on the notes which they had signed, and, more than that, the testimony is that at the time of the sale the sureties agreed to pay these debts. Some of them were paid about the time of the transfer, and others of them have been paid since that time. We think there can be no doubt that the liability of the defendants in error, as sureties, and their agreement to pay these debts, constitutes a sufficient consideration for the sale of the property. The liability of a surety alone is held to be a good consideration for a conveyance of property; but no room is left for question where, as here, there is an express promise to the principal to pay the debt. The Smith Brothers had a right to prefer one creditor over another, and they owed no higher obligation to any creditor than to those sureties who had aided them by their credit in carrying on the business. The goods were in their possession and subject to their disposal at the time of the sale, and it is competent for them to secure the defendants in error by a mortgage on the goods, or to satisfy them by a sale and transfer of the same for the liability which they had assumed, and which, by agreement, they had obligated themselves to pay. The question is not, as plaintiff in error suggests, whether the surety has a right of action against the principal before the maturity and payment of the debt, but it is, rather, whether the principal may honestly indemnify and protect the surety who has become liable for, and must pay, the debt for which he is surety. It is well settled that this liability is ample consideration for either a mortgage or the sale of property to the surety, and therefore, as the good faith of this transaction has been settled, we conclude that the sale in question must be upheld. Miller v. Krueger, 36 Kan. 344, 13 Pac. Rep. 641; McWhorter v. Wright, 5 Ga. 555; Mandigo v. Mandigo, 26 Mich. 349; Gladwin v. Garrison, 13 Cal. 330; Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. 339; Cushing v. Gore, 15 Mass. 73; Swift v. Crocker, 21 Pick. 241; Kramer v. Bank, 15 Ohio, 253; Brandt, Sur. §§ 186, 213. This disposes of every substantial objection made by plaintiff in error, and, as we find no error in the record, the judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

EMPORIA MUT. LOAN & SAV. ASS'N v. WATSON.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION—SALE UNDER EXECUTION.

Action by plaintiff to foreclose a mortgage against Cupp and wife, in which Watson is made a defendant and claims title to the mortgaged land under a sheriff's deed; and the facts show that the judgment under which Watson claims was obtained in the district court of the county in which the land is situated, on October 26, 1886, and the first day of the October, 1886, term of said court was October 4, 1886. And the facts further show that Cupp and wife purchased the land in controversy October 14, 1886, for a homestead, intending at the time to occupy it as such, immediately, and that they took possession of it as a homestead on the day of purchase, and have occupied it as a homestead ever since to the commencement of this suit. Held, that the judgment under which Watson claims never attached to the land; that, under the facts, the homestead right in the land was protected as against the judgment creditor and those who claim under him. And, further held, that the reply in this case stated a cause of defense to Watson's claim to the land as set out in his answer, and the demurrer thereto ought to have been overruled.

STRANG, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage against John Cupp and Mary Cupp, his wife, begun in the district court of Lyon county July 21, 1889. John Watson was made a party defendant, because he claimed some interest in the land described in the mortgage. Cupp and wife defaulted. Watson answered and claimed title to the land under a sheriff's deed. Plaintiff replied that the land sought to be foreclosed was the homestead of Cupp and wife; that they purchased it on the 14th day of October, 1886, as and for a homestead, and went into occupation thereof on that day, and continuously occupied it as a homestead from that time to the commencement of this suit. The defendant, Watson, demurred to the reply, and alleged that the reply stated no defense to his cause of action. The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiff elected to stand on its pleading, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff against the Cupps for the amount of its mortgage, and in favor of the defendant, Watson, against all the other parties to the suit, quieting the title of said Watson to the lot in question. To this decision the plaintiff excepted, and comes here with its case made, asking a reversal of the judgment of the district court. October 14, 1886, Cupp and wife exchanged 80 acres of land with the defendant, Watson, for lot 29 in Coppley's addition to the city of Emporia. The deeds were exchanged by Cupp and wife and Watson and wife on that day, and Cupp and wife on that day went into possession of lot 29, and have ever since continuously occupied it as a homestead. The judgment under which Watson acquired title to said lot was rendered in Lyon county district court, October 26, 1886. The first day of said October, 1886, term was October 4th. The mortgage of the plaintiff company was recorded January 28, 1887. Now, if the judgment under which the defendant, Watson, derives title ever became a lien upon lot 29, it was a lien thereon before the mortgage of the plaintiff company attached thereto, and the sale under such judgment gave good title; but, if said judgment never became a lien upon said lot, the sale of said lot thereunder conveyed no title. It is admitted under the pleadings that Cupp and wife were on October 14, 1886, occupying lot 29, as a homestead, and have continued to occupy it as a homestead, ever since. It follows then that if said judgment ever became a lien upon said lot, it must have attached thereto on or before the 14th day of October, 1886. But the judgment was not rendered until October 26, 1886. It could not become a lien upon anything before it was rendered, and, when rendered, by relation back it became a lien upon all the real estate owned by Cupp in Lyon county not exempt on the first day of the term at which it was rendered, to-wit, October 4, 1886. It did not become a lien by relation back on lot 29 on the first day of the term, or October 4, 1886, because Cupp did not own the lot until the 14th of October, 1886. So, if it became a lien upon said lot at all, it became such on October 14, 1886; but, as stated above, Cupp, immediately upon the receipt of his deed for the lot, went into possession thereof as a homestead. If, therefore, the judgment in question became a lien upon said lot, the lien must have attached during the brief space of time between the receipt of the deed by Cupp and the occupancy of the lot by himself and family as a homestead. The reply states that at the time Cupp and wife traded for this lot they did so, intending to make it their homestead, and to occupy it as such immediately. It is well settled in this state and other states that where a person, the head of a family, purchases a piece of land intending to make it a homestead for himself and family, and to occupy it as such, at once, and follows such intention up by immediate occupancy of the premises as a homestead, such land is all the while protected by the exemption provision from judgment liens. In Edwards v. Fry, 9 Kan. 417, Justice BREWER used the following language: "We know that a purchase of a homestead, and the removal onto it, cannot be made momentarily contemporaneous. It takes time for the party in possession to move out, and then more time for the purchaser to move in. Repairs may have to be made, or buildings partially or wholly erected. Now the law does not wait till all this has been done, and the purchaser actually settled in his new home, before attaching to it the inviolability of a homestead. A purchase of a homestead with the view to occupancy, followed by occupancy within a reasonable time, may secure, ab initio, a homestead inviolability." Also in Monroe v. May, Id. 466, the same justice says: "The homestead is something towards which the eye of the creditor need never be turned." In Swenson v. Kiehl, 21 Kan. 534, Justice BREWER, upon this subject, again says: "We do not mean that a party occupying a residence under a lease must of necessity wait until the exact instant of the termination of that lease, before making arrangements for his future home. The law favors homesteads, and arrangements at about the time of the termination of such lease or occupation, and with a view thereto, are, for the purposes of a homestead question, considered as made contemporaneous with such termination." In Riggs v. Sterling, 27 N. W. Rep. 705, the court says: "And purchase with intention to use as a residence, followed by actual residence as soon as practicable, will give the premises the character of a homestead from the time of purchase." See Gilworth v. Cody, 21 Kan. 702; Mitchell v. Milhoan, 11 Kan. 617; Colby v. Crocker, 17 Kan. 527; Reske v. Reske, 51 Mich. 541, 16 N. W. Rep. 895; Scotfield v. Hopkins, 61 Wis. 374, 21 N. W. Rep. 259; Hanlon v. Pollard, 17 Neb. 368, 22 N. W. Rep. 767; Crawford v. Richeson, 101 Ill. 351; Harrison v. Andrews, 18 Kan. 535. It is claimed by counsel for defendant that, as the 80-acre tract of land which Cupp and wife gave in exchange for lot 29 was not a homestead, lot 29 was not purchased with homestead funds, and was therefore not exempt as a homestead. This position is not tenable. We recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and case sent back for further proceedings.

EXPRESS TRUSTS—BY PAROL.

2. Therefore, where an owner of real estate conveyed the same in fee to another by a general warranty deed absolute upon its face, with the expressed consideration of $1,500, but with no actual consideration, except a parol understanding between the parties that the grantee should sell or mortgage the property, and thereby obtain funds for the grantor, and should convey back to the grantor, whenever he might so desire, any part of the property remaining in the grantee's hands, held, that the parol trust, with respect to such real estate, was void, and the deed of conveyance was absolute and valid.

Error from district court, Harper county; T. J. HERRICK, Judge.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Harper county on June 11, 1886, by M. S. Thrailkill and Dora Thrailkill, husband and wife, against Rachel Ann Gee and Edwin Gee, wife and husband, to obtain the title to certain real estate situated in the city of Harper. The case was tried before the court, without a jury, and the court found generally in favor of the plaintiffs, and against the defendants, and rendered judgment accordingly; and the defendants, as plaintiffs in error, have brought the case to this court for review. The following are among the admitted facts: M. S. Thrailkill and Mrs. Gee were and are brother and sister. On May 3, 1884, the Thrailkills owned and occupied as a homestead the property in controversy; but on that day they executed a general warranty deed therefor to Mrs. Gee, with the expressed consideration of $1,500, which deed was duly acknowledged and recorded. Afterwards, the property was occupied at one time by a tenant, at another time by the Gees, but generally by the Thrailkills, and it was occupied by the Thrailkills at the commencement and during the prosecution of this action. With respect to most of the remaining facts, the evidence was directly and irreconcilably conflicting. Thrailkill testified to one state of facts, while Mrs. Gee and her husband testified to a wholly different state of facts, Thrailkill contradicting the testimony of the Gees, and they contradicting his testimony; but, as the court below found in favor of the Thrailkills and against the Gees, we must decide the case upon the theory that the testimony of Thrailkill was and is correct, and the contradictory testimony of the Gees is not true. Thrailkill's testimony is substantially as follows: He testified that, at the time of the execution of the aforesaid deed, his wife and one of his two children, a daughter, were sick, and their physician advised that they should be removed from that locality, and they all finally agreed to remove to the state of Colorado, and, believing that they might need additional funds while there, conveyed the property in question to Mrs. Gee, as aforesaid, without any consideration whatever, except the parol understanding that Mrs. Gee might sell or mortgage the property, and thereby obtain funds to send to them in Colorado, and that she should convey back to them, whenever they might so desire, any part of the property remaining in her hands; that the sick daughter died; that they did not go to Colorado; that Mrs. Gee did not sell or convey any of the property, and has never conveyed back to them any part of the same; and that they have never in fact received from Mrs. Gee, or from any one else, the slightest consideration for the property. Now, if all this testimony of Thrailkill's were true, then the property was conveyed to Mrs. Gee for the sole purpose that she might hold it for them in trust for the aforesaid specified purpose, and such trust was created by the parol agreement of the parties, and was an express trust. Would such a trust be valid? It was not created in writing; but, if created at all, was created only in parol. The deed of conveyance was absolute and unconditional upon its face; conveyed the property in fee, without the slightest reservation or condition. It contained all the usual covenants, and made no attempt to create a trust. Therefore the trust, supposed to have had an existence, was created wholly by the parol agreement of the parties, in contradiction of the written terms of the deed of conveyance, and destroying its terms and its tenor and effect to a great extent. Such a trust cannot be created under the laws of Kansas. Act relating to frauds and perjuries, § 5; act relating to conveyances, § 8; act relating to trusts and powers, § 1; Morrill v. Waterson, 7 Kan. 129;

Knaggs v. Mastin, 9 Kan. 532; Ingham v. Burnell, 31 Kan. 333, 2 Pac. Rep. 804. Under the laws of Kansas, an express trust concerning real estate can be created only in writing. The trust in the present case was not so created, and therefore it was void, and the deed from Thraikill and wife to Mrs. Gee was absolute and valid. We think the court below erred in overruling the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' petition, the defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' evidence, and the defendants' motion for a new trial. The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings. All the justices concurring.

CANCELLATION OF DEEDS—FRAUD—NECESSARY PARTIES.

In an action to set aside certain conveyances of real estate, it was alleged that the plaintiffs, L. and husband, owned and resided on a tract of land as their homestead, and that, while so occupying it, the husband executed a conveyance of the same to H., without the consent of his wife; that, subsequently, H. and his wife, Lydia H., executed a deed with the usual covenants of warranty to P. The action to set aside both of these conveyances was brought against H. and P., without joining as a defendant Lydia H., one of the grantors of P. Held, that she is a necessary party in the action to cancel the deed in which she joined as grantor, and that the petition disclosed upon its face a defect of parties defendant.

Error from district court, Graham county; LOUIS K. PRATT, Judge.

G. W. Jones and W. A. S. Bird, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. In this action, Nora Lewis joined her husband, J. C. B. Lewis, with her as plaintiff, and asked for the cancellation of certain conveyances of a quarter section of land, which they acquired by settlement and improvement, under the laws of the United States relating to public lands. The petition states that Nora Lewis with her husband have at all times since taking said land resided upon and claimed the same as their homestead; that J. C. B. Lewis, singly and without her knowledge or consent, executed and delivered warranty deeds to W. R. Hill for the land, which deeds have been duly filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds; that W. R. Hill knew at the times the conveyances were made that Nora and J. C. B. Lewis were husband and wife, and that they occupied the land as a homestead at and prior to the times the deeds were made; that Nora Lewis did not receive any consideration or part of the purchase money paid by Hill to J. C. B. Lewis; and that, subsequently, W. R. Hill and Lydia Hill, his wife, executed and delivered to James P. Pomeroy a warranty deed to the same tract of land, in consideration of the sum of $650. W. R. Hill and James P. Pomeroy were made parties defendant in the action, and the plaintiffs ask that the deeds to W. R. Hill, and from W. R. Hill and Lydia Hill to

James P. Pomeroy, be set aside and canceled, and the title to the land be quieted in the plaintiffs. The defendants demurred to the petition, and one of the grounds of demurrer was that there was a defect of parties defendant. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants electing to stand on the demurrer, the court entered a judgment cancelling the deeds, as prayed for. The demurrer should have been sustained. Lydia Hill joined in the execution of the deed to Pomeroy, and she was not made a party. The deed in which she joined with W. R. Hill contained the usual covenants of warranty, and she will be liable thereon to Pomeroy, if the allegations of the petition are true. The plaintiffs seek to have this deed to Pomeroy canceled and set aside, without having all the parties who joined in its execution and in its covenants before the court. It is the right of Pomeroy, who must ultimately look to the covenants of his grantors, that both of them should be made co-defendants. Lydia Hill is liable on the covenants to the same extent as her husband, and it appears on the face of the petition that she is a necessary party to a complete determination of the controversy. It is certain that the homestead cannot be alienated without the joint consent of the husband and wife, and, if the facts alleged are established, the plaintiffs below are entitled to prevail; but, before the deeds which they claim to be a cloud upon their title are canceled and set aside, all the parties who joined in the same, and who are liable upon the covenants therein, should be brought before the court. For the error in overruling the demurrer, the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

STRANG, C. Action for replevin for a horse, tried in the district court of Republic county, October 12, 1888, by the court without a jury. The court made special findings of fact and of law, and entered judgment thereon in favor of the defendants. Among other findings of fact, the court found that the action was begun by the plaintiffs below, after the defendants below had sold and finally parted with the horse. Plaintiffs asked for judgment on the findings, which was refused. They then filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The action was tried all the way through as an action of replevin, with an affidavit and bond and order of delivery. The answer was a general denial. The judgment was for the return of the property and damages, both on account of depreciation in value while in plaintiffs' possession, and for its detention; or if delivery of the property could not be had, for its value, and damages for its detention. With a finding that the action was commenced after the property was sold, and finally parted with by the defendants below, the judgment should have been for the defendants. Ladd v. Brewer, 17 Kan. 204; Moses v. Morris, 20 Kan. 213; Brown v. Holmes, 13 Kan. 482. ASSIGNMENT OF MORTGAGE COUPONS — PAYMENT — INTEREST IN SECURITIES.

1. The title to interest coupons passes from hand to hand by mere delivery.

2. Where the owner of a note, with interest coupons attached, secured by a mortgage upon real estate, which he has purchased from an investment company engaged in making loans in this state, and selling them to parties in other states, (such note and mortgage being indorsed and transferred to the owner "without recourse,") receives the money on the first coupon falling due, from the investment company, but not at the bank or office where the note and interest coupon are payable, with notice that it is the custom of the company to advance the interest on loans sold by it, when the interest falls due, whether the same has been paid by the borrower or not, the transaction is presumptively a transfer or an assignment of the coupon, and not a payment or extinguishment thereof.

3. In the absence of an express agreement or controlling equity to the contrary, the assignment of one of a number of coupon interest notes secured by a mortgage carries with it a pro rata share of the security.

VALENTINE, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to district court, Sedgwick county; C. REED, Judge.

Moore & Douglas, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. This was an action commenced by Julia Champion against James Warrell, Mary A. Warrell, the Hartford Investment Company, and George C. Strong, upon a promissory note for $2,500, dated March 1, 1888, with 10 interest coupons, for $100 each, attached thereto. The note and coupons were executed by James and Mary Warrell, made payable to the order of George C. Strong, and were secured by a mortgage on certain real estate in Sedgwick county. At the time of the execution of the mortgage the Warrells executed another promissory note to George C. Strong for the sum $250, and also executed a second mortgage on the real estate to secure the second note, warranting the real estate free and clear of all incumbrances, except the first mortgage of $2,500. The second mortgage stipulated that, if any money was paid by the holder of the mortgage to protect himself on any prior lien, the mortgage to be due at once, and the money paid out, to bear 12 per cent. per annum, and to become a part of the debt. The second note and mortgage were transferred by George C. Strong to the Hartford Investment Company. The first coupon was due September 1, 1888, and was for $100; the second coupon was due March 1, 1889, and was for $100. The Hartford Investment Company answered, setting up two causes of action,—one on the coupon for $100, due September 1, 1888, with interest thereon, and asking that the coupon be declared a concurrent lien with the first note and mortgage, and that it, the defendant company, be allowed to prorate with the holder of the first note. The second cause of action was upon the second note and mortgage above referred to. The case was submitted to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts: "The notes and mortgage involved in this action were executed to George C. Strong, who was the agent of the Hartford Investment Company, and were by him indorsed and assigned to Edward G. Robertson, who was the president and financial agent at Hartford, Conn., of the Hartford Investment Company. Robertson sold the notes and mortgage to the plaintiff. The copies of the notes and indorsements thereon, and the mortgages set out in the plaintiff's petition, and in the cross-petition of the Hartford Investment Company, are true copies of the originals. The principal note and the interest notes or coupons were all payable at the Charter Oak National Bank in Hartford, Conn. When the first coupon fell due, the plaintiff presented the same to Edward G. Robertson at Hartford, and Robertson, acting for the company, paid the plaintiff the amount called for by the coupon, and plaintiff then and there delivered to Robertson the coupon uncanceled. The Hartford Investment Company was engaged in making loans in Kansas through George C. Strong, and selling them to parties in the eastern states, and it was the custom of the company to advance the interest on loans sold by it when such interest fell due, whether the same had been paid by the borrower or not; and this fact was known to the plaintiff at the time she purchased the notes and mortgage. Neither the principal note set out in the plaintiff's petition, nor the coupon set out in the cross-petition of the Hartford Investment Company, has ever been paid by the borrower to the company." The district court rendered judgment in favor of Julia Champion for the amount of her claim, and for the Hartford Investment Company for the amount of its claim, and also decreed "that the mortgage set out in plaintiff's petition is a first lien upon the lands and tenements described to secure the indebtedness of James Warrell and Mary A. Warrell in the petition set forth, and also to secure the payment of the indebtedness of Warrell & Warrell to the Hartford Investment Company upon the coupon set forth in the first clause of action in the cross-petition of the Hartford Investment Company for the amount of $117, and that the investment company is entitled to share pro rata in the security of the mortgage for the payment of the sum last mentioned." Plaintiff excepted to the ruling and judgment of the court, and contends that the Hartford Investment Company is not entitled to prorate with her in the security of the mortgage for the amount of the coupon due September 1, 1888, which was presented by her to Edward G. Robertson at Hartford, and on which Robertson, acting for the investment company, advanced to her $100, the amount thereof.

We think that the ruling of the district court was correct, and therefore that the judgment must be affirmed. The coupon was indorsed by the original payee "without recourse." The mortgage was indorsed by both the original payee and Edward G. Robertson "without recourse." The coupon, as well as the note and mortgage, was payable at the Charter Oak National Bank, Hartford, Conn. Neither the Hartford Investment Company, nor Edward G. Robertson, were legally liable upon the note, the mortgage, or the coupon. When the plaintiff presented the coupon to Edward G. Robertson, who was acting for the Investment Company, she knew "that it was the custom of the company to advance the interest on loans sold by it when the interest fell due, whether the same had been paid by the borrower or not." The title to the coupon passed by mere delivery, and the transfer of the coupon from the plaintiff to the investment company was presumptively a transfer of title. The transaction concerning the coupon was therefore a transfer or assignment of it, and not a payment. This is especially true, because the transfer was made by the plaintiff to one who was not her debtor, and to one who was not under any legal obligation to pay the coupon. It was not the intention of Robertson or the investment company to pay or extinguish the coupon when the money was advanced thereon, and, as the plaintiff knew that the company would advance the money whether paid or not by the makers, it cannot reasonably be said that she supposed the maker had furnished the money to pay the coupon, or that the company intended to pay the coupon when the amount thereof was advanced to her. Neither do we think that the Hartford Investment Company is estopped from claiming that the coupon is unpaid. The plaintiff was not misled by any statements or representations of the company or its agents. The company acted in all matters in good faith. There can be no estoppel in such a case.

If it be urged that the plaintiff believed, when she received the money upon the coupon, that it was a payment and an extinguishment thereof, the sufficient answer is that she did not present the coupon, or receive payment at the bank or place where the note and coupon were payable; that she knew that Robertson, acting for the company, would pay the interest on the presentation of the coupon "whether the makers had paid it or not:" that on presenting it she did not inquire whether the makers had paid it, or had furnished any money to pay it, and, finally, that she received the money from one who was not her debtor, and from one who was under no legal obligation to pay the coupon. As the plaintiff did not receive the money at the bank where the coupon was payable, if it was of importance or interest for her to ascertain, she should have inquired, when presenting her coupon to Robertson, whether the makers had paid or had furnished any money to pay the same. If she had so inquired, she would have undoubtedly been informed that no money had been furnished by the makers, but that the company would advance the money upon the coupon. It must also be remembered that the coupon over which this controversy arose is the first coupon falling due upon the note and mortgage, and that the plaintiff had never been paid previously anything upon the mortgage or coupon, through Robertson or the investment company, before her presentation of this coupon. If the plaintiff had received on prior occasions from the makers of the note and mortgage, through Robertson or the investment company, any money upon the note or interest coupons, there might then be some presumption that she believed, when she received the money upon the coupon presented to Robertson, that she was receiving the same from the makers in payment of the coupon, but she had never received any money from the makers of the note and mortgage, as it was the first coupon falling due upon which the money was advanced. The plaintiff cannot rely in this case upon any prior payment, or anything that had occurred before the presentation of her coupon to Robertson, to strengthen her case. Therefore, in our opinion, the plaintiff had no reasonable ground to believe that Robertson or the investment company intended to pay or extinguish the coupon when he handed over to her the sum called for by it, and took the coupon into his possession. It is difficult to find, in the text-books or reports, any case precisely like this. See, however, Ketchum v. Duncan, 96 U. S. 659, and Blair v. White, 17 Atl. Rep. 49. We do not think there is anything in the agreed statement of facts, or in the record presented, showing, or tending to show, that the Hartford Investment Company paid the coupon to protect the second mortgage. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

JOHNSTON, J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J. I do not concur. The note, coupons, and mortgage involved in this controversy were executed by James Warrell and wife to George C. Strong, agent of the Hartford Investment Company, and were by him assigned to Edward G. Robertson, the president and financial agent of such company, who resided and did business for the company at Hartford, Conn., and were by him sold and transferred to Julia Champion, the plaintiff in this action. At the time of the sale it was known and understood by the parties that Robertson, for the company, would advance the interest as it fell due, whether the same had been paid by the makers and mortgagors or not; and he did advance to Mrs. Champion the amount of the first coupon which represented interest, when it fell due, and Mrs. Champion delivered the coupon to him uncanceled. Under the provisions of the mortgage, if such coupon had not been paid at the time when it became due, the entire debt and the mortgage would have become due, and Mrs. Champion could at once have commenced her action for the debt and the accrued interest, and to foreclose the mortgage. Afterwards the second coupon became due and was not paid, and Mrs. Champion then commenced this action. In my opinion, as between Mrs. Champion and Robertson and the Hartford Investment Company, this advancement of the amount of the aforesaid coupon ought to be considered as a payment, and their lien upon the mortgaged property for the payment of this coupon should be considered as subsequent and inferior to the lien of Mrs. Champion for the payment of her notes, coupons, and mortgage. Evidently, Mrs. Champion did not consider that she was selling said coupon to Robertson and the investment company so as to permit it to remain a lien upon the mortgaged property to the injury of her own security, but evidently she considered that such coupon was paid, and, as between her and the investment company, I think it ought to be so considered, although, as between the investment company and the parties executing the note, coupons, and mortgage, it should be considered as still unpaid and still a lien. It is admitted that the mortgaged property is not sufficient to pay the entire debt; and, if this coupon is permitted to be a lien upon the mortgaged property as against Mrs. Champion, she must lose, although she purchased the mortgage with the note and coupons from a company whose business it was to procure and sell mortgages, and purchased the same with the aforesaid understanding, and although the company advanced the amount of the coupon without even an intimation that it was a purchase or a sale of the coupon. PER CURIAM. This was an action brought by Voorhis, Miller & Rupel against G. J. Michaelis, on a promissory note for $456, not due. An order of attachment was granted and issued by the probate judge of the county where the action was commenced, and thereon the property of G. J. Michaelis was taken possession of by the officer. A motion to dissolve the attachment was made by Michaelis. The testimony was partly oral and partly by affidavits,—mostly oral. The motion to dissolve was sustained and the case dismissed. The plaintiffs excepted, and bring the case here. The evidence is conflicting, and against the finding of the district court. We do not think the evidence of such a character as to authorize us to interfere. An insolvent debtor, as long as he retains possession of his property, may appropriate it to the payment of debts, and may prefer creditors. Dodd v. Hills, 21 Kan. 707; Randall v. Shaw, 28 Kan. 419; Bailey v. Manufacturing Co., 32 Kan. 73, 3 Pac. Rep. 756. A voluntary conveyance made to defraud creditors is void only as to prior and existing creditors, and to those designed to be defrauded by the conveyance." Sheppard v. Thomas, 24 Kan. 780. As the order of attachment was set aside for the reason that the grounds therefor were not true, the action was properly dismissed. Pierce v. Myers, 28 Kan. 364. The order and judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

MECHANICS' LIENS—PRIORITIES—MORTGAGES.

S. entered into an agreement to sell certain lots to J. on credit, which provided that J. was to build a house on the lots to cost not less than $1,500, and when the house was inclosed, S. was to convey the lots to J. by warranty deed, when J. was authorized to make a mortgage and obtain a loan on the lots for $1,200, after which J. was to execute a mortgage on the lots to S. to secure the payment of the purchase price of the same. It was also stipulated that until the deed and mortgages were made, as provided, the legal and equitable title should remain in S., and that until that time J. could not subject the property to any liens. The deed and mortgages were made as provided in the contract, but some time prior to their execution J. purchased from a lumber company material for use, and which was used, in the construction of the house, but did not pay for the same, and the lumber company filed a statement for a lien on the lots against J. as owner. Held, in an action to foreclose the lien of the lumber company, that the contract under which J. held, limited his interest and ownership, and his right to create liens on the lots, and that the lien of the lumber company is subordinate to the mortgage liens given in pursuance of the contract.

Error to district court, Sedgwick county; C. REED, Judge.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action brought by the Chicago Lumber Company to enforce a mechanic's lien against real estate in the city of Wichita, for lumber and building material furnished to S. T. Jones. It appears that on April 29, 1887, Henry Schweiter, who was the owner of the real estate mentioned, as well as other lots in the same locality, entered into a written contract agreeing to sell a large number of lots to S. T. Jones, who in turn agreed to build one house on each parcel of four lots, each of the houses to cost not less than $1,500, and to be worth that sum. It was stipulated that, when each of the houses was inclosed, Schweiter should convey the four lots upon which the same was situated to Jones by a good and sufficient warranty deed, and that Jones should then have the privilege of placing a mortgage for a loan, not exceeding $1,200, on any one house and parcel of four lots, which should be a first lien on the lots; and that thereupon Jones should execute to Schweiter two notes, each for one-half of the purchase price of the parcel of lots so conveyed, one due in six months, and the other due in one year from date, with 8 per cent. interest per annum until due, and 12 per cent. interest per annum after maturity until paid, together with a mortgage on each parcel of lots to secure the payment of said notes; and that until the execution and recording of each of said mortgages Jones should keep said lots clear of all liens, judgments, and taxes, of every kind and description, on his account, so that the mortgage to Jones should be a lien second and inferior to said first-named mortgage of $1,200. The purchase price of the lots was $350, and it was provided that the title of all of the property mentioned in the contract, both legal and equitable, should remain in Schweiter until the mortgages and conveyances aforesaid were made, and that Jones should be liable for interest upon the purchase price of the property at 8 per cent. during that period, which interest should cease when the mortgages for the purchase money were executed, and then the interest therein stipulated should be paid. On May 2, 1887, Jones contracted with the Chicago Lumber Company for lumber and material with which to build a house and barn on four of the lots mentioned in the contract, and the delivery of the same to Jones was begun on that day and completed on June 25, 1887, and the same was purchased for use and was used in the construction of the house and barn. The price of the lumber and material so sold and delivered amounted to the sum of $963.83. On May 20, 1887, Schweiter executed and delivered a deed of the lots to Jones, and on the same day, and in pursuance of the contract between Jones and Schweiter, Jones and wife executed a note and mortgage to Smedley Darlington, and received thereon the sum of $1,200, and this mortgage was recorded on May 21, 1887. On May 20, 1887, and in pursuance of the contract, Jones and wife executed and delivered to Schweiter notes for $1,400, being the purchase price of the lots, and also a mortgage to secure the payment of the same. This mortgage was given subject to the Darlington mortgage, and it stipulated that it was given to secure the balance of the purchase money of the mortgaged property. This instrument was filed for record on May 23, 1887. On September 9, 1887, the Chicago Lumber Company filed in the office of the clerk of the district court a statement, claiming a lien against the real estate for the lumber and building material furnished under a contract with S. T. Jones, as owner; and it is admitted that Jones was indebted to the lumber company in the sum of $963.83, with interest thereon, and that the lumber and building material were purchased by Jones from the lumber company to be used in the construction of the house and barn, and were so used. The lumber company brought this action on November 11, 1887, to foreclose its lien, and made Schweiter and Darlington parties defendant, and asks that their interests be held to be inferior and subordinate to the lien of the lumber company. On the trial the court found and decreed Darlington's mortgage to be the first lien on the premises, Schweiter's to be a second lien, and that the Chicago Lumber Company held the third lien.

It is claimed that the court erred in postponing the lien of the lumber company to those of Darlington and Schweiter. The claim of the plaintiff depends on the right of Jones to subject the property to a lien. The contract of the lumber company was made with Jones at a time when Schweiter held the legal and equitable title to the real estate, and no statement for a lien by the lumber company was ever made or filed against Schweiter as owner. He made no agreement and gave no consent which would subject his interest or estate in the land to a lien. It is true, he made a contract for the sale of the lots with Jones which contemplated the erection of buildings thereon, but in this contract it was expressly stipulated that the legal and equitable title should remain in Schweiter until certain conveyances were made, and until that time Jones should have no authority to subject the lots to liens of any kind or description. To create a valid lien for material or labor, it is necessary that the person for whom they are furnished should be an owner within the meaning of the statute, and have a right at the time the contract for the same is made to create a lien. The only claim which Jones had upon the land was derived from his contract with the owner, and any one who relies on the contract to establish ownership in Jones must be governed by the limitations and conditions therein contained. When the lumber and material was purchased and furnished, Jones did not have the legal title, and by the terms of the contract which he made he did not have the equitable title, and he could create a lien on no greater interest than he held. "In general, it must be said that only the interest of the contracting party can be subjected to the lien, and, if he has no interest, there is nothing to which the lien can attach." 2 Jones, Liens, § 1245; Wagar v. Briscoe, 38 Mich. 587; Hayes v. Fessenden, 106 Mass. 230. If the lumber company had examined the public records when the material was sold and delivered, it would have ascertained that the legal title was in Schweiter; and if they had pursued the inquiry, as they should have done, they would have learned of the contract between Jones and Schweiter, with all of its conditions and limitations. As has been said, "they should have exercised some care and caution as to whether their employers, or the purchasers, had such an interest in the property as they could subject to a lien for the lumber and material furnished. Under the statute, no lien attaches to the building unless the person with whom the contract is made has some interest or estate in the land on which it is situate. The lien is upon the realty, with the building attached, to the extent of the ownership of the one who contracted for the construction of the building, and no further; and, if there is no ownership, there is no lien on either land or building." Huff v. Jolly, 41 Kan. 537, 21 Pac. Rep. 646. The lumber company, therefore, can claim only through the contract under which Jones held, and must take subject to the restrictions and limitations therein imposed on Jones. The contract stipulated that the $1,200 mortgage should be the first lien on the lots when they were conveyed to Jones, and the one given to Schweiter for the purchase money should be a second; and an examination of the contract would have warned the lumber company that they must look to the proceeds of the first mortgage, which was doubtless provided as a fund for the erection of the building, or else they must make a contract with Schweiter, who was both the legal and equitable owner. Whatever equities Jones had in the property under his contract were subject and subordinate to the interest of the owner, as the contract provided; and, as the lien can in no event cover more than the qualified interest that Jones had, it follows that such lien is subject and subordinate to the liens and mortgages expressly provided for in the contract. The contract appears to have been carried out by Schweiter strictly in accordance with its terms and in good faith, and we find no room for the application of the principle of estoppel as against either of the mortgagees. The facts in the cases cited by the plaintiff are unlike those in the present case, where the relations and rights of the parties are fixed by express agreement, by which all must be governed. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

AFFIDAVIT FOR PUBLICATION—AMENDMENT.

Where an affidavit for publication inferentially, but insufficiently, sets forth a material fact which ought to be expressly stated, the affidavit, if otherwise good, will be held to be merely voidable; and, if the fact inferentially and insufficiently stated was in existence at the commencement of the action, the trial court, even after judgment, may allow the affidavit to be amended concerning the matter so inferentially and insufficiently stated, and the affidavit so amended will relate back to the commencement of the action.

Error to district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

J. O. Fife and John A. Hale, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. On the 1st day of September, 1886, J. O. Fife filed a petition in the district court of Wyandotte county asking judgment against Mrs. M. A. Hays for $100 for attorney's fees. A summons was issued on the same day, and returned on the 3d day of September, 1886, "Not found." On the same day on which the petition was filed, an affidavit for publication was filed in the clerk's office of the court, which, omitting caption, is in words and figures as follows: "J. O. Fife, Plaintiff, vs. Mrs. M. A. Hays, Defendant. J. O. Fife, of lawful age, being by me first duly sworn according to law, upon his oath says that he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled cause; that defendant is the owner of lot number 6, in block 79, and lot number 42, in block 49, in the old city of Wyandotte, now Kansas City, Wyandotte county, Kan.; that this suit is brought for the purpose of recovering the sum of $100 due affiant from defendant above named; that defendant is a non-resident of the state of Kansas; and that service of summons cannot be made on said defendant within the state of Kansas. J. O. FIFE. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of September, 1886. L. C. TRICKEY, Clerk Dist. Ct." On the same day on which the petition was filed, an attachment affidavit was filed, and on the 3d day of September, 1886, the real estate mentioned was attached, pursuant to the affidavit and the order issued thereon. Proceeding upon the affidavit, publication was made and filed on January 8, 1887. The publication notice, which was published for a sufficient time in the Wyandotte Gazette, a weekly newspaper of general circulation in Wyandotte county, Kan., omitting caption, was as follows: "M. A. Hays, defendant above named, will take notice that she has been sued in the district court of Wyandotte county, Kan., by J. O. Fife, plaintiff above named, for the sum of one hundred dollars, and interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from April 1, 1885, and that defendant must answer plaintiff's petition on or before the 25th day of October, 1886, or said petition will be taken as true, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff against defendant for said sum and costs, and that lot forty-two, in block forty-nine, and lot six, in block seventy-nine, all in Wyandotte, now part of Kansas City, Wyandotte county, Kan., the property of defendant, and heretofore by the sheriff of Wyandotte county attached, will be sold, and the proceeds thereof applied towards the payment of said judgment and costs. [Signed] J. O. FIFE, Plaintiff. By JAS. F. GETTY, Atty. for Plaintiff." On the 19th day of January, 1887, the defendant failing to appear, judgment was rendered for plaintiff in the usual form, and on the 31st day of May, 1887, the sheriff of the county sold the real estate to James Birmingham. On the 6th day of June, 1887, the sheriff's deed was executed.

and the same was filed for record in the office of the register of deeds of the county of Wyandotte on the 13th of June, 1887. On the 28th day of December, 1886, the real estate in question was sold by Mrs. M. A. Hays and husband to Wingate Jackson. The deed was recorded December 30, 1886. On the 6th day of June, 1887, Jackson sold lot 6, block 79, to H. M. Meriwether, which deed was recorded June 11, 1887; and on June 9, 1887, Meriwether sold lot 6, block 79, to Juliette Long. This deed was recorded June 11, 1887. On the 21st day of September, 1887, Wingate Jackson and Juliette U. Long filed their motion to vacate and set aside the judgment on the ground that the affidavit for publication was essentially defective; that the publication of notice was therefore void; that no other service was had; that defendant did not appear, or in any manner waive service; and that consequently the judgment was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. The district court allowed Fife to file an amended affidavit for publication, on the ground that the affidavit for publication was not void, but voidable only. Thereupon, with leave of the court, an amended affidavit for publication, fully sufficient, was filed. Jackson and Long excepted, and bring the case here.

This court has already decided that if the jurisdictional facts necessary to warrant service upon a defendant by publication were in existence at the commencement of the action, and the affidavit for publication is defective only, and not void, the court, after judgment, may permit an amended affidavit for publication to be filed; and such affidavit, when filed, gives jurisdiction to the court, and relates back to the time of the commencement of the action. Pierce v. Butters, 21 Kan. 124; Wilkins v. Tourtellott, 28 Kan. 833; Harrison v. Beard, 30 Kan. 632, 2 Pac. Rep. 632. The affidavit for publication should have stated that the case commenced in the district court was one of those mentioned in section 72 of the Civil Code. "The rule is, if there is a total want of evidence upon a vital point in the affidavit, the court acquires no jurisdiction by publication of the summons; but where there is not an entire omission to state some material fact, but it is inferentially or insufficiently set forth, the proceedings are merely voidable." Harris v. Clafin, 36 Kan. 543, 13 Pac. Rep. 830. The affidavit for publication stated that Mrs. M. A. Hays, the defendant, was a non-resident of the state of Kansas; that service of summons could not be made upon her within the state; that the action was brought for the purpose of recovering from her the sum of $100 due to the plaintiff; and also set forth a full description of the real estate owned by her in the city of Wyandotte, (now Kansas City.) This was the property that was attached, and which was subsequently sold to pay the judgment. The fair inference from the affidavit is that the real estate described was sought to be taken or appropriated for the debt owing from Mrs. Hays; at least, we do not think the omission in the affidavit so vital, in view of what the affidavit did contain, as to render the proceedings void. Therefore our conclusion is that the court did not err in permitting the amended affidavit to be made and filed. This case differs from Harris v. Clafin, supra, in which case Mr. Justice JOHNSTON dissented. In that case nothing was stated in the affidavit for publication about the action being one of those mentioned in section 72 of the Civil Code, no real estate was described or referred to, and no debt was alleged as being owed from the defendant to the plaintiff, or to any one else. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

KANSAS CITY &amp; PAC. R. CO. v. RICH TP.

MUNICIPAL AID TO RAILROADS—PETITION FOR ELECTION—SECOND ELECTION—ESTOPPEL.

1. Before the board of county commissioners of a county shall cause a first election to be held under the provisions of section 1, c. 183, Sess. Laws 1887, (paragraph 1283, Gen. St. 1889,) to determine whether a municipal township shall be permitted to subscribe to the capital stock of a railroad company, constructing, or proposing to construct, a railroad through or within such township, a petition in writing signed, or purporting to be signed, by two-fifths of the resident tax payers of the township in which the election is to be held, must be presented to the board, which is requested to order such an election.

2. A second election under the last proviso of section 1, c. 183, Sess. Laws 1887, (paragraph 1283, Gen. St. 1889,) can only be held for the same purpose for which the proposition was submitted at the first election. If the second proposition is materially different from the first as to the amount of stock to be subscribed, as to the route of the railroad, as to the location of one of its depots, and as to the time for its final completion, it will give no authority for a subscription under the last proviso of said section 1, c. 183.

3. A township may be estopped by its course of dealing with the railroad company to interpose a defense of irregularity in the exercise of the power of issuing bonds in payment of a subscription made upon a majority vote of the qualified electors of the township.

4. If a petition in writing is presented to a board of county commissioners, under the first clauses of section 1, c. 183, Sess. Laws 1887, (paragraph 1283, Gen. St. 1889,) to submit to the qualified voters of a township a proposition to subscribe to the capital stock of a railroad company, constructing a railroad through the township, and the petition, instead of showing, upon its face, that it is signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of the township, recites that the signers are "qualified electors of the township," and the board of county commissioners officially find that the petition is so signed, and call an election upon the proposition presented, of which notice is published, and at which election a majority of the qualified electors voting at the election favor the subscription, and, after such vote has been canvassed and declared, the board of county commissioners orders the county clerk, for and in behalf of the township, to subscribe to the capital stock of the railroad company upon the terms and conditions set forth in the proposition submitted, and the subscription is accordingly made upon the books of the railroad company, and accepted by it, and subsequently the railroad company, relying upon the faith of the subscription, fully completes and operates its road through the township, according to the proposition submitted and the contract of subscription, and the board of county commissioners, the township officers, the tax-payers and citizens of the township, as well as the railroad company, at all times, until the full completion and operation of the road, treat the petition as sufficient and valid, held, that in an equitable action brought by the township to enjoin the issuance of the bonds for a total want of power to make the subscription to the capital stock of the railroad company, upon the ground that the petition is one of "a majority of the qualified electors," and not of "the tax-payers," it is proper, to uphold the proceedings, for the trial court to permit the railroad company to show by competent proof that two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of the township actually signed the petition.

Error to district court, Anderson county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

On the 2d day of May, 1888, Rich township, in Anderson county, brought its action against the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company to enjoin the board of county commissioners of that county from issuing $21,000 of bonds voted by the township in payment of a subscription to the capital stock of the railroad company. At the time of the commencement of the action, a temporary injunction was granted against the railroad company by the probate judge of Anderson county. Trial had September 24, 1888, before the court without a jury. After hearing the evidence and the arguments of counsel the court took the case under advisement, and on the 20th day of December, 1888, made the following special findings of fact: "The plaintiff is a duly organized municipal township in Anderson county; the defendant is a railroad corporation, duly organized and existing under the laws of this state, having a line of railroad in said county, and the defendants named as officers were and are the duly qualified and acting county commissioners and county clerk of said county. On January the 25th, 1887, the board of county commissioners of said county ordered an election to be held in said township on March the 1st, 1887, on a proposition for the township to subscribe $25,000 to the capital stock of the railroad company, the same to be paid by a like amount of the bonds of the township. The election was held, the vote canvassed, an order made that the county clerk subscribe — for $25,000 of the capital stock of the railroad company, for and on behalf of the township, and the subscription was made as ordered on the regular stock book of the railroad company furnished him for that purpose. This proposition, as submitted by the board of county commissioners and as published, by mistake provided, among other things, that a depot and side track should be constructed upon or within six rods of the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section seventeen, township twenty-one, range twenty-one, instead of upon the north-east quarter of the north-west quarter of the same section, as was intended by the petitioners and voters, as well as by the railroad company; the latter description covering the land upon which was located the station of Laura, on the Kansas, Nebraska & Dakota Railroad, the place where the citizens of the township desired the depot to be located, and the place actually described in a part of the petitions that were circulated for said election, the other part specifying the place first above described, the error having been made in copying some of said petitions. This election was held, the vote canvassed, and the subscription made, all following the erroneous description, and without discovering the error, and it was not discovered until after the road had been located via the land intended to be described, and partially graded on that line in the township. When the railroad company discovered that the line was not located as required by the subscription, it at once caused work to be suspended on the road, and made preparations to change that part of the line so as to locate the depot one-half mile further east. This caused great dissatisfaction among the citizens in that part of the township. Threats were made that the issue of the bonds would be enjoined, unless the depot was placed where the citizens generally understood that it was to be located, and after trying in vain to make some arrangement that would enable it to locate the depot where the people wanted it, and not jeopardize its subscription, the railroad company concluded, after consultation with many citizens of the township, that the best way of settling the question to the satisfaction of all would be to have a new election held upon a proposition correctly describing the place where this depot was to be located. The Cherokee Construction Company, which was to receive the bonds of this township in part payment for building the road, agreed to this, with the railroad company, but neither the county board nor township had any knowledge of such agreement, and petitions were accordingly prepared by the railroad company and delivered to citizens for signature. Owing to a change in the law, the amount of the new subscription could not exceed $21,000. The petitions were in form as follows: 'To the board of county commissioners of the county of Anderson, in the state of Kansas: The undersigned, qualified electors of Rich township, in said county, respectfully represent to you that an error was made in the proposition heretofore submitted to said township to vote upon the question of subscribing stock in the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company in describing the land upon which the depot was to be located in the northern part of the said township. Now, in order that said error may be lawfully corrected, we petition you to call another election in said township, and submit to the qualified electors thereof, at a special election to be called for that purpose, a proposition that said township subscribe for twenty-one thousand dollars of the capital stock of the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company, said stock to be paid for by a like amount of the bonds of said township, payable to bearer at the fiscal agency of the state of Kansas in New York city, thirty years after the date thereof, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, for which interest coupons shall be attached, payable at the fiscal agency aforesaid; said bonds to be issued and delivered to said railroad company in exchange for certificates for an equal amount of its capital stock, when said railroad shall be constructed of standard gauge and in operation through said township, and a depot and side track constructed on the north-east quarter of section one, (1,) township twenty-three, (23,) range twenty, (20,) and within forty rods of the St. Louis & Emporia Railroad; also a depot constructed upon or within six (6) rods of the north-east quarter of the north-west quarter of section seventeen, (17,) township twenty-two, (22,) range twenty-one, (21,) all in Rich township, with side track and stock-yards adjacent thereto: provided, that it is accomplished on or before the 31st day of July, 1888, in default of which said subscription shall become void and said bonds shall not be issued: and provided, further, that if a subscription be made to the capital stock of said railroad company, as herein provided, then the twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollar subscription heretofore voted to said company shall be void, and no bonds shall be issued in payment thereof. The form of ballot to be issued at such election in favor of said proposition shall be "Foreextending aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company on the new proposition," and against said proposition shall be "Against extending aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company on the new proposition." On the same day that these petitions were put in circulation, to-wit, on October 12, 1887, and before any of them had been signed, the vice-president and general attorney of the railroad company, who had the general charge of working up municipal aid for the company, told Mr. Winans of the plan that had been adopted to settle the difficulty, and that the petitions would be ready for presentation to the board on the Friday following, which was the 14th, and asked if he would call a meeting of the board for that day. To this Mr. Winans, who was about to leave the state to be gone several weeks, as he said, assented. A request for a meeting was prepared, signed by him as one of the county commissioners, sent to Commissioner Mann, signed by him, and returned to Mr. Winans, who then signed the call for the meeting, as chairman, and as he was on his way out of the state delivered the same to Commissioner Bearly, at Laura, and requested him to sign the same and attend to the meeting, which Mr. Bearly agreed to do and did. Commissioners Bearly and Mann met on the day named in the call. Mr. Bearly was elected chairman pro tem. An envelope was laid before them, containing the petitions, a form for the order of election, and a bond to secure the costs of the election, and they, taking out the petitions and order, after examination found the petition to be in all respects in compliance with the requirements of law, which they caused to be made a matter of record, and thereupon they made an order embracing the terms and conditions set forth in the petition, and fixing November 14, 1887, as the time when said election should be held. The findings and order of the board were as set out in the record hereafter given. The bond for costs was not found by the commissioners or county clerk, and was not brought to the notice of either, and seems to have been lost before the papers came to their notice. And so in fact no bond for such costs was ever given to or received or approved by said commissioners or clerk. The proceedings of said board in the matter were as follows: 'On this 14th day of October, 1887, at a special meeting of the board of county commissioners of Anderson county, Kansas, a petition, signed by a majority of the qualified electors of Rich township, having been presented and found in all respects in compliance with the requirements of law, and said petition setting forth, among other things, that a mistake was made in the proposition heretofore submitted to said township to vote aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company, in describing the land on which the depot was to be located in the northern part of said township, and asking, in order that said mistake might be lawfully corrected, that another election might be called in said township for the purpose of submitting the proposition hereinafter set forth, it is therefore ordered that a special election be held in said township on the 14th day of November, 1887, for the purpose of submitting the proposition that said township subscribe for twenty-one thousand dollars ($21,000) of the capital stock of the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company, said stock to be paid for by a like amount in the bonds of said township, payable to bearer at the fiscal agency of the state of Kansas in New York city thirty years after the date thereof, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, for which interest coupons shall be attached, payable at the fiscal agency aforesaid. Said bonds to be issued and delivered to said railroad company in exchange for certificates for an equal amount of its capital stock when said railroad shall be constructed of standard gauge and in operation through said township, and a depot and side track constructed on the north-east quarter of section one, (1,) township twenty-three, (23,) range twenty, (20,) and within forty rods of the St. Louis & Emporia Railroad. Also a depot constructed upon or within six rods of the north-east quarter of the north-west quarter of section seventeen, (17,) township twenty-two, (22,) range twenty-one, (21,) with side track and stock-yards adjacent thereto, all in Rich township, in Anderson county: provided, that it is accomplished on or before the 31st day of July, 1888, on default of which said subscription shall become void and said bonds shall not be issued: and provided, further, that if a subscription be made to the capital stock of said railroad company, as herein provided, then the $25,000 subscription heretofore voted to said company shall be void, and no bonds shall be issued in payment thereof. The form of the ballot used at such election, in favor of said proposition, shall be "For extending aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company on the new proposition," and against said proposition shall be "Against extending aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company on the new proposition." Notice of said election shall be given by publishing this order in the Kincaid Chronicle for the time required by law. H. A. BEARLY, Chairman pro tem. J. A. MANN, County Commissioner.' On the day of its date, the defendant railroad company caused to be written and delivered to the township trustee the following letter: 'Garrett, Kansas, Oct. 8th, 1887. Dear Sir: It seems that the law places this whole R. R. bond business in the hands of the county commissioners and county clerk. The township board are not mentioned in the matter. We shall not call upon you to act in the matter as a board unless you desire to do so. I spoke to you about holding a meeting next week, but we shall not care to have the meeting held, unless you wish to hold it on your own account. Yours, truly, C. H. KIMBALL.' The election was held on the day named. The returns were made on November 18th; the votes were canvassed, the full board being present. The record of the action of the board at that meeting, (Journal H, 222,) after setting forth the formal matters in regard to the canvass of the vote, etc., closes as follows: 'And having duly canvassed the vote cast at said election, the board doth find and declare that there was cast at said election, in favor of said proposition, 128 votes, and against said proposition, 109 votes, and that due notice of said election was given, and the same held in all respects as required by law; and a majority of the voters voting at said election having voted in favor of the proposition, and all matters and things in connection with the holding of said election having been in conformity with law, the county clerk is hereby ordered for and in behalf of the township of Rich, in said county, to subscribe for $21,000 of the capital stock of the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company, upon the terms and conditions set forth in the said proposition, and upon the construction of said railroad as therein provided the chairman of this board and the county clerk are authorized to issue and deliver the bonds of said township to the amount of $21,000 in payment of said subscription.' Signed by all the commissioners, and attested by the county clerk. A subscription was accordingly made by the county clerk upon the books of the railroad company, and accepted by it. The bill for printing the election notices, which constituted by far the greater part of the expenses of the election, was sent to the railroad company and paid by it. It has at all times been ready and willing to pay any of the other expenses, but has never been requested to do so. Immediately after the making of the new subscription, work was resumed on the railroad, and by the 1st of January following the track was laid through the township, but the road was not at that time operated north of Kincaid, because of its rough and unfinished condition. The township board, believing that the railroad company was about to have the bonds issued while the road was yet unfinished and not in operation, as required by the subscription, met on February 27, 1888, the trustee, treasurer, and clerk being present, and took action in the matter, the result of which was they caused to be sent to the company a written notice, signed by all of them, in substance stating that the township board would not accept the railroad in its present condition. About ten days thereafter the township commenced an action to enjoin the issuing of the bonds, in which the railroad company filed an answer, setting forth in substance, among other things, that it did not claim to be then entitled to receive said bonds in payment of the subscription, and did not propose asking for them until said railroad was completed and in operation in all respects as required by the terms of the subscription; and thereupon the township caused the action to be dismissed without prejudice. On April 30, 1888, the company had the railroad completed and in operation, with depots and side tracks and stock-yards, in all respects in compliance with the terms of the subscription, and thereupon notified the proper county and township officers of that fact. And on May the 2d the board of county commissioners met as requested, and, accompanied by the county clerk and township officers, went over and carefully inspected the road, and found it to be in all respects completed as aforesaid. A certificate for $21,000 of the capital stock of the railroad company was thereupon tendered to the township treasurer, which he refused to receive. The record of the meeting of the board of county commissioners (Journal H, 281, 282) shows, among other things, that 'the board went over the said railroad on May the 2d, 1888, * * * and noted carefully the construction thereof, and finds that said railroad is fully completed and in operation, in accordance with the subscription of said township to the capital stock,' and, after reciting the facts about the tender of the stock, the refusal thereof, and demand for the bonds, the record further shows that 'the board find that while the company * * * is entitled to the bonds, yet, the board having been, on May 2d, at seven o'clock P. M., enjoined from issuing them, it cannot take further action until said injunction suit is settled.' The railroad company has been regularly operated through the township since its completion. But for the subscription of Rich township the road would have been located and built, by an equally favorable route, through Blue Mound township, about six miles east of its present location. Relying upon the first subscription, the company located the railroad into and through the township, and commenced the construction thereof, as it supposed, in compliance therewith. In building the road through the township the line had to be lengthened several thousand feet and considerable additional expense incurred in order to comply with the terms of the subscription. This was all done in reliance upon the validity of the contracts (the first until the last was made) between the railroad company and the township, and in compliance therewith. In the same newspaper in which the notice for the last election was published, and on the 22d day of October, 1887, the railroad company defendant caused to be published a history of the facts in substance of the former vote and subscription for $25,000, together with what purported to be the opinion of Hon. Geo. W. McCrary, headed 'Judge McCrary's Opinion,' in which it was stated in substance that said vote and subscription were legal and binding obligations of the township, which could be enforced, and on November 12, 1887, in the same paper, and along-side of said notice of election, said company caused to be published an article, signed by its vice-president and general attorney, stating in substance that the company was entitled to said $25,000 of bonds first voted, but if the voters would vote in favor of the proposition then pending for $21,000, the company would release said former subscription. Said publications were intended by the company to induce the voters to vote for the pending proposition. The newspaper was printed and published in said Rich township. The railroad company has never asked for, or claimed, said $25,000 of bonds first voted, nor has it relinquished or released the right thereto, except as hereinbefore stated. The railroad company prepared and caused the petitions for both propositions to be circulated and presented, and prepared the form of order made and entered by the board on the 14th day of October, 1887, and had full knowledge of the steps and proceedings herein set out, upon which said subscriptions, and each of them, were founded.

Thereon the court made the following conclusions of law: "(1) The conditions precedent to a valid subscription for stock in a railroad corporation under chapter 183, Laws 1887, are a petition of two-fifths of the resident tax-payers, an order by the commissioners for the election, a proper notice for such election, and an affirmative vote upon the proposition so petitioned for. (2) A second election, under the last proviso of section 1 of the act, can only be held to vote upon the proposition submitted at the first election. If the second proposition is materially different from the first, it will give no authority for a subscription, for in such case the tax-payers' petition is wanting. (3) The tax-payers' petition was for a proposition to subscribe for $25,000 of stock, the road to go to a designated point in the township, and that was the question voted upon at the first election. A second election was held upon a petition of the voters only upon a proposition for a subscription for $21,000 of stock in the same company, the road to go through a different point. The affirmative vote upon the last proposition gave no authority to make the subscription, and it is invalid. (4) Such subscription being in its inception illegal for want of power to make it, and the railroad company having had full knowledge of and actively participated in the proceedings that made it illegal, the township is not estopped from asserting such illegality. (5) The subscription being invalid, and no estoppel being shown, the bonds so attempted to be voted should not be issued and a perpetual injunction should be granted as prayed for. (6) Judgment will

To each of the findings of fact and to each of the conclusions of law the railroad company excepted. Upon the findings of fact and the conclusions of law the court found the issues in favor of Rich township, and further found that the township was entitled to the relief prayed for in its petition, and was also entitled to have the temporary injunction heretofore granted made perpetual. Judgment was entered accordingly. The railroad company excepted, and brings the case here.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) This was an action brought by Rich township, in Anderson county, to enjoin the board of county commissioners of that county from issuing, and the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company from receiving, bonds, amounting to $21,000, voted by the township in payment of a subscription to the capital stock of the railroad company. The facts in this case are substantially as follows: On January 25, 1887, under the provisions of chapter 107, Sess. Laws 1876, as amended by chapter 142, Sess. Laws 1877, (Comp. Laws 1885, p. 783,) the board of county commissioners of Anderson county ordered an election to be held in Rich township on March 1, 1887, on a proposition for the township to subscribe $25,000 to the capital stock of the railroad company, the same to be paid by a like amount of the bonds of the township, the road to be constructed on or before the 31st day of December, 1888. The election was held, the vote canvassed, an order made that the county clerk subscribe for $25,000 of the capital stock of the railroad company for and on behalf of the township, and the subscription was made as ordered on the regular stock book of the railroad company furnished for that purpose. Several petitions were circulated asking for this submission. Some of them designated one point in the northern part of the township as the site of a depot to be erected by the company, while the others designated another point a half mile east. This discrepancy grew out of a mistake in copying the forms for the petition prepared by the railroad company. When the order was made, one of the petitions containing the mistake was taken as correct, so that the same mistake was carried into the order, notice, and proposition submitted, by which the depot was designated at a point a half mile east from the point really intended by the company and by the people of the township. Relying upon the subscription, the company proceeded to and did build its road from the south into the township, before it discovered that its line as located did not extend to the point named for a depot in the proposition voted. Thereupon it suspended work, and finally, as a proposed way out of the difficulty, the company prepared and circulated petitions reciting the former vote and mistake, and asking for an election for $21,000 of bonds, and a like subscription, upon the route as located, designating the depot site at the point originally intended; the railroad to be constructed on or before the 31st day of July, 1888. On the 14th of October, 1887, at a special meeting of the board of county commissioners of Anderson county, at which two members of the board were present, an order was made for another election to be held on the 14th day of November, 1887, for the township to subscribe $21,000 to the capital stock of the railroad company, the same to be paid for by a like amount of the bonds of the township. The petition upon which the board ordered the election to be held was signed "by a majority of the qualified electors of Rich township." A majority of the legal voters favored the proposition, and the board declared it carried, and made a second subscription for stock for $21,000. The road was built within the time and according to the terms stated in the second petition and vote. In the order and proposition of the board upon which the last vote was had was a recital that "if the subscription for $21,000 was made, then the $25,000 subscription before voted should be void, and no bonds should issue in payment thereof." The second petition was presented and the election thereon held under the provisions of chapter 183, Sess. Laws 1887, (paragraph 1283, Gen. St. 1889.) The railroad company, through its general attorney and vice-president, initiated and had general charge of the proceedings upon which both subscriptions were based. The railroad company offered a certificate of its stock for $21,000 to the proper officers, and demanded the issuance of a like amount of township bonds, as provided in the second subscription, after the board of county commissioners had gone over the road and declared the terms of the subscription complied with.

The first question in this case is whether, under the provisions of chapter 183, Sess. Laws 1887, the election of the 14th day of November, 1887, was "a second election for the same purpose" for which the prior election of March 1, 1887, was ordered and held. Section 1, c. 142, Sess. Laws 1877, provides "that at any subsequent election to be held for the same purpose, the same shall not be held unless upon a petition of a majority of the legal voters of such county, township, or city." Section 1, c. 183, Sess. Laws 1887, provides "that a second election, for the same purpose, shall not be held unless upon a petition of a majority of the legal voters of such county, township, or city." The petition for the proposition submitted at the first election was for a subscription for $25,000 of stock, the road to go over a definite route to a particular place specified for one of the depots. In the last election the petition was for a subscription of $21,000, the road to take a different route to a point where one of the depots should be built. The proposition submitted at the first election was for the construction of the railroad on or before the 31st day of December, 1888. In the second election the proposition was for the construction of the road on or before the 31st day of July, 1888. The second election was for a different purpose than the first election. The amount of the subscription was different, the route of the railroad was different, the location of one of the depots of the road was different, and the time for the completion of the road was different. Therefore we cannot decide, upon the facts found by the trial court, that the second election was "for the same purpose" as the first election. The propositions as submitted were not substantially the same, but materially different. As the jurisdictional facts or conditions precedent to a valid subscription by the township under the last proviso of section 1 of said chapter 183 were not complied with in voting or subscribing the $21,000 of stock to be paid for in township bonds, the railroad company has no right to have issued to it, under such proviso, the $21,000 of bonds. In this connection we copy the following from the able opinion of the learned trial judge, delivered at the time of rendering judgment: "If this be not the proper construction of the statute, then almost any proposition may be voted upon in the first instance providing for a subscription by a township for stock in a railroad company, and then, if defeated, or if carried, a vote can be had upon another proposition asked by a majority of voters entirely different from the one asked for by the tax-payers in the first instance. This construction would break down completely one of the statutory barriers against the hasty assumption of burdens by municipalities, viz., the tax-payers' petition." The trial court, after properly holding that there was no valid second election under the last proviso of section 1 of said chapter 183, further ruled that the second subscription to the stock of the railroad company in its inception was illegal for want of power to make it, because the petition presented to the board of county commissioners was not signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of the township. The railroad company vigorously contests this finding of fact and the conclusion of law of the trial court thereon. Counsel for the company say that "this point was not raised upon the trial of the case at all. The reasons set forth in the petition why the railroad company was not entitled to the bonds in substance were (1) because of the first subscription, for $25,000, which, it is alleged, has never been canceled or annulled; (2) because there were only two commissioners present at the meeting at which the election was called, and because the petition for the election had never been presented to the chairman of the board, and there had been no call for the meeting, and the meeting at which the election was called was held without authority of law; (3) because there was no security given for the expenses of the election; and (4) because certain articles were published by the railroad company in a newspaper circulated in the township, wherein it was claimed that the first subscription was valid, and would be enforced unless the last proposition was carried, and if the last proposition was carried, the first would be released, and because these publications, together with the proviso in the last proposition to the same effect, operated as an inducement and bribe to the voters of the township to vote in favor of the last proposition, but for which the same would have been defeated." This covered and included the substance of every allegation of fact in the petition except the formal allegations of incorporation, official character, etc. Not a single allegation, not a word, attacking the sufficiency of the petition for the election, can be found in the petition. No testimony was introduced upon the trial showing, or tending to show, that the petition did not contain two-fifths, or any other proportion, of the resident tax-payers of the township. The case was taken under advisement by the court, and briefs were filed. The only attack made upon the petition was because it "did not contemplate a 'completed' railroad, as the word 'constructed' was used instead of 'completed'." The opposing counsel answers as follows: "The railroad company press the alleged fact that the point upon which the district judge decided the case in favor of the township was not urged in the court below. The principle underlying this point was pressed with all the force at our command. The broad general allegation in the petition is that the railroad company is not entitled to these or any other bonds of Rich township. It is true that the allegations are very general, but they were sufficient to present the question considered and decided. If the defendant was not satisfied with the petition it should have filed its motion to have it made more definite and certain. The sufficiency of the petition for the last election was assailed at the outset, and continuously, and after all, in the opinion of the district judge, the case turned upon it. A copy of it was attached to the petition of the township in this case. It showed on its face that it was signed by voters only, and the board of county commissioners so found. What more could have been required? The question was presented upon the pleadings. It was in the case, and the trial judge considered it as conclusive in the township's favor."

This is an equitable suit, and in considering the complaint against the ruling of the trial court, that the second petition was not a tax-payers' petition, various other matters disclosed by the record should be referred to. The township trustee signed the second petition, and voted for the proposition. Everybody supposed the second subscription contract to be valid, and all parties interested treated it as valid until the trial before the district court. The form of ballots used at the second election, in favor of the propositions, was "For extending aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company on the new proposition;" and against the proposition was "Against extending aid to the Kansas City & Pacific Railroad Company on the new proposition." In building the railroad through the township, the line had to be lengthened several thousand feet and considerable additional expense incurred in order to comply with the terms of the subscription. But for the subscription of Rich township the road would have been located and built by an equally favorable route, through Blue Mound township, about six miles east of its present location. The railroad has been regularly operated through the township since its completion. On February 27, 1888, the township board, believing that the railroad company was about to have the bonds issued while the road was yet unfinished and not in operation, as required by the subscription, met and took action in the matter, the result of which was that the treasurer, trustee, and clerk caused to be sent to the company a written notice, signed by all of them, in substance stating that the township board would not accept the railroad in its present condition. About 10 days thereafter, the township commenced an action to enjoin the issuing of the bonds, in which the railroad company filed an answer, setting forth in substance, among other things, that it did not claim to be then entitled to receive the bonds in payment of the subscription, and did not propose asking for them until the railroad was completed and in operation in all respects as required by the terms of the subscription, and thereupon the township caused the action to be dismissed without prejudice. On April 30, 1888, the company had the railroad completed and in operation, with depots and side tracks and stock-yards, in all respects in compliance with the terms of the subscription, and thereupon notified the proper county and township officers of that fact; and on May 2d, the board of county commissioners met as requested, and, accompanied by the county clerk and township officers, went over and carefully inspected the road. The record of the meeting of the board of county commissioners shows, among other things, that "the board went over the said railroad on May 2, 1888, * * * and noted carefully the construction thereof, and finds that said railroad is fully completed and in operation, in accordance with the subscription of said township to the capital stock;" and, after reciting the facts about the tender of the stock, the refusal thereof, and demand for the bonds, the record further shows that "the board find that while the company * * * is entitled to the bonds, yet, the board having been, on May 2d, at seven o'clock, P. M., enjoined from issuing them, it cannot take further action until said injunction suit is settled." In 1887 Rich township, including the little villages within it, had 999 inhabitants. At the first election 136 votes were cast for the proposed subscription, and 124 against. At the second election 128 votes were cast for the subscription, and 109 against. The act of 1877, as also the act of 1887, prescribes that before a first election shall be held in any township to subscribe to the capital stock of any railroad company a petition in writing should first be presented to the board of county commissioners, signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of the township. The petition presented to the board of county commissioners on the 14th day of October, 1887, did not show upon its face that it was signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers. If the petition was merely defective, or irregular only, within the authorities, the township is not in a position to refuse the payment of its subscription. "A municipality may be estopped by its course of dealing with the railroad company to interpose a defense of irregularity in the exercise of the power of issuing bonds; and its position then in regard to the company is similar to that which it occupies to bona fide holders of the bonds without notice. A distinction is to be observed that ratification by acquiescence, or by affirmative acts, has been established only in cases of irregularities in the exercise of the power to issue bonds, and not in any case where there was a total want of power to issue the bonds." Jones, Ry. Secur. § 280, and cases there cited; Commissioners v. Hinchman, 31 Kan. 729, 3 Pac. Rep. 504; Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Osage Co., 38 Kan. 597, 16 Pac. Rep. 828; Railroad Co. v. Evans, 41 Kan. 94, 21 Pac. Rep. 216; Railroad Co. v. Stewart, 39 Iowa, 267; Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 340; Brown v. Kramer, 25 N. W. Rep. 356. Even in judicial matters this court has already decided that if the jurisdictional facts necessary to warrant service upon a defendant by publication were in existence at the commencement of the action, and the affidavit for publication is defective only and not void, the court, after judgment, may permit an amended affidavit for publication to be filed, and such affidavit, when filed, gives jurisdiction to the court, and relates back to the time of the commencement of the action. Long v. Fife, ante, 594, (just decided; ) Pierce v. Butters, 21 Kan. 124; Wilkins v. Tourtellott, 28 Kan. 833; Harrison v. Beard, 30 Kan. 532, 2 Pac. Rep. 632. The railroad company has proceeded upon the faith that it was to receive the bonds in due time; has complied with all the conditions upon which it was to become entitled to them; has expended large sums of money in constructing its road through the township, which it would not have done but for the promise of the legal voters that the bonds should issue in payment of the township subscription when the company had performed its part of the contract. During all of this time the board of county commissioners, the township officers, the tax-payers, and citizens of the township, seeing and knowing that the railroad company was expending its money within the township, in the construction of a public improvement which was to benefit the township and the property therein, stood by and made no complaint or objection to the petition presented for the second election. The first time that it was suggested that the proceedings were wholly void, because of the absence of a tax-payers' petition, was upon the trial of this case, and if the statement of the counsel of the railroad company is correct the suggestion was not seriously considered by the parties until the decision of the trial court was rendered.

In view of all the facts presented, we think that the question whether the petition for the second election was signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of the township ought to be fully litigated. The evidence pro and con upon this question should be presented to the trial court. We think, considering the conduct of the county and township officers, the tax-payers and citizens of the township, and the form of the petition praying for the injunction against the issuance of the bonds, that the railroad company never understood, until after the decision against it, that the validity of the petition presented to the board of county commissioners was challenged. It was not specifically informed on the trial by the allegations of the pleadings, or any evidence offered, that the petition was defective upon the ground of not having been signed by tax-payers, so it had no fair opportunity on the trial of supplying proof in that regard. Of course, the rule is that if a petition is not sufficiently definite, a defendant may file his motion to have it made more specific, but the petition for the injunction nowhere alleged that the proceedings were void for the want of a tax-payers' petition, and the petition did specifically state several other reasons why the railroad company was not entitled to the bonds. These specific allegations limited and qualified the general allegations of the petition, and therefore we cannot say that the counsel of the railroad company was negligent or guilty of laches in failing to file a motion to make the petition more certain, or in failing to understand that the question of a tax-payers' petition was in controversy. Wiley v. Keokuk, 6 Kan. 94; Armour Bros. Banking Co. v. Riley Co. Bank, 30 Kan. 163, 1 Pac. Rep. 506. The allegations of a pleading are to be taken most strongly against the pleader. If, upon a new trial, it shall be made to appear that the petition presented to the board of county commissioners was signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of Rich township, then, at most, the petition for the second election was merely defective, or irregular only. It ought to have stated upon its face that it was signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of the township, or the board, in ordering the election, should have so found; but if, as a matter of fact, it was actually thus signed, then section 1 of chapter 183, for a first election, would be so far complied with as to uphold the proceedings, considering all the other facts of the case. The jurisdictional facts or conditions precedent to a valid subscription by a township under the act referred to are a petition of two-fifths of the resident tax-payers, an order by the commissioners for an election, a notice for such election, and an affirmative vote upon the proposition. The power of the township to vote aid was not exhausted by the election of March 1, 1887, if the second election be regarded as a vote upon a new proposition. If irregularities only intervened, and the second subscription was otherwise valid, it annulled and canceled the prior subscription. Supervisors v. Galbraith, 99 U. S. 214. If it can be established by sufficient proof that the petition for the second election was signed by two-fifths of the resident tax-payers of Rich township, as it is conceded that the commissioners ordered the election, that notice of the election was given, and an affirmative vote of a majority of the legal voters of the township was cast upon the proposition, it cannot well be urged that there was a total want of power to make the subscription. If there was power to make the subscription, although the proceedings were irregular, then, in view of all the equities favoring the railroad company, the bonds ought to issue. It is not contended that there was anything unfair in the election, or that the voters of the township did not generally participate therein. As before stated, all of the parties interested treated the second petition as sufficient and valid until the perpetual injunction was granted. If, as a matter of fact, this petition was signed by two-fifths of the resident taxpayers of the township, then the proceedings precedent to making the subscription were irregular only, not fatally defective,—not void. There is nothing in the petition presented to the board of county commissioners, or in the order or notice for the election, stating or showing that the signers to the petition were not taxpayers of the township. The petitioners were qualified electors of the township, and may have also been taxpayers. Generally a majority of the qualified electors of a township in this state embraces two-fifths of the taxpayers of the township; at least, a majority of the qualified electors of a township are more likely to include two-fifths of the taxpayers of a township than a majority of the qualified electors of a city or large village are likely to include two-fifths of the taxpayers of such city or village. Whether the majority of the qualified electors of Rich township signing the petition included among them two-fifths of the taxpayers of the township will be determined upon the new trial. Noffziger v. McAllister, 12 Kan. 315, referred to, was a slight herd law decision. The only evidence introduced on the trial in that case to show that any petition was ever presented to the board of county commissioners was merely the order of the board mentioning the same. Of course, the mere recital in the order of the county commissioners, that a petition had been previously presented to them to consider and act upon, is not sufficient evidence of such fact if it be specifically denied. Other questions in the record as to alleged conditions precedent to a valid subscription need not be considered, because they all concern irregularities merely, and the township is "estopped by its course of dealing with the railroad company to interpose a defense of irregularity in the exercise of the power of issuing the bonds." In view of another trial the pleadings should be amended so as to specifically allege that the petition upon which the second election was called was not signed by two-fifths of the resident taxpayers of the township. Then this matter will be clearly in issue. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial in accordance with the views herein expressed. All the justices concurring.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

C. N. Sterry, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Moss, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. Action on a promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "$1,400. Topeka, Kansas, May 16th, 1887. Ninety days after date we promise to pay to the order of the First National Bank, Topeka, Kansas, fourteen hundred dollars, at the First National Bank of Topeka, Kansas, value received, with ten per cent. interest after maturity. [Signed] L. J. TALLEY. [Signed] FRANK S. BROWN. Due August 17th, 1887." Indorsed on the back: "MARY E. BURTIS." The defendant Mary E. Burtis claims that L. J. Talley and Frank S. Brown were joint makers of the note sued on, and that she was indorser and guarantor. When the note became due, it was renewed by giving a new note exactly like the original, and executed by the several parties thereto in the same manner. When the second note became due, the said Talley and Brown failing to pay the same, it was paid by Mrs. Burtis, and indorsed to her, and she brought suit on it against Talley and Brown as makers. Talley and Brown filed separate answers; Brown answering by general denial only, while Talley answered by general denial, and also pleaded that he signed the note as a surety with Mrs. Burtis for Brown. The defendant replied the general denial. The case was tried by the court without a jury, the court making the following findings of fact and of law:

"FINDINGS OF FACT.

"(1) That, 90 days preceding the making of the note sued on in this action, the defendant Brown presented to the plaintiff a promissory note of that date, and of the same form, for the sum of $1,400, payable 90 days after date to the First National Bank, and signed by the defendant L. J. Talley, and the said Frank S. Brown requested the plaintiff to indorse the said note by writing her name across the back of said note, and thereupon the said note was then by the said Brown negotiated to the First National Bank of Topeka, Kan., and he received the proceeds of said note. (2) That, when the plaintiff indorsed the said note by writing her name across the back of said note, she did not know that Talley was, or had executed said note as, surety for Brown, and believed that both Talley and Brown were makers of said note, and believed that she was only assuming the liability of indorser for the principals, Talley and Brown. (3) That Brown received the proceeds of said note from the bank, and appropriated the same to his own use and benefit, and that Talley received no benefit from the said note, or proceeds of the same. (4) That, when the first note above described matured, the note described in plaintiff's petition was made by Talley and Brown as shown and indorsed by the plaintiff, as appears on said exhibit, as a renewal of said first note first above described. (5) That after the note described in plaintiff's petition matured, and was dishonored for non-payment, the plaintiff took such note up from the bank by paying the bank the full face value of the note, and became the owner, and now is the owner and holder, of said note. (6) That the plaintiff is aged 68 years, and is a widow, her husband having died several years ago, and is quite hard of hearing, and her eye-sight greatly impaired.

"CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

"(1) That when the defendant Brown presented the first note, indorsed with the name of Talley and his own name written on the face of the note, and asked plaintiff to indorse the note by writing her name across the back of the same, she had the right to assume that both Talley and Brown were makers of said note, and that her liability was that of an accommodation indorser, and with the understanding that Talley was an accommodation maker of the note for Brown. (2) That, as between Talley and Brown, Brown is principal, and Talley is surety for Brown."

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the amount of the note and costs. Motion for new trial was overruled. An application was then made to the court to have the judgment reduced one-half, which was refused.

The first error complained of was the refusal of the court to strike out the statements of Sharritt and Brown, made immediately prior to Mrs. Burtis' indorsement of the first note. While the statements complained of could not bind the plaintiff, Talley, they were evidence for some purpose. They tended to show Mrs. Burtis' understanding of the relation of Talley and Brown to the note at the time she indorsed it. The case was tried without a jury. If it had been tried by a jury, it would have been proper for the court to have limited the application of this evidence. The evidence should not, however, have been stricken out. There is another view of this matter. Talley having signed his name to the note, and intrusted it to Brown, he thereby gave Brown implied authority to represent him as a maker of the note for the purpose of procuring other joint makers, sureties, or guarantors sufficient to discount it on the market. Kelth v. Goodwin, 31 Vt. 268. In this view of the case, the statements of Brown, at least, obtained an additional force. His statements at the time, and immediately before, Mrs. Burtis indorsed the note, that she would have no trouble with the note; that Mr. Talley would pay it,—were equivalent to saying that Mr. Talley was a principal, and she had a right to so understand it, and rely upon it.

The second complaint is that there is no evidence to support the second finding of fact. It seems to us there is considerable evidence in the record that supports finding No. 2. The position of Talley's name on the note is some evidence that, at the time Mrs. Burtis indorsed the note, she believed he was a maker of the note. Mr. Brown's statement that she would have no trouble with the note; that Talley would pay it,—also had a tendency to make her believe Talley a maker of the note; and she swears Brown did not tell her Talley had signed as surety. Again, she testifies: "I merely indorsed these men; not to pay the money, but to pay it if they did not. They were responsible for the money, and I merely indorsed these men." If she believed Talley was a maker, she could not believe he was only surety. She also says she relied on Mr. Talley's responsibility to pay the note, and on him alone; that she knew Brown had not a dollar. Certainly, there is some evidence to support the finding. It is true there is some evidence in the record that tends to prove that she knew the money was for Brown; but that would not necessarily prove that Talley was only a surety. Talley had a right to become a joint maker of a note upon which to raise money for Brown, if he chose to do so. It is claimed that Mrs. Burtis knew that Brown was the principal; and her only belief that Talley would pay, and save her, lay in the understanding that she had that Talley was to be secured. She did not know that Talley was to be secured until after she had indorsed the note. The talk she had with Brown in which he mentioned that he was going to secure Talley with a mortgage on furniture was after she had indorsed the first note, and before she indorsed the second. It is asserted that Mrs. Burtis has no stronger equity to have the case determined for her on what occurred when she signed than has Talley to have the case determined for him upon what occurred when he signed. We think she has a much stronger equity as against him than he has against her. At the time he signed the note there was no name on it. He signed first. There is nothing on the paper to show any liability on the part of any one when he signed it. On the other hand, both Talley and Brown had signed the note when it was presented to her for her indorsement, and both had apparently signed it as principals. In the absence of any statement at all, she had a right to assume that the parties already on the note sustained the relation to the note and to each other that they appeared to; that is, joint makers. It seems to us that, as between Mrs. Burtis and Talley and Brown, they are principals, joint makers of the note, while she, by her indorsement, assumed the liability of guarantor. Firman v. Blood, 2 Kan. 496; Fuller v. Scott, 8 Kan. 25; Sarbach v. Jones, 20 Kan. 497; Withers v. Berry, 25 Kan. 373. Pahlman v. Taylor, 75 Ill. 629. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

BY THE COURT. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

MAYOR, ETC., OF ATCHISON et al. v. PRICE et al. SAME v. LAMPHEAR et al. SAME
v. BURNS' ESTATE et al.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS—CONSTRUCTION OF SEWERS—ASSESSMENTS—ISSUE OF BONDS.

1. A city of the first class may construct sewers by districts or otherwise; and when done by districts, and at the expense of the property specially benefited, it is not essential that the districts shall be defined by ordinance, but it will be sufficient if the records of the tax proceedings clearly show the property specially taxed for the improvement.

2. The fact that a sewer constructed in one district or portion of the city connects with, or is an extension of, another already constructed, does not make the territory drained by both a single and distinct district; nor does it require that all the property within that territory shall be assessed for the sewer last constructed. When a section is built or extension made, only the territory drained and specially benefited by the construction of such section or extension can be assessed for its cost.

3. Property which abuts upon and is specially benefited by the sewer constructed will not be relieved from bearing its proportionate share of the expense of the same because the owners thereof have previously constructed private drains or sewers, which have not been authorized or adopted by the city as a part of its system.

4. An objection was made to the special assessment upon a lot fronting upon the improvement because the whole of the same was not owned by one person, and that one owner could not avail himself of the benefits of the sewer except by passing over the property of the other. When the assessment was made, the recorded plat of the city did not show any subdivision of the lot, or that the frontage of the same had been changed, and it did not appear that any of the public records showed that the title of the lot was in more than one person, and the court held that the whole of the same was subject to taxation. Held no error.

5. The provisions of paragraph 558 of the General Statutes of 1889 do not apply to the construction of sewers or the levy and collection of special assessments to pay for the same.

6. The whole expense, including the engineering and supervision of the construction of sewers, is to be borne by the property specially benefited.

7. A city of the first class may construct a sewer on credit when there are no funds on hand or set aside in the city treasury to pay for the same; but installment bonds of the city may be issued to the contractor constructing the sewer in payment thereof, which bonds shall be redeemed by special taxes levied upon the property specially benefited, as provided in chapter 101 of the Laws of 1887.

Error to district court, Atchison county; ROBERT M. EATON, Judge.

Three actions were brought in the district court of Atchison county to enjoin the issuance of improvement bonds, and the levy and collection of special taxes, to pay for the construction of a sewer which had been built and completed in the city of Atchison by contractors Shaw & Downing. One action was brought by John M. Price and W. W. Guthrie against the city of Atchison, the mayor and councilmen thereof, and Shaw & Downing; the second action was brought by A. H. Lamphear and 67 others against the same defendants; the third action was brought by the Burns estate and 14 others against the same defendants. For the purposes of trial and judgment, the cases were consolidated, and submitted as one case, and in due time the court made and announced the following conclusions of fact and law:

"CONCLUSIONS OF FACT.

"(1) That each and all of the said plaintiffs are the owners of the several lots and pieces of ground as set forth herein in their several petitions. That the city of Atchison is, and ever since about the year 1880 has been, a city of the first class. That Fourth street, which, by the authority of the city council, in the summer of 1889, was changed to Fourth avenue, is and has been a public street in said city, running north and south. That running parallel with said Fourth street in said city, and east thereof, is Third street, in said city; and that running parallel to said Fourth street, and west thereof, is Fifth street, in said city.

"(2) That said Fourth street, from its intersection with Main street and White Clay creek, in said city, running north, crosses the following streets at right angles, as follows: Commercial street, Kansas avenue, Santa Fe, Atchison, Parallel, Laramie, Kearney, Riley, and Mound streets.

"(3) That in the summer and fall of 1884 the city council of the city of Atchison caused to be constructed a circular brick sewer, six feet in diameter, from the intersection of Main street and said Fourth street, at a point where said sewer would empty into White Clay creek, north, and in the center of said Fourth street between blocks 17 and 18, crossing Commercial street, and north to a point twenty-nine and one-half feet south of the south line of the alley running east and west in blocks 13 and 14. From this terminus of said brick sewer, arms, four feet in diameter, extended to the intersection of said alley on the east and west side of said Fourth street, at which point suitable catch-basins were made, and which conducted the surface water of said street into said sewer, and carried the same into White Clay creek. That the cost of said sewer was paid by all the property holders of the city of Atchison; a levy having been made therefor by the council upon all the property of said city.

"(4) At the time said sewer was constructed there was a rock drain in the alley in block 14, on the west side of Fourth street, which extended westwardly about half-way of said block, which old rock drain was at the time of the construction of the said brick sewer turned into and connected with the west arm of said brick sewer. That afterwards, in the year 1885, upon recommendation of the city engineer, the chairman of the committee on improvements of the council of the city of Atchison was ordered to, and did, lay from the west terminus of said rock drain, heretofore referred to, in the alley in block 14, an 18-inch pipe, westward through said alley to Fifth street, thereby making a suitable connection for sewerage purposes with the brick sewer on said Fourth street; which said last improvement was paid for by the city of Atchison, all property thereof contributing its proportion thereto.

"(5) On the 6th day of February, 1888, ordinance No. 954 was passed by the council of the city of Atchison, entitled 'An ordinance authorizing the mayor and clerk to enter into a contract with Rosewater & Christie to furnish said city with plans and specifications for a complete sewer system;' which said ordinance was passed February 6, 1888, approved February 8, and was published February 9, 1888. That in pursuance of said ordinance, on the 16th day of February, 1888, the then mayor of Atchison and clerk did enter into a contract with Messrs. Rosewater & Christie to prepare and furnish said city with plans, specifications, and estimates for a complete sewerage system of said city; which said sewerage system, with plans and specifications and a map thereof, was duly prepared and furnished by said Rosewater & Christie on the 1st day of June, 1888, in pursuance of their said contract, for which said city paid the said Rosewater & Christie the sum of $1,995.

"(6) No ordinance was ever passed by the mayor and council of the city of Atchison establishing or forming sewer districts, unless it be ordinance No. 954, referred to in the conclusion of fact No. 5.

"(7) On the 20th day of May, 1889, the city council of the city of Atchison passed a resolution as follows: 'Resolved, that it is necessary to at once commence the construction of the Fourth-Street sewer, it having been made a separate sewer under the plans of the Rosewater & Christie system of sewerage.' No publication of this resolution was made except the publication of the council proceedings of said May 20th, which was published in the Atchison Champion on the next day, to-wit, the 21st day of May, 1889. On June 3, 1889, the city clerk was instructed by the city council to advertise for bids for the construction of the North Fourth street sewer, and the city engineer was ordered to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates of the work, which was accordingly done, and which estimate, including — cents per foot for superintending, engineering, and contingencies, was afterwards filed in the office of the city clerk on the 8th day of July, 1889, duly sworn to by the city engineer. On the 6th day of June, 1889, the city clerk, in pursuance of the resolution of June 3d, caused a notice to be placed in the Atchison Daily Globe, the official newspaper of said city, for bids for the construction of the North Fourth street sewer, for the period of ten days, and no bids were received. And thereafter, on June 25, 1889, the city clerk, in pursuance of the resolution of June 3d, caused another and second notice of and advertisement for bids for the construction of the North Fourth street sewer to be made in the Atchison Daily Globe of that date for the period of ten days; and in this and all other like notices the city reserved the right to reject any and all bids. And thereafter, on the 8th day of July, 1889, the bid of John Shaw and Oscar Downing, partners as Shaw & Downing, for the construction of said Fourth-Street sewer system under the estimate of the city engineer, was received and accepted, and the contract awarded to said Shaw & Downing; the amount of said contract to be paid by the city in cash or bonds, at the option of the city of Atchison. And on said July 8th an ordinance (No. 1019) was duly passed by the mayor and councilmen of the city of Atchison authorizing the mayor and clerk to enter into a contract with Shaw & Downing for constructing the North Fourth street sewer system. [Ordinance omitted.] And thereafter, on the 20th day of July, 1889, in pursuance of said ordinance, the mayor and clerk duly entered into a contract with said Shaw & Downing for the construction of said North Fourth avenue sewer system, to commence at the termination of the brick sewer near the south line of the alley between Commercial street and Kansas avenue, thence extending north along Fourth avenue to the line of the center of the alley running east and west between Riley and Mound streets, together with all lateral sewers, in accordance with the plans thereof on file in the office of the city engineer; and that in pursuance of said agreement, as hereinafter shown, said Shaw & Downing constructed said North Fourth avenue sewer to the acceptance of said city.

"(8) At the meeting of the council July 8, 1889, and before the contract for constructing the Fourth-Avenue sewer was awarded to Shaw & Downing, a remonstrance signed by a majority of the resident property owners in the territory sought to be assessed for the construction of said sewer, outside of block 14, was presented to the council, and ordered received and filed.

"(9) No ordinance was passed by the city council of the city of Atchison appropriating or setting apart a fund for the payment of the construction of said Fourth-Avenue sewer before the commencement of the work, and that there were no funds in the city treasury at that time applicable for that purpose; and this sewer is the only one constructed since the Rosewater & Christie system was made.

"(10) That on July 26, 1889, by resolution, the mayor and council of the city of Atchison duly appointed Henry Denton, Phillip Krohn, and H. T. Smith as three disinterested appraisers to make a true and impartial assessment of all lots and pieces of ground liable under the law for the payment of special assessment for the work of building the Fourth-Avenue sewer, without regard to buildings or improvements thereon, and that the engineer be instructed to immediately prepare a plat showing the lots and pieces of ground liable to said appraisalment, and file the same with the city clerk for the use of said appraisers. And thereupon the city engineer of the city of Atchison made out and furnished to said appraisers a list of all the property owners, together with a description of their property, in the territory in which said sewer is constructed, from Commercial street, in said city, north to Mound street, and from the center of Third street on the east side of Fourth avenue to the center of Fifth street on the west side of Fourth avenue, together with a map of said territory showing the property benefited by the construction of said Fourth-Avenue sewer, a copy of which said map is hereto attached.

"(11) That said appraisers on the 31st day of July, 1889, in pursuance of their appointment, were duly qualified as such appraisers by taking the oath required by law, and thereupon proceeded to the discharge of their duties, and made report in writing of their appraisal, which was duly filed in the office of the city clerk on the 17th day of August, 1889.

"(12) In the list of property, together with the owners thereof, which was furnished to the appraisers for the purpose of valuation for assessment for the construction of said sewer, block 17, lying between Main and Commercial streets, and abutting upon said Fourth avenue, and also block 14, except the north 50 feet of lots one and two, and the south 25 feet of the north half of lots one and two, were not placed upon said list, and were not valued by said appraisers for assessment or the construction of said North Fourth street sewer, although said blocks are drained and benefitted by the said sewer, and are a part of the territory under the Rosewater & Christie system.

"(13) In the list of property, together with the owners thereof, prepared for the use of said appraisers, as hereinbefore stated, the following property upon said list was erased therefrom by drawing red ink lines across the same, and marking thereon in red ink the words, 'Not liable,' and which property is as follows: The north 70 feet of lots 5, 6, and 7, in block 13, in the name of John M. Price, and is the same property upon which the Price Opera-House in said city is situated. The south 90 feet of the west half of lot 14, in block 13, in the name of Manuel Frank. This property cannot be connected with the lateral of said sewer, which runs through the alley in the center of block 13, without going through or over other property, because the north 60 feet of said lot No. 14 is owned by another individual, to-wit, A. G. Otis. The north 22 feet of the south half of lot No. 8, in block No. 7, in the name of Mary Kinney, was not assessed, for the reason it could not be connected with said sewer, only by going through or over other property owned by other parties. The west 25 feet of the south 50 feet of lot No. 8, in the name of W. W. Guthrie, and on which property is located what is known as the 'Pioneer Hall Building,' was not assessed. That the north half of lots 1, 2, and 3, in block 63, in the name of L. Friend, was not assessed because it cannot be connected with said sewer without going through or over other property owned by other parties. The north 90 feet of lots 6 and 7, in block 64, in the name of Mrs. M. W. Horan, was not assessed, because no connection with said sewer could be made therefrom without going through or over property not owned by her. Lot No. 13, in block 74, in the name of S. A. Frazier, was not assessed, because such lot was so much lower than the lateral of said sewer on which it abuts that it would be impossible to connect it with said sewer. All of which said property was not assessed by said appraisers, and no valuation was placed thereon, at the time they filed their said report in the office of the city clerk, to-wit, the 17th day of August, 1889.

"(14) After the report of the appraisers was filed in the office of the city clerk, the appraisers were notified by the city clerk to appear at the city clerk's office and make some corrections in their report which had been filed; and thereupon, on the 26th day of August, 1889, Henry Denton and H. T. Smith, two of the appraisers, met at the city clerk's office, whose action in the matter was afterwards approved by Dr. Phillip Krohn, one of the appraisers, who met them at the foot of the stairs immediately after it was done; and the property of John M. Price, to-wit, the north 70 feet of lots 5, 6, and 7, in block 13, and the property of W. W. Guthrie, to-wit, the west 25 feet of the south 50 feet of lot 8 in block 8, which had been placed upon the list furnished them as not liable, was placed thereon by said appraisers, and each of said pieces of property, respectively, was valued at the proportion fixed upon the balance of said lots, which the appraisers had agreed should be the amount when they were determining their assessments upon all other property furnished them, and the same was at that time inserted in their report.

"(15) The property of John M. Price, hereinbefore described, and known as the 'Opera-House Property,' and the property of W. W. Guthrie, hereinbefore described, and known as the 'Pioneer Hall Building,' after the construction of the old circular brick sewer, had been connected with it by a private sewer from each of said pieces of property at their own expense, in the sum of two hundred and forty dollars. Each of said pieces of property, respectively, lies on the east side of Fourth street, separated only by Kansas avenue, and each abuts on said Fourth street.

"(16) After the construction of the old circular brick sewer, a private sewer or drain was constructed in the alley in the center of block 13, from lot 11, in said block, by Kathrens, to connect with the east wing at the corner of the alley with said old sewer, and with which sewer or drain, by permission of Kathrens, A. G. Otis, the owner of the east half of lot 10, in said block, connected therewith. The east half of the south 90 feet of lot No. 14, in block 13, is owned, and has been for many years, by Amelia J. Otis, and the north 60 feet of said lot 14 is owned by A. G. Otis, and A. G. and Amelia J. Otis are husband and wife, and Amelia J. Otis can only connect with said sewer over or through the property of A. G. Otis. There is no recorded plat showing any subdivision of this lot.

"(17) On the 21st day August, 1889, a notice was published in the Atchison Daily Globe for ten days, which was a notice of the report of the appraisers, and that the city council would sit as a board of equalization on the 2d day of September, 1889; a copy of which notice is as follows: [Notice omitted.]

"(18) On the 2d day of September, 1889, the council met as a board of equalization, and heard complaints from property owners, and adjourned until September 4th, when, there being no quorum present, they adjourned until September 6th, when they met a number of the property holders before them,—among them, A. G. Otis, A. H. Lamphear, C. D. Walker, A. D. McConaughy, E. S. Ehrhart, attorney for property holders, W. W. Guthrie, who appeared for himself and John M. Price, whose property was in a similar condition to his own,—and objected to their property being included because not legally assessed, and already having sewer facilities, and did not further appear. H. R. Bostwick, for the Burns estate, A. F. Martin, attorney, appeared for J. A. Harouff, and Henry Luth, J. P. Adams, S. A. Frazier, and a number of others, and, after hearing the complaints, the council adjourned until September 16th, when they again adjourned, there being no quorum present, until September 23, 1889, when they met as a board of equalization, and after a consideration of all complaints which had been made to them, all of which said complaints were mainly to the amount of the assessment of property, except the complaint of W. W. Guthrie, for himself and John M. Price, whose property was similarly situated with his own, who claimed they ought not to be assessed because they had already built private sewers upon their properties at their own expense; and all said complaints were disallowed by the said board of equalization, except the complaint of A. D. McConaughy, the assessment of whose property was reduced at said meeting, and the report of the appraisers was adopted.

"(19) Shaw & Downing, in pursuance of their contract entered into with the mayor and city clerk, on the 20th day of July, 1889, as hereinbefore stated, commenced the construction of said sewer according to the plans and specifications on file in the office of the city engineer, and the construction of the same was prosecuted by them without delay, under the supervision of an inspector appointed specially by the city authorities, in connection with the city engineer, and accepted by said city through its engineer, about December 2, 1889.

"(20) The North Fourth avenue sewer, as constructed by said Shaw & Downing, commences at the north terminus of the old brick sewer, into which it empties twenty-nine and one-half feet south of the south line of the alley running east and west through blocks 13 and 14, and runs north in the center of Fourth avenue, with its lateral east and west, into the alleys between the blocks, with its man-holes and catch-basins, on each side of Fourth street, to the alley between Riley and Mound streets. The laterals connect directly with the main sewer. In addition to the laterals which are laid in the alleys midway of the blocks as you go north from the north terminus of the old brick sewer, to the alley between Mound and Riley streets, there are also laterals constructed in Kansas avenue, Santa Fe, Kearney, and Riley streets, which also connect with the main sewer; and in all the laterals, and in many instances in the main sewer, openings have been made with which each and every piece and parcel of ground within the territory drained by said sewer, by private sewers from said pieces of property can be therewith connected; catch-basins on each side of said sewer, located at all the cross-streets for the purpose of conducting the surface water off, are connected with the main sewer by separate pipes, and do not in any case run into the laterals. The fall from the alley between Mound street and Riley street, south of where the sewer empties into the old brick sewer, is one foot in every twenty-four feet. The main sewer from where it commenced at the north terminus of the old brick sewer is built of glazed sewer tile pipe; the first pipe laid being twenty-four inches in diameter, the next twenty inches in diameter, the next eighteen inches in diameter, the next fifteen inches in diameter, and the next eight inches in diameter, respectively, as you go north to the crest of the elevation. The laterals are constructed of glazed sewer tile pipes, eight inches in diameter, and said sewer is abundantly and amply sufficient in capacity to carry off all drainage from property and surface water, which in the ordinary course of things would fall upon or be carried away in said territory. The alley at the north terminus of said Fourth-Street sewer, between Mound and Riley streets, is at the crest of the surface of earth at that place. Beyond and north of it the water naturally flows into another depression. Fifth street, on the west side of Fourth avenue, is now a paved street, oval, and highest in the center, and no water on the west side of Fifth street will flow into the territory drained by this sewer from the west side of said street, but will naturally flow westward into another depression of the ground. All surface water and drainage on the east side of third street, in said city, naturally flows from the topography of the ground into another depression of earth, which is naturally drained into the Missouri river, with the exception, perhaps, of a few isolated pieces of property from which the surface water might flow over and across said Third street, and into the territory drained by the North Fourth street sewer.

"(20½) In the construction of said North Fourth street sewer, the private sewer which had been made heretofore with the Opera-House, the property of John M. Price, and the building known as the 'Pioneer Hall Building,' and the property of W. W. Guthrie, and which crossed said Fourth street to the west side thereof, was connected with the present new Fourth-Street sewer at the point in said Fourth street where it crosses the same, without their knowledge.

"(21) Lot No. 8, in block number 13, which lot is on the east side of Fourth street and abuts thereon, owned by Anna M. Marbourg, was connected with the old brick sewer by a private sewer constructed about a year prior to the commencement of the construction of the present Fourth-Avenue sewer, by the owner of said lot at her own expense.

"(22) The lots in block 14 in an unimproved condition are worth from 25 to 40 per cent. more than the corresponding lots in block 13, and the improvements of block 14 are much better than those in block 13; and the lots in block 17, unimproved as well as improved,—that is, taking into consideration the buildings thereon,—are about the same as block 14, and are worth from 25 to 40 per cent. more than lots in block 13. The lots in block 18 are of about the same value as the lots in block 13, unimproved, and the improvements thereon are of about the same value as those in block 13. The south half of block 13, and which abuts on Commercial street, is improved with buildings for the purpose of carrying on trade and business therein, and on the north half of said block 13 is the Opera-House building. The south half of block 14, abutting on Commercial street, is improved with buildings suitable for carrying on business and trade, as well as the greater part of the north half of said block 14. Outside of the two blocks just mentioned, (13 and 14,) the balance of the territory drained by said sewer consists of vacant lots and private residence property.

“(23) Of the parties plaintiff in the actions herein, the following named persons during the time said sewer was being constructed, and since and before the commencement of this suit, made connection of their property with the said sewer, as follows: Ella J. Fisk, 2 houses; L. Kiper, 2 houses; Anna Moore, 4 houses; Mrs. K. D. Shipley; George Searles; John Beltz; John Perkins; F. W. Downs; and George Tofte.

“(24) The total cost of said sewer amounted to the sum of $11,516.41, which includes 25-100 per cent. of the cost of the work, which was allowed for engineering and superintending the said sewer, and paid by the city of Atchison, to be reimbursed from special levy. The estimated cost of the work as made by the city engineer, and filed in the office of the city clerk, amounted to $13,047.28.

“(25) On the 28th day of October, 1889, ordinance No. 1097 was passed by the city council of the city of Atchison, approved by the mayor and published as required by law, and is as follows: [This ordinance, which determined the amount of special assessment to be charged against the different parcels of property, and provided for the issuance of internal improvement bonds, is omitted.]

“(26) The city of Atchison, electing to pay the contractors, Shaw and Downing, for the construction of said sewer, as under its contract it had the option so to do, had printed, and were about to dispose of, in pursuance of section 3 of ordinance No. 1098, internal improvement bonds of the city of Atchison, bearing seven per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, and covering a period of 10 years, payable in annual installments, one-tenth of the principal, with the interest due on the unpaid principal on the bond each year, which said bonds shall have proper coupons attached thereto, and shall be of such denominations as the mayor shall deem proper, to the amount of $11,500.00, for the purpose of paying for the Fourth-Avenue sewer in said city; and that in due time the city of Atchison will cause to be levied upon the lots and parcels of lots, as described in said ordinance No. 1097, annually, such assessments as will meet the payment of such internal improvement bonds, as they shall fall due, respectively, with the interest thereon for the period of ten years next ensuing. A blank form of said series of said internal imp. bonds is hereto attached.

“(27) After the passage of ordinance No. 1097, the city clerk caused notices to be sent to all lot-owners mentioned in the report of the appraisers, one of which said notices was sent to W. W. Guthrie, and is as follows: [Notice omitted.]

“(28) Said Rosewater & Christie made a complete survey of said city, including the sewers and parts of sewers already put in, which then consisted of the said Fourth-Street sewer, with its lateral connections in alley in block 14, so far as completed, and a sewer reaching from White Clay creek north up Sixth street, with some lateral connections, and a sewer reaching from the river up Third street, with some lateral connections, and made their system of sewerage to discharge into White Clay creek, and then reaching therefrom so far as the natural connections could be made therewith, and otherwise discharging into the Missouri river, and made a map locating such sewerage system thereon, and showing same, as hereinbefore stated, and the most of the sewerage of said city thereby to empty into White Clay creek, or the main sewer to take its place, and so discharge into the Missouri river, and showing contemplated extensions of said Fourth-Street sewer, north, with laterals reaching to 3d and 5th streets, on each side, substantially as afterwards completed, and showing the extension of the said Sixth-Street sewer, north, with lateral connections reaching to 5th and 7th streets on either side, and so throughout the city, providing for sewerage, into White Clay creek, or the sewer to take its place, according to the natural trend of the ground. The original map of said system of sewerage now on file in the city engineer's office here referred to and made a part hereof. [Form of the improvement bonds, and map and plan of the Fourth-Street sewer, are omitted.]

“(29) The construction of the Fourth-Avenue sewer was a matter of general notoriety throughout the city of Atchison, and each and all of the plaintiffs, in common with all other citizens, had knowledge of its construction, and no suit was brought until these actions were commenced, which was after the completion of the same, and its acceptance by the city engineer of said city.

“(30) That at, and for long prior to, the making of the contract between the defendant the city of Atchison, and its co-defendants, John Shaw and Downing, partners as Shaw & Downing, the bonds of the character of those sought to be issued by the city for the purpose of raising money to pay for the construction of the Fourth-Avenue sewer were generally known to be below par, and the city had never been able to dispose of bonds of such character and corresponding value, except by allowing the purchaser two per cent. commission for taking them at their par value, which two per cent. when paid was paid by the city out of its general revenue fund. In this case the city had the option, under the contract, to pay in cash or bonds, and the contractors had elected to take the bonds at their par and face value, and the city had elected so to deliver them.

"CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

"(1) That the proceedings of the mayor and council adopting the Rosewater & Christie system of sewerage for said city were valid.

"(2) That the action of the city council in directing the city engineer to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates for the construction of the Fourth-Street or Fourth-Avenue sewer, it having been made a separate sewer under the Rosewater & Christie system of sewerage, was valid, and in substantial conformity with law.

"(3) That the estimates submitted by the city engineer for the construction of said sewer were in substantial conformity to the law, and therefore valid.

"(4) That the contract entered into between the city and the contractors for said work was in substantial compliance with law, and therefore valid.

"(5) That the appraisal and valuation of the property for the purpose of levying a tax thereon for the payment of said sewer were in substantial compliance with law, and valid.

"(6) That the proceedings of the mayor and council of said city in charging and assessing the amounts against the property of the plaintiffs for the cost of said sewer is void, for the reason that blocks fourteen (14) and seventeen (17) are omitted from said charge and assessment for their appropriate share of the costs of said sewer."

The defendants moved for judgment in their favor, and against the plaintiffs, upon the conclusions of fact, notwithstanding the conclusions of law, and also to set aside the conclusions of fact and law, and grant a new trial; both of which motions were overruled. The plaintiffs in each of the cases moved for full judgment and decree upon the conclusions of fact, the conclusions of law to the contrary notwithstanding, and also filed motions to set aside and vacate the conclusions of fact and law, as found and stated by the court, and for a new trial of the actions; all of which motions were overruled. The court thereupon, and for the reasons stated in the sixth conclusion of law, adjudged and decreed that the defendants be enjoined from issuing any installment improvement bonds of the city of Atchison, or from making any levies of special improvement taxes against the properties of the plaintiffs in any one of the three actions, to pay for the construction of said sewer. The defendants bring the case to this court for review.

H. C. Solomon, for plaintiff in error. W. W. & W. F. Guthrie, Henry Elliston, and A. F. Martin, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The decision and decree of the court holding the special taxes to be illegal, and enjoining the making of any provision for their payment, is placed upon the failure of the city and its officers to make an assessment upon the property in blocks 14 and 17 for a proportion of the cost of the sewer. The other conclusions are against the defendants in error; and although they excepted to the rulings adverse to them, and asked for a new trial, they have presented no petition or cross-petition in error asking for a review of such adverse rulings, as they might have done. The property in blocks 14 and 17 which was omitted from the assessment is contiguous to another sewer, which, with laterals now built or that may be built, will afford adequate sewer facilities for the occupants of these blocks. The same may be said of block 18, which is in a similar situation. The property omitted from the assessment in these blocks was not accommodated or benefited by the construction of the new sewer, and such taxes can only be imposed in proportion to the special benefits received. A part of lots 1 and 2 in block 14, which could not be reached by the sewer already constructed, and which was so subdivided as to abut on the new sewer, was benefited, and was properly assessed. It is contended, however, that no sewer district was ever created or defined by which the expense of the construction of the sewer could be placed exclusively upon the owners of the territory upon which the assessment was made by the city council; but that, if there was a distinct sewer district which might be held liable for the entire cost of the sewer, it extended south to White Clay creek, and included blocks 14, 17, and the most of 18, as also the other property within this territory. It appears that in 1884 a six-foot brick sewer was built from White Clay creek and Main street northward along the center of Fourth street for a distance of a block and a half, and to a point 29½ feet south of the alley running through blocks 13 and 14, with wings extending to the ends of the alleys in said blocks, and on either side; and a lateral sewer was afterwards constructed through the alley in block 14, which emptied into the brick sewer. This improvement was made at the expense of all the tax-payers of the city. The sewer in question, which was constructed in 1889, connected with the brick sewer, and extended from the connection northward along the center of Fourth avenue, near to Mound street, with laterals through the alleys of the blocks on either side, thus draining the territory from Third to Fifth streets.

It is claimed that the new sewer is simply an extension of the one built in 1884, and that the entire territory between Third and Fifth streets, from White Clay creek northward to Mound street, constitutes a sewer district, and that the special taxes should be apportioned to the entire property within that district. The district court appears to have adopted the view that this territory should be treated as a distinct district, and that the exemption of the property in blocks 14 and 17 from contributing towards the cost of the sewer rendered the assessment that was made illegal. We think this entire territory is not to be treated as a single district, and that the exemption of the property not assessed in blocks 14, 17, and 18, which is and may be accommodated by the brick sewer built prior to 1889, did not invalidate the assessment that was made. A general system of sewerage for the entire city has been adopted, and the construction of the whole at once may be impracticable and unnecessary. The fact that a sewer constructed in one district or portion of the city connects with or is an extension of another already constructed does not make the territory drained by both a single and distinct district, nor does it require that all the property within that territory shall be assessed for the sewer last constructed. It is for the city to determine how early and rapidly the system shall be completed, and any section or extension of the system may be built whenever it is deemed necessary and expedient. When a section or extension is made, the territory drained and specially benefited by the construction of an extension or section, however small, may be regarded as a district. A lateral running through an alley of a single block, and connected with another sewer, may be constructed by the city, and the territory specially benefited will alone constitute a district upon which the entire cost of the lateral may be assessed. In this case, only the property contiguous to the new sewer, and specially benefited by it, was assessed for its cost. To have apportioned any share of the expense to the omitted property in blocks 14 or 17 would have been palpably unjust and illegal. The owners of the lots not assessed received no benefit from the extension of the sewer; and, as has been said, "only those whose property is specially benefited by the improvement can be compelled to pay such taxes. Special taxes to pay for sewers and drains can be levied only upon the property of persons who can use such sewers and drains, and not upon persons who cannot use them; and the taxes should be apportioned in accordance with the special benefits received by each individual severally." Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 167, 5 Pac. Rep. 781. Even property that may be within the exterior lines or boundaries of what may be called a "district," but which does not abut on the sewer, or, from the topography of the ground or other cause, cannot be drained or specially benefited by the sewer, cannot be specially assessed or taxed for its construction. It is not required, nor is it necessary, that the boundaries of a sewer district shall be defined by an ordinance; and indeed the statute contemplates that sewers may be constructed by district or otherwise. Gen. St. 1889, par. 563. When a sewer system is adopted and is being built by districts, it is then important that the records shall show the territory or property assessed for any part of the sewer which is constructed, so that it shall not be again assessed for a sewer in another portion of the city. When property has paid its full proportion for a sewer in a certain territory or district, it cannot be transferred to another district, nor held liable for the construction of sewerage facilities in another district of the city. So far as the sewer in controversy is concerned, the public records sufficiently show the extent of the district, as well as the property benefited and assessed for the sewer; and no dispute can arise in the future in this regard. Under an ordinance adopted in 1888, the city of Atchison was authorized to and did enter into a contract with certain engineers to furnish the city with plans and specifications for a complete sewer system. In pursuance of this contract, maps, plans, and specifications were duly prepared and furnished, which were paid for by the city. The system thus provided was adopted by the city, and the Fourth-Street sewer was made a separate one, under the plans and system provided. These plans and specifications, together with the map made and furnished by the city engineer, and the assessment which has been made, sufficiently indicate the existence of the district and the property taxed to fully protect the tax-payers from a second assessment for the same purpose. The further fact referred to by counsel, that a short section of the sewer was formerly built at the expense of the city, is no objection to the validity of the assessment made in this case.

We might stop here, as the other points were decided against the defendants in error, and they have taken no steps to obtain a review of such rulings. It will not be improper, however, to briefly notice other of the objections to the assessment urged in the district court, and somewhat discussed here. Some of the defendants in error had constructed private sewers or drains at their own expense, and they now claim that they should not be taxed for the sewer built by the city. While one of these drains was quite expensive, it is not found or stated that any of them were authorized or adopted by the city as a part of the sewer system, nor that they are suitable or adequate for the purposes intended. The legislature has conferred upon the city authorities the discretion and power to provide sewerage facilities, and for that purpose has given them control of the streets and alleys where the sewers are built. They are to determine the necessity for sewers, as well as the character and capacity of those that are required to be built. To allow property owners to decide for themselves whether their lots needed sewerage facilities, or to permit them to provide private ditches, drains, sewers, or cess-pools as they might determine to be sufficient, would be wholly impracticable, and would prevent the adoption of a general sewerage system under the control of the city, as the statutes evidently contemplate. The property of those who had built private sewers adjoined upon the new sewer; and we think the district court ruled correctly in holding their property liable to contribute towards the construction of the sewer.

Another objection to the assessment was that the east half of lot 14, in block 13, was assessed, although the whole of the same was not owned by one person. It is stated that Amelia J. Otis owned the south 90 feet, while her husband, A. G. Otis, owned the north 60 feet, of the half lot; and it is said that she cannot avail herself of the benefits of the sewer except by passing over the property of her husband. In addition to the fact that the question was not properly brought here, a sufficient answer to this objection is that there is no recorded plat showing any subdivision of this lot, or that the frontage of the same had been changed; and it does not appear that any of the public records showed that the title to the lot was in more than one person at the time the proceedings were taken and the assessment made.

A remonstrance of a large number of the property owners was filed with the city council before the letting of the contract for this sewer, and, under the provisions of paragraph 558 of the General Statutes of 1889, it is suggested that this is a ground of objection to the assessment. The provisions of this statute apply only to paving and macadamizing a street, and the making of assessments therefor, and is not applicable to the building of sewers. We find no statute authorizing the filing or considering of such a remonstrance where sewers are about to be built. Neither the preliminary proceedings, nor the mode for the apportionment of such taxes, are fully prescribed by the statute. The council is therefore left to adopt such proceedings and mode of apportionment as will be fair and equitable. An examination of the proceedings which have been set out at length in the statement of facts leads us to agree with the conclusion of the court that the proceedings were fair, and in substantial compliance with law. The city council first adopted a resolution that the construction of the sewer was necessary, and this resolution was published. Under the direction of the city council, the city clerk advertised for bids for the construction of the work, and the city engineer prepared plans, specifications, and estimates of the work, which were filed in the office of the city clerk. Bids were received, and one made by Shaw & Downing was accepted, and the contract awarded to them. The compensation for the work was to be paid by the city in cash or bonds, at the option of the city; and, in pursuance of an ordinance duly enacted, the mayor and council entered into a contract with Shaw & Downing for the construction of the sewer. The estimate of the cost of the sewer, made by the city engineer, was $13,047.28, while the contract price was $11,500. In pursuance of a resolution, appraisers were appointed to make an assessment of all lots and pieces of ground liable to assessment, without regard to buildings and improvements thereon, and after their appointment and qualification they proceeded to the discharge of their duties, and made a report in writing of their appraisal. This report was subsequently amended and corrected. Thereafter, and upon due notice, a board of equalization met to hear any complaints which might be made of the appraisal, and all the property owners were given a fair opportunity to test the fairness and validity of the valuation and assessment that were made. Quite a number of the property owners appeared and presented objections, but these were mainly disallowed; and the report of the appraisers, with one correction, was adopted. The contractors commenced the construction of the sewer, and prosecuted the work without delay, under the supervision of an inspector appointed by the city, in connection with the city engineer, and the work was completed about December 2, 1889, at a total cost of $11,516.41. All of the complaining parties knew that the sewer was being constructed, and quite a number of them connected with the sewer during its construction, and since, and are now using the same, and these legal proceedings were not begun by any of them until after the completion of the work and its acceptance by the city. It thus appears that, before the tax was made a permanent charge upon the property, the owners had full notice of the proceedings, and had an opportunity to contest the validity and the fairness of the valuations and assessments that were made.

An objection was also made that the cost of the construction of the sewer, and the assessments made to pay the same, included an item for the expense of engineering and superintending the construction of the sewer. The entire expense of such an improvement is to be charged to the property peculiarly benefited, and the engineering and supervision of the work are as essential as the excavations to be made, and we see no reason why the expense of the same should not be included in the assessment. Gen. St. 1889, par. 563; In re Lowden, 89 N. Y. 548; City of St. Paul v. Mullen, 27 Minn. 78, 6 N. W. Rep. 424; In re Tappan, 36 How. Pr. 390; State v. Council of Elizabeth, 30 N. J. Law, 365.

The validity of the tax proceedings was assailed upon the ground that there were no funds in the treasury at the time with which to pay for the improvements, and that no ordinance had been enacted setting aside in the city treasury the money to pay therefor; and reference is made to the fortieth subdivision of paragraph 555, Gen. St. 1889, and also to section 3, c. 34, Laws 1883. The provisions of the statute cited, however, are not controlling. Whatever might be the rule where the improvements are to be made by a general tax levy, it is clear that the legislature has provided specifically for the construction of improvements at the expense of the abutting property, and to pay the costs thereof by installments, and that for such installments they may issue improvement bonds of the city, to run not more than 10 years, nor to bear interest exceeding 7 per cent. per annum. These bonds may be issued to the contractor in payment of the improvement, and provision is made for the levying of special assessments upon the property specially benefited for the redemption of such bonds. This is a later act of the legislature, and is framed upon the theory that the work shall be done upon credit, and when there is no money provided or set apart for the payment of the same. Laws 1887, c. 101.

There are no other objections which we deem it necessary to notice. From an examination of the record, we are satisfied that the tax proceedings are in substantial compliance with law, and should be sustained, and that the injunctions prayed for should be denied. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiffs in error. All the justices concurring.

ARKANSAS VAL. AGR. SOC. et al. v. EICHHOLTZ.

CORPORATIONS—ISSUE OF STOCK—FRAUD BY DIRECTORS.

Where a corporation has been organized with a capital stock of $5,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $5 each, and 590 shares of said stock were subscribed, but no notice was ever given and published where books of subscription would be open; and the corporation continued in existence some seven years, and became possessed of valuable real estate, and afterwards sold the same, and after such sale, the officers and directors of the corporation, without the knowledge or consent of the other stockholders, issued to themselves the remaining stock at par value, and then declared a dividend upon the entire stock issued, of $25 per share, held, that such action was without authority, and in fraud of the rights of the other stockholders, and a plain breach of duty upon the part of the officers of such corporation.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Sluss & Stanley, for plaintiff in error. Dale & Wall, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. The Arkansas Valley Agricultural Society was incorporated on the 5th day of June, 1880, with a capital stock of $5,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $5 each, and had its place of business at Wichita, in Sedgwick county. The corporation had for its object the encouragement and advancement of agriculture and horticulture, and the mechanic arts. The full amount of the stock was not subscribed, and no notice was ever given of the opening of books to receive subscriptions, as required by section 16 of the act concerning private corporations. It seems that up to March 19, 1887, 590 shares of the stock of this society had actually been issued, and on and after that date the remaining 410 shares were issued by the authority of a majority of the directors to the directors and officers of the association, without the knowledge or consent of the balance of the stockholders. It is claimed that, at the time of the issuance of the last stock, all the property of the corporation had been sold, which had consisted of 36 acres of land on the west side of Wichita, and known as the "Fair Grounds," and the proceeds were then in the hands of the directors and officers of this association; that the shares were worth, about this time, including the entire issue of stock, $55 per share, and not including the 410 shares, about $93 a share; that the directors and officers knew at the time they took and paid for said stock at the par value of $5 per share, the exact value of the stock of the society and the property it then held; that, after all the shares had been issued, a dividend was declared on the 1,000 shares of $25 per share; and that the total assets of the corporation were about $56,900. On the 26th day of April, 1887, the defendant in error, one of the stockholders of the society, commenced this action in the district court of Sedgwick county to enjoin the directors and officers from paying any dividend or dividends on the stock claimed to have been fraudulently issued, and that the same might be canceled, and for further equitable relief in the premises. Upon the filing of his petition, a temporary injunction was allowed, which was made perpetual upon a final hearing by the court below. The plaintiffs in error bring this case here, and claim that the taking of the stock in a corporation stands upon a different footing than ordinary contracts of corporations, in prosecuting the business enterprises for which they are organized. That any person has a right to subscribe for stock in any corporation, so long as there are shares to be taken. That the corporation has no power to prescribe the character, or qualification of its stockholders. That the policy of the law, as declared by the express terms of the statute, is to make corporations open to all persons alike to become members and stockholders. That the only favor given by the law is the advantage resulting from diligence, the idea being, the first to come is first to be served; that is, the first man who subscribes may subscribe for all he wants, and the last man to subscribe may subscribe for all he can get. This rule, as applied to the directors or officers of a corporation, cannot be upheld. The principle of public policy forbids transactions of this kind. It appears from the evidence that the property owned by this corporation had been sold, and the proceeds held by its officers. The assets at the time of the sale belonged to the then stockholders, and the directors and officers had no right to subscribe for the remaining stock at par, and enrich themselves to the detriment and loss of the other shareholders. The directors cannot lawfully benefit or favor any particular shareholder, or class of shareholders. Every authority possessed by them is a power and discretion in the directors, who are trustees, for the benefit of all the shareholders alike, which is to be exercised for the benefit of all of them. 1 Wat. Corp. p. 620; Harris v. Railroad Co., 20 Beav. 384. The effort on the part of the directors and officers of a society to obtain the unsubscribed stock at par, when they know that each share of the stock already issued was worth 18 times its face value, was clearly a fraud upon the rights of the other stockholders, and a flagrant violation of their duties as directors and officers of such association. The officers and directors of a corporation are trustees of the stockholders, and, in securing to themselves an advantage not common to all the stockholders, they commit a plain breach of duty. Koehler v. Iron Co., 2 Black. 715; Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446; 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 518. The law does not permit directors to manage the affairs of a corporation for their personal and private advantage, and this rule, we think, applies to the disposition of unsubscribed stock, as well as to other contracts. The character and relation of directors and officers of a corporation require of them the highest and most scrupulous good faith in their transactions for the corporation and the stockholders. Hale v. Bridge Co., 8 Kan. 466, and authorities there cited; Ryan v. Railway Co., 21 Kan. 365; Hentig v. Sweet, 33 Kan. 244, 6 Pac. Rep. 259. The judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL BY STATE—JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL.

In a criminal prosecution, where a jury has been impaneled and some evidence has been introduced upon the part of the state, and the state rests, and afterwards asks leave of the court to introduce further evidence, and the court, without passing upon the application, concludes that the statute under which the defendant is prosecuted is unconstitutional, and orders a judgment of acquittal and discharges the jury, such judgment is conclusive, and this court cannot, on appeal by the state, set aside or reverse the judgment of acquittal.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Grant county; THEO. BORKIN, Judge.

L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and Wm. E. Hutchison, for the State. F. M. Thompson, for appellee.

GREEN, C. The defendant in this case was charged with unlawfully permitting 90 head of cattle, under his control, to run at large in Grant county, in violation of chapter 128 of the Session Laws of 1874, as adopted by the board of county commissioners. A trial was had before a justice of the peace, and the defendant found guilty, and fined in the sum of $50, and he appealed to the district court. At the April term, 1890, of the district court, a jury was impaneled and sworn to try the defendant, when counsel objected to the introduction of any evidence, because the section of the statute under which defendant was prosecuted was unconstitutional. The court, in the first instance, overruled this objection, and a number of witnesses were then called and testified in behalf of the state, and the state rested. The defendant, by his counsel, then asked the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, for the reason that the complaint did not charge a public offense, and that the evidence offered by the state failed to prove a crime against the defendant. Pending this motion, the state asked leave of the court to introduce other evidence, and in passing upon this application the court held that section 2 of chapter 128 of the Session Laws of 1874 was unconstitutional, because it was in conflict with sections 16 and 17, art. 2, of the constitution, and thereupon ordered a judgment of acquittal to be entered for the defendant, and discharged the jury.

The state excepted to the ruling of the court, and appealed. We must dispose of the case without passing upon the validity of the law under which the defendant was prosecuted, for the reason that the state cannot appeal where the defendant has been tried and acquitted. This court has no authority to set aside such a judgment. The decisions of this court in State v. Carmichael, 3 Kan. 102, City of Olathe v. Adams, 15 Kan. 391, and State v. Crosby, 17 Kan. 396, are decisive of this case. We recommend that the appeal be dismissed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS—PROSECUTION OF REGISTERING OFFICER—INTENT.

1. That portion of section 15 of chapter 80 of the Laws of 1879 which prescribes a criminal punishment for improperly registering the names of voters is not unconstitutional or void.

2. A criminal information setting forth that B., the city clerk of a city of the second class, registered the name of a person as a voter who did not appear in person, and was not present, and did not give his name, age, occupation, or place of residence, may be sufficient, without expressly alleging any criminal intent.

3. When the commission of an act is made a crime by statute, without any express reference to any intent, then the only criminal intent necessarily involved in the commission of the offense is the intent to commit the interdicted act, and in such a case it is not necessary to formally or expressly allege such intent, or any intent, but simply to allege the commission of the act, and the intent will be presumed.

Appeal from district court, Butler county; C. A. LELAND, Judge.

L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and E. H. Hutchins, for the State. Clogston, Hamilton, Fuller & Cubbison and E. N. Smith, for appellee.

VALENTINE, J. This was a criminal prosecution in the district court of Butler county, under section 15, c. 80, Laws 1879, (Gen. St. 1889, par. 711,) in which prosecution the defendant, W. O. Bush, who was the city clerk of the city of El Dorado, a city of the second class, was charged, upon information in two counts, with registering J. N. Hanna as a voter, Hanna not being present, nor appearing in person, nor giving his name, age, occupation, or place of residence. The title to the act in which the aforesaid section 15 is found, and sections 8 and 15 of such act, read as follows: "An act to provide for and to regulate the registration of voters in cities of the first and second class, and to repeal all prior acts in relation thereto." "Sec. 8. No person shall be registered unless he appear in person before the city clerk, at the city clerk's office, during usual office hours, and apply to be registered, and give his name, age, occupation, and particular place of residence, as required to make the proper entries in the poll-books." "Sec. 15. If any officer shall neglect or refuse to perform any duty required by this act, or in the manner required by this act, or shall neglect or refuse to enter upon the performance of any such duty, or shall enter, or cause or permit to be entered, on the registry books, the name of any person in any other manner, or at any other time than as prescribed by this act, or shall enter, or cause or permit to be entered, on such list, the name of any person not entitled to be registered thereon, according to the provisions of this act, or shall destroy, secrete, mutilate, alter, or change any such registry books, he shall, upon conviction, be punished by confinement and hard labor in the penitentiary, not exceeding one year, and shall forfeit any office he may then hold." The portions of the foregoing sections particularly applicable to this case are those which read as follows: "No person shall be registered, unless he appear in person before the city clerk, at the city clerk's office, during usual office hours, and apply to be registered, and give his name, age, occupation, and particular place of residence."

"If any officer [a city clerk] shall enter, or cause or permit to be entered, on the registry books, the name of any person in any other manner, or at any other time, than as prescribed by this act, * * * he shall, upon conviction, be punished," etc. The defendant moved the court to quash the information, upon the following grounds, to-wit: "First, that the act of the legislature of the state of Kansas, under which said information is pretended to be drawn, to-wit, chapter 80 of the Session Laws of 1879, is unconstitutional, being in contravention of section 16 of article 2 of the constitution of the state of Kansas; second, that no offense is charged against the defendant in said information; third, that neither of the counts of said information states and charges an offense against the laws of the state of Kansas." The court sustained the motion, and discharged the defendant, and the state of Kansas appeals to this court. No brief for the defendant has been filed in this court, but, from the plaintiff's brief, and the defendant's motion to quash, we can probably obtain a correct understanding as to what were the grounds upon which the court below quashed the information. It is claimed, as we understand, that the title to the act is not broad enough to authorize a provision in the body of the act creating a criminal offense, or prescribing a punishment therefor. We think it is. State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 213, and cases there cited; Durcin v. Pontious, 34 Kan. 353, 8 Pac. Rep. 428. The offense in the present case, and the punishment therefor, have relation to the general subject contained in the title to the act, which is the registration of voters in certain cities, and such offense and punishment are included within such subject, within the meaning of the constitution. They clearly relate to the registration of voters.

It is further claimed, as we understand, that the information is defective, for the reason that it does not allege any criminal intent on the part of the defendant. Of course, a crime cannot be committed unless the person committing the acts supposed to constitute the crime entertains a criminal intent, and that criminal intent must, in some manner, be averred in the information or indictment, either expressly or impliedly. But when the commission of an act is made a crime by statute, without any express reference to any intent, then the only criminal intent necessarily involved in the commission of the offense is the intent to commit the interdicted act, and in such a case it is not necessary to formally or expressly allege such intent, or any intent, but simply to allege the commission of the act, and the intent will be presumed. In the present case, the wrong committed was the registration of the name of J. N. Hanna as a voter, without his appearing in person, or being present, and without his giving his name, age, occupation, or place of residence. In such a case, all that is necessary is simply to allege the fact that the defendant so registered the name of Hanna, without also stating that he so registered such name with the intent to so register the same. It is alleged in the information that the defendant "unlawfully and feloniously" so registered the same. Mr. Bishop, in his work on Criminal Procedure, (volume 1, § 521,) uses the following language: "Starkie says: 'To render a party criminally responsible, a vicious will must concur with the wrongful act. But, though it be universally true that a man cannot become a criminal unless his mind be in fault, it is not so general a rule that the guilty intention must be averred upon the face of the indictment.' For, in a large part of the crimes, the vicious will appears, prima facie, in the act itself; hence to allege simply the act makes the required prima facie case, and any non-concurrence of the will therein is matter of defense." And, in note 2 to the same section, he uses the following language: "Where the act is in itself unlawful, an evil intent will be presumed, and need not be averred, and, if averred, is a mere formal allegation, which need not be proved by extrinsic evidence." In the American and English Encyclopedia of Law (volume 4, p. 681) the following language is used: "Where the statute contains nothing requiring acts to be done knowingly, and the acts done are not malum in se, nor infamous, but are merely prohibited, the offender is bound to know the law, and a criminal intent need not be proved."

* * * The intent is immaterial where the statute declares it a misdemeanor to obstruct a public road. When the statute does not make intent an element of the crime, intent need not be alleged, although, under general principles, it must be proved; and it is held that one who does that which the law forbids is presumed to have had the criminal intent." In the present case, we think, the criminal intent was impliedly and sufficiently alleged by the allegations setting forth and averring the commission of the prohibited acts. The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings. All the justices concurring.

STATE V. GRIFFITH.(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 10, 1891.)EMBEZZLEMENT BY BAILEE—INFORMATION.

An information under section 90 of the crimes act against a bailee must set forth the character of the bailment, and the purpose for which the defendant was intrusted with the property. A charge that the defendant embezzled certain property of another which had been, prior thereto, delivered to defendant as bailee, without alleging from whom the property was received or the purpose for which it was delivered to him, will be held fatally defective on a motion to quash.

Appeal from district court, Finney county; A. J. ARBOTT, Judge.

L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., H. F. Mason, and Brown, Blerer & Cotteral, for the State. J. T. Whitelaw and Hopkins & Hoskinson, for appellant.

JOHNSTON, J. T. E. Griffith was convicted under section 90 of the crimes act of embezzling a certain inventory of household goods and furniture. The information on which he was convicted alleged that "on the 22d day of August, A. D. 1889, in Finney county, and state of Kansas, one T. E. Griffith did then and there unlawfully and feloniously embezzle and convert to his own use, and did then and there unlawfully make way with and secrete, with intent to embezzle and convert to his own use, the following property of one Simpson W. Day, then and there being, which property had been prior thereto delivered to him, the said T. E. Griffith, as bailee, said property being an inventory of household goods and kitchen furniture." After giving a copy of the inventory, it is alleged that it was of special value to Day, and the reasons therefor are set out. The money value of the property is alleged to be $100. Nothing is stated in the information as to the character or circumstances of the bailment, why or by whom it was delivered to the defendant, or anything indicating the special purpose for which it was placed in his hands, or the conditions upon which he was expected to hold, dispose of, or return it. The sufficiency of the information in this respect was raised early in the prosecution by a motion to quash, but the motion was overruled. The charge against the defendant should have stated the principal facts and circumstances constituting the bailment, and the acts of the defendant that were inconsistent with the trust confided to him. It is necessary at the trial that proof of these facts should be made, and the information should contain the essential facts to be proved, and whatever is necessary to put the defendant on notice of that with which he is charged, and of which he is to be convicted. The mere allegation that he was a bailee is too general and indefinite, and does not fairly inform the defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation made against him. The information should state who placed the property in the hands of the defendant, the purpose or use to which it was to be applied, and the time within which this purpose was to be carried out, or the time within which the property was to be returned. The details need not be set out with unnecessary particularity, but the defendant should, so far as is reasonably practicable, be informed by the information of the precise nature of the charge made against him. Was the inventory given to him for safe-keeping for a stated period, and had that time elapsed before he actually returned it? Was it given to him to accomplish a purpose of his own, or to accomplish some purpose of Day's, and was the purpose effected when the prosecution was begun? Was it intrusted to him to deliver to another upon the happening of a certain contingency? And has that contingency happened? Was it given to him in pursuance of some agreement for his own or Day's use? And, if so, is he not entitled to know what the agreement was, and wherein he has violated it? Bailments are so numerous and various in their character that one charged with a violation of his contract and his trust, and of a misapplication and embezzlement of property, should be informed of the object of the trust as claimed by the prosecution, and wherein he has failed to conform to that object. In the present case, the charge does not even state the name of the person from whom the inventory was received. It has generally been held under similar statutes that the indictment or information should not merely state the bailment or trust, but should aver the facts and circumstances which made the case embezzlement; and it is also necessary to state the purpose for which the defendant was intrusted with the property. People v. Cohen, 8 Cal. 42; People v. Poggi, 19 Cal. 600; People v. Peterson, 9 Cal. 313; Com. v. Smart, 6 Gray, 15; State v. Grisham, 90 Mo. 163, 2 S. W. Rep. 223; Gaddy v. State, 8 Tex. App. 127; State v. Mims, 26 Minn. 191, 2 N. W. Rep. 492; Whart. Crim. Law, § 1061. One author doubts the necessity of alleging the character of the bailment, but he cites no contrary decisions. Bish. St. Crimes, § 422. We think the information was fatally defective, and hence the judgment of the district court must be reversed, and a new trial granted.

HORTON, C. J., concurs.

VALENTINE, J. With grave doubts, I concur. The defendant was prosecuted upon an information which was not filed until after he had had a preliminary examination. In addition to Bish. St. Crimes, § 422. See, also, 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 498c, which cites People v. Hill, 3 Utah. 334, 3 Pac. Rep. 75.

KNOX et al. v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY OF INDEPENDENCE et al.

CITY SCHOOLS — SEPARATION OF WHITE AND COLORED.

1. Until the legislature clearly confers power upon boards of education of cities of the second class to establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children, no such power exists.

2. The legislature of the state has not given, or attempted to give, to the boards of education of cities of the second class, the power to establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children, or to exclude from the schools established for white children the colored children for no other reason than that they are colored, or of African descent. Board of Education v. Tinnon, 26 Kan. 1.

This is an action on mandamus, commenced in this court on October 8, 1890, by Bertha Knox and Lilly Knox, both colored, by their next friend, Jordan Knox, to compel the board of education of the city of Independence and S. M. Nees, superintendent of the public schools of that city, to permit the plaintiffs to attend the school-rooms of the public schools of that city, to which they allege they are entitled, according to their grade, regardless of, and without any distinction of, their race or color. After the return or answer was filed to the alternative writ, the case was submitted upon the following agreed statement of facts: "That the city of Independence, Kan., is a city of the second class; that G. L. Remington, J. M. Nevins, J. H. Spencer, Goodell Foster, H. P. Wiltzie, E. A. Hamilton, A. B. Wiltzie, M. Westbrook, E. B. White, H. L. Payne, W. Stephenson, and W. R. Brown are the duly-elected and acting members of the board of education of said city, and that S. M. Nees is the duly-elected and acting superintendent of the city schools of said city; that in said city there are four school buildings, to-wit, First ward school building, Second ward school building, Fourth ward school building, and Fifth ward school building; that there are employed by the school board, besides the superintendent, nineteen (19) teachers, and that the number of pupils enrolled is about eleven hundred; that both white children and colored children of scholastic age reside in each of the five wards of said city; that the said plaintiffs, Bertha Knox and Lilly Knox, colored children, are residents of the Second ward of said city, and are, respectively, ten years and eight years of age, and that they are of scholastic age; that they reside 130 yards from the Second ward school building of said city, and 2,300 yards from the Fourth ward school building in said city; that in attending school at the Fourth ward school building they are required to pass by or near the Second ward school building; that Bertha Knox belongs to the second primary grade, and that Lilly Knox belongs to the first primary grade, and that said grades are taught in the Second ward school building of said city; that the room in the Second ward building known as the 'Second Primary' is taught by Miss Belle Bates, and that in said room there are thirty-five desks with a seating capacity of seventy; that the enrollment in said room on September 15, 1890, was as follows: Twenty-two in one class, and eighteen in another,—and that on October 10, 1890, the enrollment was twenty-nine in one class, and twenty-two in the other, or a total of fifty-one; that the room in said Second ward building known as the 'First Primary' is taught by Miss Bertha Canary, and in said room there are thirty-five desks, with a seating capacity of seventy; that the enrollment in said room on September 15, 1890, was as follows: A class, 11; B class, 14; C class, 9,—total, 34; on October 10, 1890, the enrollment in said room was as follows: A class, 15; B class, 18; and C class, 20,—total, 53; that on September 15, 1890, the said plaintiffs, with their father and next friend, Jordan Knox, applied to the respective teachers, as aforesaid, at the Second ward school building, and asked to be admitted to said Second ward school building, and into the grades as follows, to-wit: Bertha Knox asked to be admitted to the second primary, and Lilly Knox asked to be admitted to the first primary,—and that plaintiffs were referred by the respective teachers of said two grades to the superintendent, Mr. S. M. Nees; that thereafter, and upon the same day, the said plaintiffs, with their said father and next friend, Jordan Knox, applied to the said superintendent, Mr. S. M. Nees, and asked to be assigned to the first and second primary grades at the Second ward school building in said city; that the said superintendent, Mr. S. M. Nees, assigned said plaintiffs to a room in the Fourth ward school building, where said first and second primary grades are taught, and where the said board of education had made convenient, suitable, and sufficient provision for said plaintiffs, and each of them, at said designated room; that said room in which said first and second primary grades are taught, as aforesaid, at said Fourth ward school building, as aforesaid, is taught by Mrs. Clara McCord, a competent and well-qualified teacher, and that said room is furnished in the same manner, and just as well, and is just as comfortable, as any other room in said Fourth ward building; or as any room in the First, Second, or Fifth ward school buildings; that other children, both colored and white, who live in the Second ward and in the Fifth ward of said city, and who live near where said plaintiffs reside, and who live just as far from the Fourth ward school building as do said plaintiffs, are required and compelled to attend school at the Fourth ward school building, notwithstanding the fact that the grades to which they belong are taught at the Second ward school building and at the Fifth ward school building, but that there are no white children who belong to the same grade that plaintiffs do, who now live in said Second ward, who are sent, at the present time, outside of said Second ward; that all of the colored children of the said city who belong to the primary and intermediate grades are assigned to the room in the Fourth ward school building, which is taught by Mrs. Clara McCord, and are required to attend there, but that whenever they are capable of passing the examination (the usual and customary examination required by the board of education for those who are to be advanced) they are advanced from said grades, and are assigned to the 'grammar school,' which is in the First ward building, and whenever the said aforesaid children are competent, and can pass the usual and customary examination, they are advanced from the grammar school to the high school, which latter is also in the First ward school building; that the said grammar school and the said high school are attended by both white and colored children whenever they are sufficiently advanced; that if the enrollment in said aforesaid room, taught by Mrs. Clara McCord, is fifty pupils or over, the said board of education, in that event, have authorized and instructed the said superintendent, Mr. S. M. Nees, to employ another and an additional competent teacher for said aforesaid grades taught in said room; that said plaintiffs object to attend said Fourth ward school building, and ask to be assigned to said Second ward school building; that about ten years ago a number of the colored people of the said city requested that their children be permitted to attend school at a certain designated building in said city, to-wit, the Fourth ward school building, as a matter of convenience, and that certain designated rooms in said building be assigned for their use, which request was granted by the school board, as far as the grades, to-wit, the first and second primary, were concerned, but that the said Jordan Knox did not join in said request; that in the fall of 1887 the majority of the colored people of said city, and also this said plaintiff, Jordan Knox, petitioned the board of education of said city to employ one Mr. E. M. Wood, a colored man, to teach said grades taught at said room in said Fourth ward school building aforesaid, which said petition was granted by said board, and said Wood was employed; that neither the said plaintiffs nor their said father, Jordan Knox, at any time made any objection to the order of said board of education to said board as aforesaid, but that at a regular meeting of the board in July, 1890, said Jordan Knox appeared and informed the said board that he desired his children to go to the Second ward school building."

W. A. Price and A. M. Thomas, for plaintiffs. W. E. Zeigler, for defendant.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The question presented in this case is whether the facts agreed to bring it within the decision of Board of Education v. Tinnon, 26 Kan. 1. The city of Independence, like the city of Ottawa, is a city of the second class, and our attention has not been called to any section of the statute changing the control and regulation of the public schools of cities of this class since the affirmance of the judgment in the Tinnon Case. The agreed statement of facts showed that Bertha Knox and Lilly Knox, who are colored children, and, respectively, 8 and 10 years of age, reside in the Second ward of the city of Independence, 130 yards from the Second ward public school building, but are compelled to attend the Fourth ward school, 2,300 yards from their home. In attending school in the Fourth ward, they are required to pass near the Second ward school building. Bertha Knox belongs to the second primary grade, and Lilly Knox to the first primary grade.

At the time these children demanded admission to the Second ward school, neither the second primary room nor the first primary room were filled. There was room for the plaintiffs. No white children belonging to the same grade that plaintiffs do, living in the Second ward, are required by the board of education or the superintendent of the public schools to attend the Fourth ward school building, or to go to school outside of the Second ward; but all of the colored children of the city who belong to the primary and intermediate grades are required by the board of education to attend school in the Fourth ward, taught by Mrs. Clara McCord. The grammar school and high school of the city are open to both the white and colored children whenever they are sufficiently advanced. These facts are sufficient to show that plaintiffs are excluded on account of their color or race from the public school of the Second ward, where white children of the same age and grade are permitted to attend. The case of Board of Education v. Tinnon, supra, therefore applies. The plaintiffs attended the Fourth ward school, taught by Mrs. Clara McCord, not from choice of themselves or their parents, but under compulsion of the board of education. The boards of education of cities of the second class have no more right to have separate schools for white and colored children of the first and second primary grades than they have to establish separate grammar and high schools for white and colored children. In Independence, the grammar and high schools are free to all, white and colored alike, but not so with the schools of the first and second primary grades. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to the writ demanded. It was said in the Tinnon Case "that, unless the legislature has clearly conferred power upon the school boards to establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children, no such power has been conferred. Under a statute which reads, 'In each subdistrict there shall be taught one or more schools for the education of youth between the ages of five and twenty-one years,' the supreme court of Iowa held that the school board could not establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children, and could not exclude colored children from attending schools established for the white children alone. It was further said in that case that 'the legislature of this state has not given, or attempted to give, to the boards of education of cities of the second class, the power to establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children, and to exclude from the schools established for white children all colored children for no other reason than that they are colored children. * * * If the board has the power, because of race, to establish separate schools for children of African descent, then the board has the power to establish separate schools for persons of Irish descent or German descent; and if it has the power, because of color, to establish separate schools for black children, then it has the power to establish separate schools for red-headed children and blondes. We do not think that the board has any such power. We have conceded, for the purpose of this case, that the legislature has the authority to confer such power upon school boards, but in our opinion the legislature has not exercised, or attempted to exercise, any such authority." A peremptory writ will be granted as prayed for, and the plaintiffs will recover their costs.

NOVATION—RIGHT TO SET-OFF.

1. In a contract between two parties involving mutual agreements, and for the sale of property, in which the first party made a promise to the second for the benefit of a third person, such third person may maintain an action against the first on the promise; but, if he avails himself of the contract, and claims under its provisions, he will be affected by the equities growing out of the contract between the first and second parties, and a failure of consideration will be a good defense in an action by the third party upon such contract.

2. In such an action, where a personal judgment is sought against the first party, and where the third party is indebted to the first, such indebtedness is a proper subject of set-off, and the two demands must be deemed compensated, so far as they equal each other.

Error from district court, Washington county; E. HUTCHINSON, Judge.

James G. Woodrum brought this action in the district court of Washington county against Clay, Robinson & Co., George S. Elwood, and the Washington National Bank. He alleged in his petition, that in 1887 he was the owner of 360 head of two and three year old steers, kept by him in Washington county, and which were in perfect health until July 1, 1887; that on or about April 2d, George S. Elwood drove into the county of Washington a large number of cattle which were capable of communicating, and liable to impart, Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever; that George S. Elwood drove these cattle through the highways and unclosed pastures, knowing that the cattle were from the prohibited district, south of Kansas, and liable to communicate fever to others; that Woodrum's cattle contracted the fever, and that 166 of them sickened and died; that 93 of these were yearlings, 63 two-year-olds, and 10 three-year-olds; that the yearlings which died were worth \$19 per head, in all the sum of \$1,767; that the two-year-olds were worth \$27 per head, in all the sum of \$1,701; that the three-year-olds were worth \$32 per head, in all the sum of \$320; and that the surviving portion of the herd—194 head—were damaged in the sum of \$970; that the plaintiff was compelled to expend money for medicines and extra labor in taking care of the cattle, in the sum of \$200. He alleged that the total damages sustained by reason of this disease being imparted to his cattle, was \$4,598. He then alleged, in substance, that on September 10, 1887, Clay, Robinson & Co. entered into a written contract with George S. Elwood, by which Elwood sold to them the herd of cattle which communicated the fever, together with a large amount of other property, for certain considerations, and, by the terms of the contract, Clay, Robinson & Co. assumed and agreed to pay Woodrum all damages sustained by reason of his cattle dying or being injured from having contracted the fever. The following is a copy of the contract: "Article of agreement between Geo. S. Elwood, of Washington Co., Ks., and Clay, Robinson & Co., of Chicago, Ill., witnesseth: That said Geo. S. Elwood hereby agrees to sell, and does sell to Clay, Robinson & Co. the following property, viz.: 560 head of cattle, more or less, being all the cattle on Rock Hill ranch belonging to said Elwood or Elwood and Morehead; also all the cattle, being 260 head, more or less, now on Tootle's pasture near Greenleaf; also 500 head of cattle in the Indian Territory in the vicinity of Arkansas City in the McCormick, Brown & Co. pasture; said three bunches of cattle to aggregate 1,320 head; also 2,200 head of sheep and lambs, to be delivered within 20 days from September 12, 1887, on section 23, in Logan township, in Washington Co.; also 100 head of horses to be delivered on section 19-4-4, Washington Co., Ks., said horses to be of the following description: 1 Clydesdale stallion, 1 sorrel stallion, between 50 and 60 brood mares, 1 pair of broken work mares, 20 colts, part Clyde, balance yearlings and two-year-olds, said horses having been kept on said section heretofore. Also said Elwood agrees to convey, this Sept. 10, 1887, or Sept. 12, 1887, or cause to be conveyed, to said Clay, Robinson & Co. the following real estate, viz.: W.  $\frac{1}{2}$  & N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , & S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  and N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , 28-3-4, (to be deeded by Sept. 17, 1887,) 160 acres, mortgaged for \$2,300, & int.; S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  & N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  23-4-4, 160 acres, mortgaged for \$2,000, & int.; N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  10-5-4, 160 acres, mortgaged for \$2,000 & int.; N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  sec. 5-5-4, 320 acres, mortgaged for \$4,700; 11 lots and 1-acre tract in the city of Greenleaf, mortgaged for \$1,500; north half of 2 lots on corner of Commercial street, in Lavan's add., to Greenleaf, mortgaged for \$1,000—immediate possession of all said real estate to be given Clay, Robinson & Co. None of said mortgages or any incumbrances are to be assumed by said Clay, Robinson & Co. Also said Elwood hereby sells and conveys to said Clay, Robinson & Co. all the feed belonging to him on the above-described land. Also said Elwood agrees to turn said cattle over to said Clay, Robinson & Co. at once, and said Elwood further agrees to pay all claims against said cattle for losses by reason of Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever having been communicated by said cattle, except losses sustained by Woodrum & Boyles, or in the Woodrum & Boyles pasture. The said Geo. S. Elwood further agrees to give a satisfactory bond in the sum of \$15,000.00, to be approved by said Clay, Robinson & Co., or their attorney or agent, that he will deliver said sheep and horses, above mentioned, at the time and place designated, and that he will pay said losses sustained on account of the Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever, as above specified, said losses to be paid on or before Dec. 1st, 1887. Said Clay, Robinson & Co. agree, when said bond is given and the Rock Hill ranch cattle and the cattle in Tootle pasture are turned over to them, to deliver to said Elwood \$16,000.00, in the notes of said Elwood & Morehouse, or Elwood, Morehouse & Porter; and, when said land is delivered, said Clay, Robinson & Co. agree to turn over to said Elwood \$15,000.00 more of said notes; and, when said Indian Territory cattle are turned over, they agree to turn over \$10,000.00 more of said notes; and, when said horses and sheep are turned over, then the said Clay, Robinson & Co. are to turn over to said Elwood all notes they or Clay & Forrest hold against him, or of which they or either of them are payees as maker or as one of the makers, except one note of \$1,000.00, given to Clay & Forrest, which is now the property of the Cattle-Ranch & Land Co., and release him from all liability to them as indorser or guarantor upon other notes. The said Elwood warrants the title to all of said personal property to be perfect, except liens for expenses of quarantine, and liens for damages by reason of said cattle having communicated Texas, Spanish, or splenic fever above mentioned, all of which liens are assumed by Clay, Robinson & Co., except as hereinbefore mentioned; and said Clay, Robinson & Co. hereby agree to furnish said Elwood, as fast as he may pay the same out, the sum of \$1,650, to be applied in paying the liens against said cattle occasioned by their having communicated said Texas, Spanish, or splenic fever, which said Elwood has agreed to pay. If said \$1,650 more than pay said losses which Elwood is to pay, he is to have the surplus, but, if said \$1,650 should not be enough to pay said losses, he is to pay the balance, said money to be paid to Elwood as fast as he produces satisfactory evidence that he has paid losses. Said Clay, Robinson & Co. also agree to deed to said Elwood E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  & S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 31-2-2, 480 acres; E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  & S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 6-3-2, 480 acres; S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 7-3-2, 160 acres; S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of sec. 3-3-2, 160 acres; N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 11-3-2, 160 acres,—subject to all mortgages, incumbrances, and liens on the same, none of which are to be paid by said Clay, Robinson & Co. Clay, Robinson & Co., also release a chattel mortgage they now hold on about 300 head of hogs near Haddam; the title to all the land which is to be deeded by Elwood, either directly or through others, to Clay, Robinson & Co. to be perfect, except the incumbrances mentioned herein, and except one 80-acre tract, for which said Elwood holds a bond for a deed from Alfred Mitchell, which bond is to be assigned to Clay, Robinson & Co. Said Elwood reserves the posts and wood now cut on the 480-acre tract in town 2, range 1. All the land mentioned herein is in Washington county, Kansas. Witness our hands, this 10th day of September, 1887. GEORGE S. ELWOOD. CLAY, ROBINSON & CO."

The plaintiff alleged that the Washington National Bank claimed some interest in the controversy, the nature of which is not fully known. He further states that the Elwood cattle, sold to Clay, Robinson & Co., were in the possession of the sheriff of Washington county, by order of the live-stock sanitary commission, and he asks for a personal judgment against Clay, Robinson & Co. and George S. Elwood for the sum of $4,958; and that the judgment be a first and prior lien upon the herd of cattle sold by Elwood to Clay, Robinson & Co. Clay, Robinson & Co. answer—First. By a general denial. Second. That the plaintiff Woodrum negligently placed his cattle in the pasture with those affected with the fever, and that any loss which he suffered was caused by his own fault and negligence. Third. That the contract set up by plaintiff was made with Elwood after they had loaned a large amount of money to him, and were having difficulty with him with reference to the collection thereof; that Elwood's financial affairs were in such condition that they were in great danger of losing the money which they had loaned to him, and, under these circumstances, the contract heretofore set up was made in order to effect a settlement of the indebtedness of Elwood, referred to in the contract, and that the property mentioned in the contract was received in payment of this indebtedness; that the contract was entire and indivisible, but that Elwood has only performed in part that which was required of him, and has not delivered the property which was to have been turned over to these defendants, and the failure to deliver the cattle is set forth as a defense to the recovery of a personal judgment by Woodrum against them. Fourth. That Woodrum is indebted to them upon a promissory note, given March 4, 1887, for the sum of $8,000, on which note there is still due the defendants, from Woodrum, the sum of $8,000, with interest from July 11, 1887, at 10 per cent. per annum. It is further stated that the note was secured by a chattel mortgage. The Washington National Bank answered that it claimed a right to the possession and control over the damages to be recovered by Woodrum from Clay, Robinson & Co., on the ground that Woodrum had executed a chattel mortgage to them on a part of the stock and cattle set forth and described as damaged by the Elwood herd of cattle; that there was due on the chattel mortgage from Woodrum to the bank the sum of $5,400, with interest thereon. It is further alleged that the security of the bank upon the cattle so mortgaged was impaired by the death and sickness, resulting from the Texas fever, to the extent of $2,954; and that Woodrum, who had mortgaged the cattle, is insolvent; and that the bank was compelled to look to the security upon the cattle only for the payment of its debt. It prayed that $2,954 of the judgment which Woodrum might recover from Clay, Robinson & Co. should be turned over and paid to the bank, to apply on the indebtedness due from Woodrum to the bank. Elwood filed a general denial, and, further answer—ing, said that he admitted that he had driven the diseased cattle into the country, but denied that he knew that they were affected with the fever. He also admitted entering into the contract with Clay, Robinson & Co., and alleged that he had fulfilled his part of the contract, except as to turning over a portion of the cattle mentioned, and that he was prevented from doing that by the refusal of Clay, Robinson & Co. to accept the same. Elwood further answered that the plaintiff Woodrum knew of his contract with Clay, Robinson & Co., and agreed to look to them alone for any damages which he sustained, and that he released him from any claim for the same. A trial was had with a jury, which resulted in a judgment in favor of Woodrum, and against Clay, Robinson & Co., in the sum of $4,836.88; and it was adjudged that the Washington National Bank should be subrogated to the rights of Woodrum, under the judgment, to the extent of $2,359.10. Clay, Robinson & Co. allege error in the proceedings, and ask a reversal of this judgment.

JOHNSTON, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The action of Woodrum is based on the contract made between Elwood and Clay, Robinson & Co., which has been set out at length in the statement of the case. It appears that, in the spring of 1887, Elwood drove a herd of southern cattle into Washington county which had been brought from the prohibited district south of Kansas, and were liable to, and did, impart to native cattle a disease known as Texas, splenic, or Spanish fever. At that time, Woodrum was the owner of a herd of native steers, and was keeping them in Washington county. About July 4, 1887, they became diseased, and it is stated that 167 of them sickened and died from the Texas fever. Clay, Robinson & Co. are livestock dealers, with head-quarters in Chicago and Omaha, who furnished money to stock growers and feeders in the west, taking security on their cattle, it being a part of the arrangement that when the cattle were ready for the market they should be shipped to, and sold by, Clay, Robinson & Co., whose compensation was the interest on the money furnished, and the commission obtained for selling the cattle. Prior to that time, they had furnished Woodrum quite a sum of money, and in 1887 he was owing them about $8,000. They also had similar relations with Elwood, who was indebted to them in a large sum of money at the same time. The herd of cattle driven into the state by Elwood in 1887 seems to have communicated the Texas fever to several herds of cattle in that section of the state, and heavy claims for damages were made against Elwood for loss and damages resulting from that cause. It is alleged that he was financially embarrassed, and Clay, Robinson & Co., to protect themselves, as they aver, entered into the contract above mentioned. This contract, as will be seen, provides that land and personal property belonging to Elwood should be conveyed and sold to Clay, Robinson & Co., in consideration of which certain acts were to be done by them, certain payments made, and notes surrendered, and certain obligations assumed. Among other things, and as a part of the consideration for the sale and conveyance of the property, they were to assume the payment of the claim and lien for damages to the Woodrum cattle by reason of the fever having been communicated to them by the Elwood cattle. Woodrum claimed that he sustained damages on account of the Texas fever to the extent of $4,958, and he brought this action on that provision of the contract wherein Clay, Robinson & Co. assumed the payment of such damages, and asked a personal judgment against them for that sum. He also asked that it might be declared a lien against the Elwood herd of cattle, but this claim appears to have been abandoned on the trial, and only a personal judgment was sought for or obtained. In the course of the trial, Clay, Robinson & Co. offered testimony tending to establish the defense which they set forth, namely, that Elwood had failed to comply with the terms of the contract, in that he was required to deliver 1,320 head of cattle, but that he fell short of what was required of him, and only delivered 1,105 head. The court excluded this, and all testimony tending to show a failure of consideration, or a non-compliance, by Elwood, with the provisions of the contract on his part; and this is one of the principal objections urged by plaintiffs in error. This ruling was prejudicially erroneous. The defense was proper, and properly pleaded. Woodrum relied on the contract alone, and whatever right he had to a personal judgment against Clay, Robinson & Co. was derived through this contract, to which he was not a party. Unless he has released Elwood, he has a right of action against him for the damages sustained, and it was competent for him to bring this action against Clay, Robinson & Co.

It is well settled in this state that where one person agrees with another to do some act for the benefit of a third person, such third person, though not a party to the promise, may maintain an action against the first party for a breach of the agreement. Manufacturing Co. v. Burrows, 40 Kan. 361, 19 Pac. Rep. 809; Mumper v. Kelley, 43 Kan. 256, 23 Pac. Rep. 558. The third party, however, who avails himself of such a contract, and claims under its provisions, is subject to the defenses arising out of the contract between the original parties. The contract in this case, as we construe it, is executory, and is entire and indivisible. Its provisions appear to have been dependent on each other, and mutually binding on each of the parties. Elwood agreed to convey numerous tracts of land, and to sell and turn over horses, cattle, and sheep, and, in consideration of which, Clay, Robinson & Co. agreed to assume and pay certain liens and obligations against Elwood, furnish a certain sum of money for payment of other claims, deliver certain promissory notes of Elwood and others, release a lien which they had on a bunch of hogs, and were to allow Elwood to retain certain posts and wood on the land which he agreed to convey. There were incumbrances and liens on a great deal of the real and personal property mentioned, some of which were assumed by Clay, Robinson & Co., and others which they did not assume, but expressly stipulated that they should be satisfied and discharged by Elwood. It is true that certain acts were to be performed at certain times, when the other party was required to do certain things on his part, but no one of these provisions appears to be distinct and independent of the others. It appears to us to have been intended as a complete settlement between the parties, and we cannot say that Clay, Robinson & Co., would have purchased any part of the stock, and assumed the obligations which they did, unless all were delivered, as promised, or that the parties understood that the delivery of certain notes, or the doing of certain things, was to be full compensation for any part of the cattle which was the subject of the contract. While certain notes were to be surrendered when certain property was to be delivered, it cannot be said that each constitutes a distinct and severable item which is independent of the other conditions of the contract. The liens or damages assumed by Clay, Robinson & Co. cannot be apportioned to any particular part of the cattle agreed to be delivered. Elwood agreed to sell and turn over 1,320 head of cattle, whereas it is claimed that 215 of that number were never delivered. Would Clay, Robinson & Co. have assumed an obligation to the extent of $1,958, upon a promise to deliver a part of the 1,320 head? Would they be liable on this provision of the contract if none of the property had been conveyed or delivered? Woodrum is claiming the benefit of a promise made to Elwood, which was based on conditions to be performed by Elwood, and how can he recover unless those conditions have been performed? He is in no better position to enforce the contract, derived through the promise to Elwood, than Elwood himself would be. In Benedict v. Hunt, 32 Iowa, 27, an action was brought by a mortgagee against a purchaser of mortgaged premises who had assumed the payment of the mortgage, and it was held that it was a good defense that the grantor of the defendant had no title to the property, and that the consideration wholly failed, and it is also stated that the party for whose benefit the promise is made cannot claim to occupy any better position than the party who made the contract. The New York court of appeals, in a case where a party for whose benefit a promise was made was seeking to enforce it against the promisor, held that a failure of consideration was a good defense, and stated that "there is no justice in holding that an action on such a promise is not subject to the equities between the original parties springing out of the transaction or contract between them. It may be true that the promise cannot be released or discharged by the promisee, after the rights of the party for whose benefit it is said to have been made have attached, but it would be contrary to justice and good sense to hold that one who comes in by what Judge ALLEN, in Vrooman v. Turner, [69 N. Y. 280,] calls 'the privy of substitution,' should acquire a better right against the promisor than the promisee himself had." Dunning v. Leavitt, 85 N. Y. 30. See, also, Flagg v. Munger, 9 N. Y. 483. We do not decide that the testimony which was rejected was sufficient to show a failure of consideration, but simply that such failure is a proper defense in the action, and that the testimony offered was competent and material to establish that defense, and should have been received.

Another point only of those presented requires attention. Clay, Robinson & Co. alleged that Woodrum was indebted to them in the sum of $8,000 upon a promissory note, executed March 4, 1887, and which has been heretofore mentioned; and they ask that the same should be set off against any claim for a personal judgment that might be made against them under their contract. The court found that there was due to them from Woodrum upon this note on September 10, 1887, which was the date of the contract between Clay, Robinson & Co., and Elwood, the sum of $7,923.26, no part of which has been paid, and, with accrued interest thereon, there was due at the time of the trial the sum of $8,535, which draws interest at the rate of 10 per cent. We think the note and claim thereon was a proper subject of set-off in this proceeding, as it was tried. Only a personal judgment was rendered in the action. Woodrum sought a recovery under the contract of Clay, Robinson & Co. When the contract was made, he was indebted to them in a greater amount than was found to be due from them under their contract. They have contracted with reference to this indebtedness, and assumed the obligation to Woodrum in the expectation that whatever their liability under the contract might be, it would be set off against his indebtedness to them. There were cross-demands between the parties which in equity, and under the statute, should be set off against each other, and neither party can deprive the other of the benefits thereof by assignment, "but the two demands shall be deemed to be compensated so far as they equal each other." Civil Code, § 100. See, also, sections 27, 94, 98; Sponenbarger v. Lemert, 23 Kan. 55; Gardner v. Risher, 35 Kan. 93, 10 Pac. Rep. 584; Story, Eq. Jur. c. 38. We have treated the case as the parties thereto appear to have treated it, as an action upon contract for the recovery of money, in which only a personal judgment against Clay, Robinson & Co. was given. We determine nothing as to what the rights of the parties may be under the liens mentioned in the pleadings.

The plaintiffs in error insist that the Washington National Bank should have been dismissed from the case; but we think that, under the pleadings, they were entitled to be heard, and have their rights determined. Their rights, however, depend on the course of the next trial, the relief sought, and the testimony then offered; and, hence, we refrain from expressing any opinion as to their rights under the evidence given at the last trial. The errors mentioned will require a reversal of the judgment, and a new trial, and it is therefore unnecessary to notice the objections with reference to the jury, and the findings which they returned. The judgment will be reversed and a new trial granted. All the justices concurring.

WICHITA & C. RY. CO. v. SMITH.

RAILROAD IN STREET—OBSTRUCTION—DAMAGES TO ABUTTING OWNER.

1. An abutting lot-owner cannot recover damages by reason of the location of a railroad, duly authorized by the city council, along one of the regularly laid out streets of a city, unless there has been a practical obstruction of the street in front of his premises, and he is virtually deprived of access to his property. Railway Co. v. Cuykendall, 42 Kan. 234, 21 Pac. Rep. 1051, followed.

2. The failure alone of a railroad company to properly ballast its road-bed, where sufficient space is left in the street for ordinary vehicles and teams to pass in front of abutting property, will not authorize a recovery for damages alleged to have been sustained for the destruction of one's right of ingress and egress, where there is no evidence to show the terms and conditions upon which the privilege to build such railroad was conferred by the city authorizing the same.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

J. H. Richards and C. E. Benton, for plaintiff in error. F. L. Martin, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This action was commenced by C. J. Smith, in the district court of Reno county, to recover damages for the alleged illegal, unlawful, and wrongful destruction of his right of ingress and egress to and from his premises, upon a legally laid out street in the city of Hutchinson. The plaintiff below alleged that he was the owner of lots 55 and 57, avenue G east, in Handy's addition to said city; that prior to the 16th day of September, 1886, he had erected a house upon said lots, and was at said date using and had since used the same as a residence; that the only outlet and inlet he had to said property was from said avenue; that the railway company, on or about the 16th day of September, 1886, illegally, wrongfully, and improperly obstructed said avenue by erecting its track and switches much higher than the grade, and had kept its track and switches in such a condition as to obstruct the avenue and deprive the plaintiff of the use and benefit of the same as a means of ingress to and egress from his dwelling, and had further obstructed the avenue by improperly leaving large piles of ties and other building material in front of plaintiff's residence, and permitting large numbers of cars to stand upon the said track on said avenue. The railroad company answered that it was authorized to build its railroad along said avenue by an ordinance of the city of Hutchinson, and that its line of road was constructed in conformity with the terms and conditions of such authority; that the track of the railroad company was located 50 feet from the residence of the plaintiff.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, for $225. With the verdict, the jury returned the following interrogatories and answers: "(2) When the defendant located its road and built its track on avenue G, was the grade of said avenue established adjacent to and abutting upon the plaintiff's property in question? Answer. No. * * * (4) State what is the approximate height of the embankment on said avenue G in front of plaintiff's property. A. A cut of fifteen inches. (5) Did the defendant make any ditches in said avenue G in front of plaintiff's property, or any part thereof? A. No. * * * (7) What is the width of avenue G in front of plaintiff's property, or any part thereof? A. 120 feet. (8) Where on avenue G, in front of plaintiff's property, is the main line of the defendant's road located? A. 30 feet to center of track. (9) Where on avenue G, abutting upon plaintiff's property, is any side track or switch located, and how many side tracks and switches, if any, are located at that point? A. One switch north of main line. (10) What is the distance at the nearest point between plaintiff's property and any switch or side track of defendant? A. 44 feet to center of said track. (11) What is the nearest distance between plaintiff's property on said avenue G and the defendant's main line? A. About 27 feet. (12) Is there room for an ordinary vehicle and team to be driven on avenue G between the nearest track and plaintiff's property? A. Yes. * * * (14) Is there room for ordinary vehicles to turn around in said space? A. No. (15) What is the average distance between the north line of plaintiff's property and the nearest track of the defendant? A. About 27 feet. * * * (17) If, in estimating damages, you take into consideration the standing of cars or of coaches on avenue G, state whether the said standing of cars or coaches was in the said avenue G adjacent to or abutting upon the property of the plaintiff in question. A. We do not. (18) Does the testimony introduced show that defendant's cars were permitted to stand upon said avenue G, adjacent to plaintiff's property, if at all, only for temporary time and temporary purposes? A. Yes. (19) If you answer the last question in the negative, state whether cars were permitted to stand at such place more than is usual, customary, or incidental to the necessities of railroad business. A. They were not. (20) Were the cars and coaches complained of at all times the same cars and coaches, or did they consist of different cars and coaches, which came and went in the regular course of traffic business? A. Different cars. (21) What was the market value of plaintiff's property immediately before defendant's road was located and its tracks constructed in said avenue G immediately abutting thereon? A. One thousand dollars. (22) What was a fair market value of plaintiff's property immediately after defendant's road was located and its tracks constructed in said avenue G abutting thereon? A. Seven hundred and seventy-five dollars. * * *

(24) In estimating damage done to plaintiff's property, what do you take into consideration? A. By taking market value immediately before and after constructing said road. * * * (27) If the plaintiff has sustained damage, by reason of the construction of defendant's tracks, did the damage occur by reason of the plaintiff not being able to use the said avenue G for the purpose it had been used prior to the construction of the said tracks? A. Yes. * * *

(34) What, if any, obstruction to the passage of vehicles and teams is there in that part of the said avenue G between the plaintiff's property and the main line of defendant's road? A. None.

(35) What, if any, obstruction to the passage of vehicles and teams is there in that part of the said avenue G south of the main line of the defendant's road, between Maple street, on the east, and Poplar street, on the west? A. None at present.

(36) Is plaintiff prevented by any act proved to have been committed by the defendant from having access to his said property at any point on said avenue G abutting thereon? A. Yes. (37) If you answer the last interrogatory in the affirmative, state what it is. A. By not having the road properly ballasted. * * *

(43) Can the plaintiff use the said avenue G adjacent to and abutting upon his said property in passing and repassing to and from the same, either to Poplar street, on the west, or Maple street, on the east? A. Yes. (44) Has the defendant, with its tracks and cars, permanently obstructed plaintiff's means of ingress to and egress from his said lots? A. Yes; to a certain extent. * * *

(46) In estimating plaintiff's damage, do you take into consideration the general inconvenience and annoyance incident to the operation of defendant's railway so near plaintiff's said property? A. No. (47) Is plaintiff prevented from traveling upon said avenue G, and using the same as a public thoroughfare, by reason of the locating and constructing of defendant's tracks therein? A. Yes."

It is claimed by the plaintiff in error that, to justify a recovery in this case for damages by the abutting lot-owner, there must be such an obstruction of the street in front of the lots owned by the defendant in error that he is practically denied ingress to and egress from his premises; that the findings show quite conclusively that the plaintiff below was not deprived of such right; that, notwithstanding the construction of the railroad track in the street, he still has 27 feet of such street in front of his place, free from obstruction; that there is room for ordinary vehicles and teams to pass between the railroad track and his property, and that he can still use avenue G, adjacent to and abutting upon his property, in passing to and from the same, either to Poplar street, on the west, or Maple street, on the east; and, hence, this case comes within the rule of non-liability of railroad companies, for constructing their lines along public streets, to abutting lot-owners for damages.

On the other hand, the defendant in error contends that, if the railroad company had lawfully constructed its track, and legally operated its trains, it might be within the rule of non-liability heretofore adopted by this court, but that the defendant below constructed its line of road along the street in question in an illegal, improper, and wrongful manner, and because of the manner of the construction and operation of the road, he was entitled to recover; that, as an abutting lot-owner, he has the right to every part of the street, and for the reason that the road was so constructed that he was deprived of the use of a portion of the avenue, he was thereby damaged.

The question of damages to abutting lot-owners, by reason of the location of railway tracks in streets and avenues, has been settled by this court, and the rule is that, "to entitle a person owning lots abutting on a city street, along which a railroad company has constructed and is operating its line, by authority of the city council, to recover damages, there must be such a practical obstruction of the street in front of the lots that the owner is denied ingress to and egress from them." Railway Co. v. Cuykendall, 42 Kan. 234, 21 Pac. Rep. 1051. In that case, the court said: "But where the location of the track is such that space enough is left in the street in front of the lots of the abutting owner, so that he can pass between the sidewalk and track, and the railroad is operated in a legal and proper manner, the lot-owner cannot recover because the space within which he has heretofore passed from and to his lots is restricted." Railroad Co. v. Garside, 10 Kan. 552; Railroad Co. v. Twine, 23 Kan. 585; Heller v. Railroad Co., 28 Kan. 625; Railroad Co. v. Hicks, 30 Kan. 288, 1 Pac. Rep. 396; Railroad Co. v. Andrews, 30 Kan. 590, 2 Pac. Rep. 677; Railroad Co. v. Larson, 40 Kan. 301, 19 Pac. Rep. 661. From the special findings, it appears that the plaintiff below had 27 feet of the street in front of his lots unobstructed, so that it cannot be said that he is deprived of the right of ingress and egress, but that the use of the full width of the street in front of his premises has been restricted, and for this alone, under the previous decisions of this court, there can be no recovery.

This brings us to the question of the right of the plaintiff to recover for the improper construction of the road. The special finding of the jury upon this branch of the case is to the effect that the plaintiff was deprived of free access to his premises, because the railroad track was not properly ballasted. The complaint is made that the ties were laid upon the street, and no provision made for vehicles to cross over the railroad track on that part of the street in front of plaintiff's lots. Did the failure of the railroad company to properly ballast its track deprive the plaintiff of his right of ingress and egress? The jury found that there was no obstruction to the passage of vehicles and teams in that portion of the avenue south of the main line of the defendant's railroad, between Maple street, on the east, and Poplar street, on the west, so the plaintiff had the unobstructed use of 27 feet of the street. There is no question but the city of Hutchinson authorized the construction of the railroad on this particular street, and, while the ordinance conferring this authority is not before us in the record, we must assume that the terms and conditions imposed by its provisions were complied with. There is no evidence to show that the railroad was not constructed in accordance with the ordinance. Now, can it be said that the plaintiff's property was damaged, or any right to its proper use affected by the failure of the railroad company to properly ballast its road-bed? That seems to be the only finding of the jury, with reference to the constructing of the railroad, of which plaintiff below can complain. Can it be said that the failure, upon the part of the railroad company, to properly ballast its road-bed, is such a wrongful and unlawful construction as would give the plaintiff below the right to recover damages for depriving him of his right of access to his property? Text-writers and courts make a distinction between the right of the public to pass and repass along a highway, and the right of the owner of road-side or abutting property to have access to the same. If the claim of the plaintiff is to be sustained, it must be based upon the ground that a private right has been interfered with,—that is, the right to pass from his premises to the street, or from the street back again; and this is quite different from the public right of using the street. This court has said, in the case of Railway Co. v. Cuykendall, supra: "So that if the location and construction of a line of railroad are authorized by the city council, and its location in the street is such as to give the lot-owner ingress to and egress from his lots, such use of the street by the railroad company does not interfere with the use of the lot-owner, and consequently he cannot recover for those remote and indirect inconveniences arising from smoke, noise, offensive vapors, sparks, fires, shaking of the ground, and other annoyances." As stated, the ordinance authorizing the construction of the railroad is not before us, and we cannot say whether there was such a departure, by the railroad company, from the terms and conditions of the ordinance authorizing the location, as would entitle the plaintiff to recover. It does not appear to us that the failure to ballast the road-bed in front of the plaintiff's lots interfered with his right of access to his property from and to the street; and a judgment based upon such a finding alone is erroneous. We recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and judgment entered upon the special findings of fact for the railway company.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

STANDARD IMP. CO. v. SCHULTZ et al.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — CHANGE OF POSSESSION — CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

When neither by the terms of a chattel mortgage, nor a contemporaneous oral agreement v.25p.no.9—40 between the mortgagors and mortgagees of a stock of hardware goods, a power of sale or of daily sales is given to the mortgagors, but the mortgagors, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the mortgagees, had the same control over the stock of goods that they exercised before the execution of the chattel mortgage, made daily sales, and applied the proceeds at their discretion, such a mortgage is, as a matter of law, fraudulent as to the creditors of the mortgagors.

VALENTINE, J., dissenting

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Saline county; S. O. HINDS, Judge.

Garver & Bond, for plaintiff in error.
Lovitt & Sturman, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. The Standard Implement Company commenced an action in the district court of Saline county against the firm of T. C. Ritter & Co., and attached their stock of hardware. Schultz & Hosea, who claimed to have a chattel mortgage on their stock, interpleaded, and claimed that their chattel mortgage was a first lien. A trial was had on the interplea, and the court made the following findings of fact and law:

"FINDINGS OF FACT.

"(1) On January 3, 1887, and for several months prior thereto, the defendants T. C. Ritter and his wife, P. J. Ritter, were engaged in the hardware business in the name of T. C. Ritter & Co., in the city of Salina, Kan.

"(2) On said January 3, 1887, T. C. Ritter & Co., being indebted to Schultz & Hosea in the sum of $683.37, executed to them three notes for $—— each, due in sixty, ninety, and one hundred and twenty days, respectively, and to secure the same gave a chattel mortgage on their stock of hardware and the store fixtures. The mortgage provided for possession of the mortgaged property by the mortgagors until default in payment or until the mortgagees deemed themselves insecure. There was no special agreement by the mortgagors and mortgagees as to selling the property. The mortgagees, Schultz & Hosea, resided at St. Joseph, Mo., and were represented by Smith George, of Salina, Kan., who had the claim against T. C. Ritter Co. for collection, and who attended to the taking of said notes and mortgage. George retained the notes for collection, and continued to represent Schultz & Hosea in the matter of this claim continuously up to the time of plaintiff's attachment. The mortgage was filed in the office of the register of deeds of Saline county, Kan., on January 4, 1887.

"(3) In the month of February, 1887, T. C. Ritter & Co. removed from their then business location into a room in another block of the town, taking with them their goods and the store fixtures.

"(4) The business, after the giving of the mortgage, was carried on the same as before, and goods were sold in the usual manner and other goods purchased from time to time and put into the stock. No separation was made of the new goods from those on hand when the mortgage was given, and no account kept showing the proceeds of sales of either class of goods. The proceeds of sales were used by Ritter & Co. as they saw fit for the payment of general expenses and debts, and without special regard to this mortgage debt.

"(5) Smith George was in the store of T. C. Ritter & Co. occasionally from and after January 3, 1887, knew the manner in which the business was being conducted, and never made any objection thereto. Ritter & Co. were not asked to apply the proceeds of sales of the mortgaged goods on this debt, nor to keep any account thereof.

"(6) Ritter & Co. paid to Smith George on said notes the following sums: On March 5, 1887, $50; on March 16, 1887, $120; on May 12, 1887, $60; on May 25, 1887, $113.90; on June 25, 1887, $100,—leaving a balance of $66, and interest, due on the last note.

"(7) T. C. Ritter & Co. continued in business until August 30, 1887, when they made a general assignment for creditors. At that time there was a general stock of hardware on hand, valued at two or three thousand dollars, but the evidence does not show what articles were in stock that were on hand when the mortgage was given, except the following: Thirteen stoves, one show case, two counters, one scale, lot of shelving; * * * which were worth more than the sum yet due said mortgagees.

"(8) In March, 1887, a half interest in the business of T. C. Ritter & Co. was sold to Henry Sturdevant, who continued in the firm to the end. Sturdevant paid in about $500 in money.

"(9) The Standard Implement Company and other creditors began suits with attachments against Ritter & Co. in September, 1887, and levied on the stock of hardware. The legal and valid claims of such attaching creditors amounted to more than the total value of the stock. These goods were afterwards sold by the receiver, and the proceeds are in his hands.

"(10) The mortgagees, Schultz & Hosea, never had possession of any part of the mortgaged property.

"CONCLUSION OF LAW.

"The mortgage of Schultz & Hosea is a valid lien, and is entitled to preference over attachments of plaintiff."

The implement company moved for judgment on the findings of fact, and also made a motion for a new trial. Both motions were overruled.

The case is here for review, the sole question being as to whether or not the mortgage is fraudulent as to creditors. Both sides cite and rely on the cases of Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127, and authorities cited in that case; Howard v. Rohling, 36 Kan. 357, 13 Pac. Rep. 566; Whitson v. Griffs, 39 Kan. 211, 17 Pac. Rep. 801. To these may be added the case of Leser v. Glaser, 32 Kan. 546, 4 Pac. Rep. 1026. The true test of the validity of a chattel mortgage, under similar circumstances, is stated in the case last cited, and is as follows: "All cases in which a power of sale of the goods by the mortgagor is provided for are therefore to be tested by the questions whether such sales are to be made in his own behalf and at his own discretion, and with the control of the proceeds reserved to him; or whether they are to be made solely in pursuance of the trust as a real one, that is, for the benefit of the mortgagee, and with provision that the proceeds shall be applied on his debt." The only stipulation in this chattel mortgage is that "the mortgagors shall retain possession of all of said described property. All of which he agrees, in consideration of such possession, shall be kept in as good condition as it now is, and taken care of at his sole expense." There is no stipulation about the manner of daily sales, or how the proceeds of daily sales shall be applied; in fact the court states, as a conclusion of fact in the second finding, that there was no special agreement between the mortgagors and the mortgagees about selling the property. If the chattel mortgage gave no power to the mortgagors to sell, and if there was no express oral agreement between the mortgagors and mortgagees about daily sales and the application of the proceeds, it is probable that the mortgage would be held good, but the findings of facts recite that "the business, after the giving of the mortgage, was carried on the same as before." * * * The proceeds of sales were used by Ritter & Co. as they saw fit,—for the payment of general expenses and debts, and without special regard to this mortgage debt." The resident agent of the mortgagees knew the manner in which the business was being conducted, and never made any objection thereto. By these findings a case is presented in which the power of sale by the mortgagors is recognized and acquiesced in, and this power of sale, and the application of the proceeds of such daily sales, are made by the mortgagors on their own behalf, and at their own discretion, the proceeds being subject to their absolute control, and the sales are not made and the proceeds applied solely in pursuance of the object and purposes of the chattel mortgage for the benefit of the mortgagees. In other words, by the course of dealing pursued by the debtor, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the mortgagors, the debtor had the same control over the property, exercised the same right to sell it, and to make an application of the proceeds of sale, as if the chattel mortgage had never been executed. The chattel mortgage could be used by the debtor as a shield against one class of creditors, while preferences could be given to others. While the mortgage may have been executed in good faith and with honest purposes, the subsequent action of both mortgagors and mortgagees renders it obnoxious to the test of validity as stated by this court in Leser v. Glaser, 32 Kan. 546, 4 Pac. Rep. 1026. We think that, as a matter of law, the chattel mortgage was void as against creditors. It is recommended that the judgment be reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to enter judgment for the plaintiff. Error upon the findings of fact.

BY THE COURT. It is so ordered; HORTON, C. J., and JOHNSTON, J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J. It is difficult to say that the judgment of the court below should be reversed in this case. The contest is between two creditors of T. C. Ritter & Co., who were a firm of hardware merchants at Salina, and who were the defendants in the court below, but who are not parties in this court. The plaintiff in error, the Standard Implement Company, a corporation of Illinois, which was plaintiff in the court below, was an attaching creditor of the defendants below, while the defendants in error, Schultz & Hosea, a copartnership firm of St. Joseph, Mo., and who were interpleaders in the court below, were mortgage creditors of the defendants. The grounds upon which the attachment was issued are not shown by the case as made and brought to this court by the plaintiff in error, but they were evidently merely allegations of fraud; for no other possible grounds for the attachment can be imagined under the facts of this case; but it does not appear that any fraud existed in the case, certainly not any fraud in fact or any actual fraud. The mortgage executed by T. C. Ritter & Co. to Schultz & Hosea was executed and recorded long before any attachment suit was commenced. It was valid upon its face; it was executed in good faith; and it does not appear that any fraud in fact or actual fraud ever existed in connection with the mortgage, or in connection with any of the mortgaged property. The mortgagors were to have the possession of the mortgaged property until default, or until the mortgagees deemed themselves insecure. By sufferance of an agent of the mortgagees, the mortgagors carried on their business after the execution of the mortgage the same as they had done before, and in doing so sold some of the mortgaged property. The findings of fact of the court below show, among other things, that "the proceeds of sales were used by Ritter & Co. as they saw fit for the payment of general expenses and debts and without special regard to this mortgage debt." The mortgage debt, however, was nearly all paid. It was originally $683.37, but the mortgagors, Ritter & Co., paid portions of this debt from time to time from the proceeds of sales until they paid all the debt except $66 and a small amount of interest. How much of the proceeds of the sales of the mortgaged property was used in keeping up the stock, or for paying expenses and debts other than the mortgage debt, is not shown. From anything appearing in the case, it might have been $1 or $10 or $100, or any other sum greater or less, but all was done in good faith. All the proceeds were used in replenishing the stock, and in paying debts and expenses, including the mortgage debt. Ritter & Co. did not use the proceeds as they saw fit, but only "as they saw fit for the payment of general expenses and debts;" and this, under the eye of an agent of the mortgagees. No fraud in fact of any kind, or in any degree or manner, at any time intervened. Some stoves and furniture and fixtures covered by the mortgage were worth more than enough to pay all the remainder of the mortgage debt, and none of these were sold by the mortgagors. All the property was afterwards converted into money by a receiver. Upon the foregoing facts and others, the court below held that the mortgage was a valid lien upon the funds in the hand of the receiver for $66 and interest, and that the lien was prior to any supposed rights of the attaching creditor. The plaintiffs in error claim that this decision was erroneous, and ask for a reversal thereof by this court. It would seem that they rely largely upon the case of Leser v. Glaser, 32 Kan. 546, 4 Pac. Rep. 1026, but that case is not in point, for in that case there was actual fraud, and the trial court upon that question found in favor of the attaching creditor, and against the mortgagee, and this court simply affirmed the decision of the trial court. And in that case, in the opinion delivered by this court, the following among other language was used: "A chattel mortgage is not necessarily void because it contains a stipulation that the mortgagor may retain the possession of the mortgaged property, nor is it necessarily void because the parties have stipulated either in the mortgage or elsewhere that the mortgaged property may be sold by the mortgagor, provided that all is done in good faith, and the proceeds of the sale or sales are to be used only for the purpose of paying the mortgagor's debts and the necessary expenses for keeping the property and in converting the same into money. * * * A chattel mortgage executed in good faith is always valid unless void for some technical reason, and, whether void or valid, it will probably never support an attachment; while, on the other hand, a mortgage executed in bad faith, or to hinder, delay, or defraud the mortgagor's creditors, is generally void, and will probably always sustain an attachment issued on the ground of such fraud. The fraud alone is sufficient to sustain the attachment without reference to the validity or invalidity of the mortgage." 32 Kan. 553, 554, 4 Pac. Rep. 1030, 1031. In the case of Gay v. Bidwell, 7 Mich. 519, 525, the supreme court of Michigan says: "To hold that a merchant cannot mortgage his goods without closing his doors would be to hold that no mortgage of a merchant's stock can be made at all." See, also, Jones, Chat. Mortg. §§ 424, 425, and the authorities there cited. See, also, Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127; Howard v. Rohlfing, 36 Kan. 357, 13 Pac. Rep. 566; Whitson v. Griffin, 39 Kan. 211, 17 Pac. Rep. 801; De Ford v. Nye, 40 Kan. 665, 20 Pac. Rep. 481; Hosea v. McClure, 42 Kan. 403, 22 Pac. Rep. 317; Arn v. Hoersemann, 26 Kan. 413; Randall v. Shaw, 28 Kan. 419; Tootle v. Coldwell, 30 Kan. 125, 1 Pac. Rep. 329. The presumption prima facie is that the judgment of the court below is right, and I cannot say that sufficient appears in this case to show affirmatively that it is erroneous, or that it should be reversed. All presumptions from silence or absence on the part of the record or case brought to this court should be construed in favor of the judgment of the court below, and not against it.

DOUGLASS V. BISHOP et al.

TAX-DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Where a tax-deed, issued by the county clerk of Jackson county, in this state, is acknowledged before a justice of the peace, and the caption or venue to the certificate of acknowledgment is: "State of Kansas, Jackson county—ss.,"—it will be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that such acknowledgment was actually taken by a justice of the peace of Jackson county, within this state, and in the township where the justice of the peace resides and holds his office.

Error to district court, Jackson county; ROBERT CROZIER, Judge.

John C. Douglas and J. H. Keller, for plaintiff in error. Hoaglin & Crawford, for defendants in error.

HORTON, C. J. This was an action by H. P. Bishop against Hattie R. Douglass and John A. Bolz to quiet his title to one quarter section of land in Jackson county. The case turns on the question of the validity of the tax-deed to Bishop. The certificate of acknowledgment to the tax-deed is alleged to be fatally defective. The acknowledgment is as follows: "The state of Kansas, county of Jackson—ss.: I hereby certify that before me, W. S. Hoaglin, justice of the peace, personally appeared the above-named E. D. Rose, clerk of said county, personally known to me to be the clerk of said county at the time of the execution of the above conveyance, and to be the identical person whose name is affixed to and who executed the above conveyance, as clerk of said county, and who acknowledged the execution of the same to be his voluntary act and deed, as clerk of said county, for the purposes therein expressed. Witness my hand this 6th day of May, A. D. 1872. W. S. HOAGLIN, Justice of the Peace." Paragraph 6991, Gen. St. 1889, prescribes the general form of a tax-deed, and to this form is annexed the form of a certificate of acknowledgment. That reads: "The state of Kansas, ——— county—ss.: I hereby certify that before me, ———, a ——— in and for said county, personally appeared the above named, C. D., clerk of said county, personally known to me to be the clerk of said county at the date of the execution of the above conveyance, and to be the identical person whose name is affixed to and who executed the above conveyance as clerk of said county, and who acknowledged the execution of the same to be his voluntary act and deed as clerk of said county, for the purpose therein expressed. Witness my hand (and official seal) this ——— day of ———, A. D. ———."

It has already been decided that "a tax-deed that is substantially in the form prescribed by the statute is valid on its face, although immaterial words of the statutory form are omitted, if everything of substance required by the statute as to form is found in the deed, when all of the recitations of the deed are taken together and so considered. Mack v. Price, 35 Kan. 136, 10 Pac. Rep. 521." In the certificate of acknowledgment to the tax-deed, under which H. P. Bishop claims, the words "in and for said county" were omitted. The question presented is whether this omission renders the deed invalid. We think not. The caption shows that the acknowledgment was taken in Jackson county, and in this state, and the certificate also shows that the tax-deed was signed by E. D. Rose, the county clerk of Jackson county, in this state, and that as such clerk he appeared before W. S. Hoaglin, a justice of the peace, in Jackson county and the state of Kansas, and acknowledged the execution of the tax-deed, as clerk of Jackson county, in this state, for the purpose therein expressed. We think that, even in the absence of the words "in and for said county," the presumption is that W. S. Hoaglin exercised his functions as a justice of the peace within his jurisdiction; that is, within his own township, in the county of Jackson and state of Kansas. In Bradley v. West, 60 Mo. 33, WAGNER, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "An objection was raised to the introduction of one of plaintiff's deeds in evidence, on the ground that it was not acknowledged in conformity with the law of the state of New York, where the acknowledgment was taken, or in accordance with the provisions of the statute of this state. The acknowledgment was taken before a justice of the peace in Delaware county, and is in all things in due form except that the certificate does not state that he took it in the town for which he was officially acting, the law giving justices of the peace power to take acknowledgments in the town in which they resided. But we think the objection is not tenable. Where a conveyance is acknowledged before an officer authorized to take such acknowledgment, within the limits of his jurisdiction, it will be presumed that such acknowledgment was actually taken within such limits. In Sidwell v. Birney, 69 Mo. 144, it is stated that 'the objection to the acknowledgment is that it does not appear to have been taken before an officer known to the laws of this state, and that it does not appear of what county the officer making the certificate was circuit clerk. 'Circuit clerk' is the title by which the clerk of the circuit court is ordinarily designated both by lawyers and laymen, and while, as an official designation, it is not rigorously exact, yet being in common use, and reasonably certain, we are of opinion that it sufficiently identifies the officer taking the acknowledgment as the clerk of the circuit court. We are also of opinion that it sufficiently appears from the face of the certificate that the person taking the certificate was circuit clerk of Schuyler county. The venue of the certificate is, 'State of Missouri, Schuyler county.' This shows that the certificate was granted in Schuyler county, and the presumption is that the officer exercised his functions within his jurisdiction." In Carpenter v. Dexter, 8 Wall. 513, it is decided that "it will be presumed that a commissioner of deeds in New York, whose authority to act is limited only to his county, exercised his office within the territorial limits for which he was appointed, although the only venue given to his certificate of acknowledgment be, 'State of New York.' Mr. Justice FIELD, in delivering the opinion in that case, among other things said: "Now, the certificate of proof produced in this case shows a substantial conformity with the law of New York of 1813 on the subject, which was in force when the certificate was made. The venue to it is simply 'State of New York,' and it is objected that the certificate has no assignable locality, and is therefore fatally defective. In support of this position the case of Vance v. Schuyler [1 Gilman, 163] is cited. In that case the supreme court of Illinois held a certificate insufficient to authorize the admission of a deed without proof of its execution, because the only means of determining where it was acknowledged was the venue, 'Lincoln ss. Wiscasset.' This is a different case from the one at bar. The words 'State of New York' present some definite locality, at least, while there can be none to the words 'Lincoln ss. Wiscasset.' The commissioner of deeds in New York had authority to act only in his county, and it will be presumed, although the state be named, that the officer exercised his office within the territorial limits for which he was appointed. * * * As already stated, courts will uphold a certificate if possible, and for that purpose will resort to the instrument to which it is attached. Thus, in Brooks v. Chaplin, [3 Vt. 281.] the certificate of acknowledgment did not show in what state the acknowledgment was taken, and the omission was supplied by reference to the deed, in which the grantor described himself as a 'resident of Suffield, in the county of Hartford, and state of Connecticut.' The acknowledgment was taken, two days after the date of the deed, having as its venue simply 'Hartford county,' and the court said that it was a fair presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the deed was executed at the time it bore date, and at the place of the grantor's residence, and that, finding the acknowledgment taken so soon afterwards in the county of Hartford, it could intend no other than the same county of Hartford where the deed was supposed to have been executed."

Against the certificate of acknowledgment it is urged that no presumption can be indulged in. If this were true, then the certificate must not only embrace the omitted words, but must also recite in what particular township of Jackson county the acknowledgment was taken. Phillips v. Thralls, 26 Kan. 780; Wilcox v. Johnson, 34 Kan. 655, 9 Pac. Rep. 610; Railroad Co. v. Rice, 36 Kan. 593, 14 Pac. Rep. 229. It is not the practice for an acknowledgment taken before a justice of the peace to state that it was taken in the township where the justice holds his office. If the statute had been literally followed in this case, it would be necessary to presume that the acknowledgment was actually taken within the limits of the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace; that is, within his own township. So it seems that some presumption must be allowed. Among the many cases cited to sustain the views of the plaintiff in error are Willard v. Cramer, 36 Iowa, 22, and Smith v.

Garden, 28 Wis. 685. These are the strongest cases referred to. In the Iowa case it does not appear that the certificate of acknowledgment had any venue or caption. It wholly failed to show the county of the notary public making the certificate; therefore that case is unlike this, because it did not show that it was taken within the jurisdiction of the officer, and therefore it could not be presumed that the officer took the acknowledgment in Marshall county, or in any other county for which he was a notary public. In the Wisconsin case the judge taking the acknowledgment failed to recite that the grantors of the deed "were known to him, or, not being known to him, that their identity was satisfactorily proved." In that case the statute was not substantially complied with, and differs from this, because we cannot presume that the grantors in the deed were known to the officer taking the acknowledgment. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CONTINENTAL INS. CO. OF NEW YORK V. WILSON.

INSURANCE—ARBITRATION CLAUSE—WAIVER.

1. A clause in a policy of insurance, which simply provides that any difference of opinion between the company and the insured, as to the amount of loss sustained by the latter, may be arbitrated, does not constitute such arbitration a condition precedent to bringing suit thereon. Such provision leaves arbitration optional with the parties, and either may decline to arbitrate.

2. Where a policy contains an arbitration clause, and, by its terms, makes arbitration a condition precedent, and the insured, who has suffered a loss thereunder, demands arbitration, and the company refuses, such refusal is a waiver of the provision, and the company may not subsequently insist upon arbitration, and is also estopped from setting up failure to arbitrate as a defense to an action on said policy.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Linn county: C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

Biddle & Smith, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. March 8, 1887, the plaintiff in error issued its policy of insurance to the defendant in error, promising therein to indemnify him against loss or damage by cyclone, in the sum of $1,300, upon his stoned dwelling-house and household effects therein. April 21, 1887, the neighborhood of the defendant in error was visited by a heavy wind storm, cyclonic in its character, which struck and severely wrecked his house, and also destroyed some of his household goods therein, resulting in a loss to him, as he alleges, of $1,040.—$1,000 on his dwelling-house, and $40 on his goods. On the same day, he notified the insurance company of his loss by the storm. May 31, 1887, he made and sent to the company proof of his loss. A few days after the storm, O'Dell and Forward, agents of the company, visited the premises, and looked them over. Afterwards, there was some talk between the defendant in error and agents of the plaintiff in error about arbitrating the matter, but no arbitration was ever had. January 2, 1888, Wilson began his action in the district court of Linn county. January 12th, the insurance company filed its answer, challenging the amount of loss sustained by Wilson, and pleading that, by the terms of their policy, they had a right to arbitrate the difference between the company and Wilson: that the company had demanded arbitration, and Wilson had refused to join therein, and claiming that, as Wilson had refused to arbitrate, he could not maintain his action. The company also claimed an offset, in the form of a premium note given by Wilson to the company for $52, and which, they allege, had never been paid. January 22, 1888, a reply was filed confessing the offset, and averring that the plaintiff below was ready and willing to arbitrate: but the insurance company had refused to submit to arbitration. The case was tried to the court and a jury April 5, 1888: the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff below, assessing his damages at $838.95. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and time given to make a case for this court.

As we view the record, there is but one question for this court to determine. The alleged error in the assessment of the amount of damages hardly rises to the dignity of a question, under the oft-repeated decisions of this court, and the evidence in the case. There is certainly evidence to support the finding of the jury in the sum returned by them. Some of the witnesses fixed the amount of damages suffered by Wilson at much more than the amount returned by the jury. The trial court approved the verdict. The real question is, was Wilson estopped from maintaining his action by any refusal of his to submit the question of the amount of his loss to arbitration, or by failure to submit to the company proper proof of loss? The policy upon which this action is founded requires that the insured shall give the company notice in writing of his loss, in case loss occurs, within 15 days, and that he make and transmit to the company his proof of loss within 60 days after it occurs. In this case the defendant gave the agents of the company notice the next day after the storm, and 40 days thereafter made and sent the company proof of his loss. There is no complaint of want of notice of the loss within 15 days, and actual notice was given the next day after the storm. Plaintiff in error does complain of the sufficiency of the proof of loss. As the proof of loss was made and sent to the company May 31, 1887, 20 days before the expiration of the period of time fixed in the policy during which it must be made, and the company held it, without making any objection thereto, until the 29th of July, 1887, and until long after the time, as fixed in the policy, for making the proof of loss, had expired, it is estopped from making any complaint now. Insurance Co. v. Flynn, 98 Pa. St. 627; Insurance Co. v. Davidson, 67 Ga. 14; Insurance Co. v. Vining, Id. 661; Butterworth v. Assurance Co., 132 Mass 489; Williams v. Insurance Co., 54 Cal. 442; Killips v. Insurance Co., 28 Wis. 472; O'Connor v. Insur- ance Co., 31 Wis. 160; Lewis v. Insurance Co., 52 Me. 492; Insurance Co. v. Schueller, 60 Ill. 465; Post v. Insurance Co., 43 Barb. 351; Insurance Co. v. Tyler, 16 Wend. 385; Insurance Co. v. Kyle, 11 Mo. 278. The arbitration clause of the policy reads as follows: "Differences of opinion arising between the parties hereto, as to the amount of loss or damage, may be settled by arbitration; each party to select one arbitrator, and, in case of disagreement, they to select a third, and their award in writing, under oath, shall be binding as to the amount of loss, the cost of said arbitration to be borne by the parties hereto equally." There is nothing in the above provision to render the arbitration proceeding a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action on the policy for loss sustained under it. Mentz v. Insurance Co., 79 Pa. St. 478; Reed v. Insurance Co., 138 Mass. 572; Gere v. Insurance Co., 67 Iowa, 272, 23 N. W. Rep. 137, and 25 N. W. Rep. 159; Canfield v. Insurance Co., 55 Wis. 419, 13 N. W. Rep. 252; Nurney v. Insurance Co., 30 N. W. Rep. 350; Wallace v. Insurance Co., 4 McCrary, 125, 41 Fed. Rep. 742. The language of the provision quoted allows arbitration, but leaves it optional with the parties to the contract, and it therefore follows that either may decline arbitration. 2 Wood, Ins. pp. 1014, 1015. Counsel argues that the following provision renders the arbitration clause absolute and binding upon the parties, and also makes it a condition precedent: "And it is hereby mutually understood and agreed by and between this company and the assured that this policy is made and accepted upon and with reference to the foregoing terms, conditions, stipulations, and restrictions, all of which are hereby declared to be a part of this contract, and are to be used and resorted to in order to determine the rights and obligations of the parties hereto, in all cases not herein otherwise especially provided for in writing." This provision adds nothing to the one in relation to arbitration. It simply refers to all preceding "terms, conditions, stipulations, and restrictions," and declares they are to be used and resorted to to determine the rights and obligations of the parties to the policy. It can hardly be claimed that this very general provision at the end of the policy changes any of the preceding terms, conditions, stipulations, and restrictions of the policy, rendering an optional provision absolute and imperative. It would require a much more definite provision than this one to oust the jurisdiction of the courts; but the contention of the plaintiff has been settled against him by frequent decisions of the courts of this country. Nurney v. Insurance Co., (Mich.) 30 N. W. Rep. 350, and cases there cited. There being nothing in the policy requiring arbitration as a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action thereon by the plaintiff below, it follows that the trial court did not err in holding that evidence in relation to arbitration was irrelevant, and therefore incompetent, nor in taking such evidence from the jury.

There is one other phase of the question to which our attention is called. The evidence shows that the defendant very soon after the injury to his property notified the plaintiff that he wanted to arbitrate the question of damages, and was informed by O'Dell, agent of the company, that he did not have time, then, to attend to it. That some days after he notified Mr. Forward, agent of the company, that he wanted to arbitrate, who said, in reply, he bed—d if he would arbitrate, and added, "You may sue if you want to." If the arbitration provision in the policy in this case required arbitration as a condition precedent, the reply of Mr. Forward to Wilson's demand for arbitration would amount to a waiver of the arbitration provision. When, in response to Wilson's demand for arbitration, the company, by its agent, refused to arbitrate, it was estopped from calling on Wilson subsequently to arbitrate, and estopped from claiming any right of arbitration thereafter. The company could not decline arbitration when demanded by Wilson, and still hold him to it. The company having declined arbitration, Wilson would have the right to bring suit at once. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

BY THE COURT. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

STATE v. WRIGHT.

JURY—CHALLENGE TO THE ARRAY.

All challenges to the array upon the ground that the jury was not selected, drawn, or summoned according to law must precede those made to the poll for favor, undue influence, or prejudice, and should a defendant, after a lengthy examination of the individual members of the jury, challenge to the poll for favor, undue influence, or prejudice, he will be held to have waived his right of challenge to the array.

Appeal from district court, Ford county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

J. T. Whitelaw, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and Ed. H. Madison, for the State.

HORTON, C. J. Henry Wright was prosecuted for a violation of the prohibitory law. He was convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for 60 days, and to pay a fine of $100, and costs of prosecution. It was also ordered by the court that he remain committed to jail until the fine and costs were paid, and until he executed a bond in the sum of $500, conditioned for his good behavior, and for his abstaining from any violation of the prohibitory law of the state for the space of two years from the date of his sentence. From this conviction and sentence, he appeals to this court.

The only question presented concerns the challenge to the array, which the defendant claims to have made, and which he maintains the trial court should have sustained. He alleges as a reason for making the challenge that the jury was not selected, drawn, or summoned according to law, and he asserts that the record not only shows this affirmatively, but that it also shows that the lists furnished were taken from the rolls of the year 1890. The counsel for the state insists that the challenge to the array was made too late. We agree with this. Such a challenge is, in general, founded upon some error or manifest partiality committed in obtaining the panel, and which, from its nature, applies to all the jurors so obtained. In this case, it was alleged that the jury was not selected, drawn, or summoned according to law. If such was the case, the defendant had full knowledge thereof when the jury were first called upon the panel. Instead, however, of making a challenge to the array at the convenient and proper opportunity, both plaintiff and defendant examined the jurors at great length, and challenges to the polls for cause were made and allowed. After the state had passed for cause, and the defendant had passed for the same reason, then a challenge to the array was made by the defendant. The examination of the jurors, upon which the challenges for cause were made, covers 34 pages of the record. This examination all took place before the challenge to the array. We think that all challenges to the array must precede those made to the polls for favor or prejudice, and we think that, should a party make challenge to the polls for favor or prejudice, he will be held to have waived his right of challenge to the array. Co. Litt. 158; Bac. Abr. tit. "Juries," (E) 11; People v. Roberts, 6 Cal. 214; Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. (9th Ed.) § 610; State v. Bryan, 40 Iowa, 379; Cooley v. State, 38 Tex. 636; Gropp v. People, 67 Ill. 154; State v. Davis, 14 Nev. 439-448; Thomp. & M. Jur. p. 284, § 266. The trial court, in sustaining the demurrer to the challenge to the array, very pertinently said: "The court does so because no specific ground of challenge to the array is urged that can apply to all of the members of the jury now selected, as the court takes judicial knowledge of the fact that a portion of the jury was drawn by the direct order of the court after the commencement of the present term, under an order on file for said drawing, and that another portion of the jury are talesmen selected by the sheriff upon the order of the court from among the bystanders." The counsel for the defendant refers to State v. Jenkins, 32 Kan. 477, 4 Pac. Rep. 809, and insists that this court has decided that the challenge to the array may be made at any time before the jury are sworn to try the issues in the case. Incidentally, it was said in that case that the objection to the panel must be made before the jury are sworn. But, in that case, the question was not raised as to the proper time of making the challenge to the array, therefore we assume it was made in that case at the proper time. It was not intended to decide that the challenge to the array could be made after challenges for favor, undue influence, or prejudice had been allowed. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

All the justices concurring.

STATE V. EIGLE.

Appeal from district court, Ford county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

J. T. Whitelaw, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and Ed. H. Madison, for the State.

PER CURIAM. This case presents the same question as in the case of State v. Wright, ante, 631, (just decided.) We must hold in this case, as in that, that the challenge to the array, or to the panel, always precedes a challenge to the polls. These challenges are taken separately. When the latter is made, the former is regarded as waived.

COFFER V. TERRITORY.

NUISANCES—ABATEMENT—KEEPING HOUSE OF ILL FAME.

A lessee pleaded guilty to an indictment for maintaining a nuisance by keeping a house of ill fame, and an order was issued to the sheriff to abate the same. No measures were taken to execute the order, but the lessee abandoned the premises, and the owner went into possession. About five months later, the sheriff placed a keeper in the house, and maintained him there for nearly two months, and made an affidavit that this was necessary in order to prevent a continuance of the nuisance, and asked for an order against the owner to show cause why an execution should not issue against her property for the expense thereof, at the rate of five dollars per day. Defendant demurred to the affidavit, the demurrer was overruled, and judgment was given against her for said expenses. Held, that the proceeding was erroneous, and that if the owner kept a house of ill fame on the premises it was not a continuance of the former nuisance, and she could not be held responsible without a regular proceeding against her.

Error to district court, Pierce county.

Struve, Haines & McMicken, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Snell, Pros. Atty., for the Territory.

ANDERS, C. J. This case is sui generis. It appears from the record that some time prior to October 10, 1888, the plaintiff in error, being the owner of certain premises known as "No. 1430 C Street," in the city of Tacoma, in Pierce county, leased the same to one Nettie Parnell, who, on said date, was indicted for maintaining a nuisance on the premises by keeping a house of ill fame. To this indictment the defendant Nettie Parnell pleaded guilty, and thereafter, and on the 19th day of October, 1888, an order was made by the court, directed to the sheriff of Pierce county, to abate said nuisance. The plaintiff in error was not made a party to the action. Whether she resided in Tacoma or elsewhere at the time is not shown by the record. Soon after the issuance of said order, Nettie Parnell vacated the premises, and turned the same over to her lessor, the plaintiff in error, who went into possession, and continued to reside therein up to the rendition of the judgment, by the court below, in this proceeding. It nowhere appears in the record that the order to the sheriff of October 19, 1888, to abate the nuisance, for the maintaining of which Nettie Parnell was indicted, was ever executed by the sheriff; but it does appear that on the 4th day of March, 1889, and long after the defendant had ceased to occupy or control the premises, he placed a keeper in the house without the consent and against the will of the owner thereof, the plaintiff in error, and so continued him there until the 23d day of April following, at an alleged expense of five dollars per day. Up to this time, the plaintiff in error had been charged with no violation of law in any manner pointed out by our statutes. On the 7th day of May, 1889, however, the said sheriff filed with the clerk of the district court, holding terms at Tacoma, an affidavit setting forth the issuing of the order of October 19, 1888, above mentioned, for the abatement of the nuisance, and alleging that, on investigation, he had discovered that the nuisance was being continued by the plaintiff in error, and in consequence thereof he had been obliged to place a keeper in charge of the premises, during the period above specified, at an expense of five dollars per day; and that he would be obliged, on account of the continuance of such nuisance, to retain such keeper therein; and concluding with a prayer that an order be issued to the plaintiff in error to show cause why an execution should not issue against her property to satisfy the costs and charges so incurred. Upon motion of the prosecuting attorney, based upon this affidavit, the court made and entered an order citing her to appear on the 10th day of May, 1889, and show cause why an execution should not issue against her property, as prayed for in the affidavit. On that day the defendant appeared and demurred to the affidavit. Her demurrer was overruled, and exception duly taken and allowed by the court. The hearing then proceeded, by the examination of witnesses, after which judgment was rendered against the defendant for the sum of $514.60, being the costs and expenses of abating said nuisance, and execution ordered thereon. From this judgment defendant appeals to this court, and assigns for error the making of the order to show cause; the overruling of the demurrer to the affidavit; the entering of judgment against the defendant; and ordering execution.

The only charge attempted to be made against the defendant in the court below was that contained in the affidavit of the sheriff, and that was manifestly insufficient in law to warrant the subsequent action of the court. The evident object of the affidavit was not to charge the plaintiff in error with the commission of an offense against the law, but to obtain an order from the court to enable the sheriff to collect from her the expenses of abating a nuisance carried on or maintained by a third party, and which, as we have before stated, was never abated at all by him. It is true the house itself in which the nuisance had been maintained by Nettie Parnell was taken charge of by the sheriff's deputy for a considerable length of time, and, as it seems, at no inconsiderable expense; but that was in no sense an execution of the order of the court. No such methods are sanctioned either by custom or the law. Under the circumstances of this case, this keeper had no more right to invade or take possession of the premises of the plaintiff in error than any other stranger; and, in so doing, he was a mere trespasser, whatever may have been her character or reputation. If she was guilty of continuing or maintaining a public nuisance at the place indicated by the affidavit, or elsewhere, a formal complaint should have been made against her before a committing magistrate or the grand jury, charging her with the commission of the crime. She could then legally have been held to appear before the district court to answer to the accusation. Had this been done, and had she been indicted and convicted of the offense charged, it would then have been properly in the discretion of the court before whom the action was tried to issue a warrant for the abatement of the nuisance at the cost of the defendant. See Code, §§ 1248, 1249. Under no other circumstances would the court be authorized to issue such an order. Indeed, even after conviction, the court should not in all cases issue a warrant or order of abatement. The judgment should be adapted to the nature and circumstances of the case. Where the building or structure complained of is itself a nuisance, the court will, if necessary, order its removal or destruction. But where the use of the building constitutes a nuisance whose effects are merely immoral and intangible, such nuisance can only be abated by the administration of such punishment as will be likely to cause the guilty party to desist. Wood, Nuis. (2d Ed.) pp. 43-45. Under our statutes, especially, the judgment of the court, after conviction, would almost certainly result in the abatement of a nuisance of a character growing out of the conduct of the defendant. Upon conviction the judgment of the court should be, in effect, that the defendant pay a fine of ——— dollars, and the costs of prosecution, and, when expedient or necessary, forthwith abate the nuisance at his own costs, and stand committed to the custody of the sheriff until the fine and costs be paid, or secured as provided by law. Code, §§ 1119, 1247-1249; Wood, Nuis. (2d Ed.) pp. 993, 994. And should any defendant, ordered into custody of the sheriff, fail to pay or secure the payment of the fine and costs adjudged against him before the final adjournment of court, he may then be imprisoned in the county jail until such fine and costs are paid or secured, until he has been imprisoned one day for every three dollars of such fine and costs. Code, § 1125. If the plaintiff in error had been indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced according to law, it seems hardly probable that it would have become necessary, even if proper, to place her under the surveillance of a deputy-sheriff or any other person in order to abate the nuisance complained of.

The fundamental error committed by the learned judge in this proceeding consisted in his assuming that the conduct of the plaintiff in error at number 430 C street, Tacoma, being of like character with that of Nettie Parnell at the same place, amounted to a continuance of the nuisance, for the maintaining of which the latter was indicted. The acts and conduct of Mary E. Coffey were not the acts or conduct of Nettie Parnell, though they may have been of like character; nor was the one in any manner whatever responsible for the acts of the other. The former may, in fact, have been guilty of a violation of the law concerning nuisances, but that could only be legally determined by the verdict of a jury, a jury not having been waived, or on her plea of guilty. The fact is she had a hearing before the court, but no formal and legal trial. She appeared by counsel, who demurred and objected to the whole proceeding. The demurrer should have been sustained, and no judgment should have been entered against the plaintiff in error. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause dismissed, with costs, and it is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 12, 1891.)

—LIABILITIES OF MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION.

1. A deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol evidence to have been intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of money.

2. A mortgagee in possession is liable to account to the mortgagor for the rents and profits, and in suit for an accounting and redemption no tender is necessary before the commencement of the suit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

The object of this suit is to have a certain deed made and executed by the plaintiff to Charles Swegle in his life-time declared to be a mortgage, and for an account of the rents and profits of the land described in said deed, and for the redemption of said real property, or such other relief as may be proper. The findings of the court are as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff on the 1st day of April, 1887, was the owner of the premises described in the complaint, and that on that day he executed a mortgage on said premises to W. and E. Breyman, due from him and his wife, to them for the sum of $4,000. That afterwards, on the 31st day of August, 1887, Charles Swegle, the father of the plaintiff, paid to said W. and E. Breyman said $4,000, and had said note and mortgage assigned to him. That afterwards, on the 3d day of September, 1887, the plaintiff and his wife executed to Charles Swegle a deed to said premises, which is made Exhibit A, and attached to this complaint. (2) That, at the time of the execution of said deed marked 'Exhibit A,' it was agreed and understood between the plaintiff and his father, Charles Swegle, that said George Swegle should have the right to redeem said premises on the payment to him, Charles Swegle, of the amount of money which Charles Swegle had paid W. and E. Breyman, with 7 per cent. interest; and that said Charles Swegle was to collect the rents and profits of said premises, and apply the same on said debt. (3) That the said debt on the 1st day of June, 1889, was the sum of $4,719.61. (4) That the amount of the rents and profits of said premises accruing to Charles Swegle and his estate was, June 1, 1889, the sum of $685.15, leaving a balance due said estate at that time, the sum of $4,034.46. (5) That, about and prior to the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff offered to pay to the estate of said Charles Swegle the said sum of $4,034.46, and served upon the defendants an offer in writing to pay the same, and that the offer was not accepted by the defendants." As conclusions of law the court finds "(1) that said deed marked 'Exhibit A' was, at the time the same was executed, intended to be and operate as a mortgage to secure the sum of money which Charles Swegle paid to W. and E. Breyman for the transfer of the mortgage of plaintiff and wife to said W. and E. Breyman; (2) that plaintiff is entitled to redeem said premises on the payment to the estate of said Charles Swegle of the said sum of $4,034.46; (3) that the plaintiff, on the payment of said sum of $4,034.46, will be entitled to a conveyance of said premises to him from the heirs of said Charles Swegle. It is therefore ordered and decreed by the court that the plaintiff pay into this court for the use of the estate of Charles Swegle, deceased, the sum of $4,034.46, within thirty days from the date of this decree, and that, within thirty days thereafter, to-wit, within sixty days from the date hereof, the defendants execute in due form a conveyance or conveyances of all their interest in said premises; and, in case of any failure of said defendants, or either of them, to so execute such conveyance or conveyances, then this decree shall stand in lieu thereof, and be effectual to transfer from said defendants to this plaintiff all of the estate or interest which said defendants or either of them may have in said premises. And that plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendants his costs and disbursements in this cause, taxed at $278.20, and that execution issue therefor. [Signed] R. P. Boise, Judge." The heirs at law of said Charles Swegle are made parties defendant: also the husbands respectively of his daughters, who are married; also the administrator of his estate, and the guardian of one minor heir. From the decree above set out this appeal is taken by the defendants Nancy Belle, Henry S. Belle, Olivia E. Holmes, H. R. Holmes, Charles A. Brown, and Emma Brown, Frank E. Brown, and A. Bush, administrator of the estate of Charles Swegle, deceased.
